*This is a distich by wise old Phocylides,
An ancient who wrote crabbed Greek in no silly days;
Meaning, " 'Tis right for good winebibbing people,
Not to hit the jug fast round the board like a cripple;
But gaily to chat while discussing their tipple."
An excellent rule of the hearty old cock 'tis—
And a very fit motto to put to our Noctes.]*

SCENE—The Snuggery.—Time, seven o'clock.—Members present—NORTH, SHEPHERD, O'BRYEN.

SHEPHERD.

THE wee bit cozzie octagon Snuggery metamorphosed, I declare, intil a peerfack paragon o' a leebrary, wi' glitterin' brass-wired rosewood shelves, through whilk the bricht-bunn' byeckles glint splendid as sunbeams, yet softened and subdued somehow or ither, down to a specie o' moonlicht, sic as lonely shepherd on the hill lifts up his hums to admire along the fringed edges o' a fleecy mass o' clouds, when the orb is just upon the verra comin' out again intil the blue, and the entire night beautifies itself up, like a Revin' being, to rehal the stainless apparition!

NORTH.

Homeric!

SHEPHERD.

Ay, Homer was a shephend like mysell, Ise warrant him, afore he lost his een, in lieu o' whilk, Apollo, the Great Shephend o' a' the Flocks o' the Sky, gied him—and waana't a glorious recompense, sir?—for a' the rest o' his days, the gift o' immortal sang.

NORTH.

'Tis fitted up, James, after a fancy-plan of our poor, dear, old, faceté, feeling, ingenious, and most original friend—Johnny Ballantyne.

SHEPHERD.

Johnny Ballantyne!

VOL. XXIX. NO. CLXXV.

NORTH.

Methinks I see him—his slight slender figure restless with a spirit that knew no rest—his face so suddenly changeful in its expression from what a stranger might have thought habitual gravity, into what his friends knew to be native there—glee irrepressible and irresistible—the very madness of mirth, James, in which the fine ether of animal spirits seemed to respire the breath of genius, and to shed through the room, or the open air, a contagion of exuberance, against which no heart was proof, however sullen, and no features could stand, however grim—but still all the company, Canters and Covenanters inclusive, relaxed and thawed into murmurs of merriment, even as the strong spring sunshine sends a-singing the bleak frozen moor-streams, till all the wilderness is alive with music.

SHEPHERD.

He was indeed a canty cretur—a delichtfu' companion.

NORTH.

I hear his voice this moment within my imagination, as distinct as if it were speaking. 'Twas exceedingly pleasant.

SHEPHERD.

It was that. Verra like Sandy's—only a hue merrier, and a few beats in the minute faster. Oh, sir! hoo he wou'd hae enjoyed the Noctes, and hoo the Noctes wou'd hae enjoyed him!

NORTH.

In the midst of our merriment, James, often has that thought come over me like a cloud.

SHEPHERD.

What'n a lauch!

NORTH.

Soul-and-heart-felt'

SHEPHERD.

Mony a strange story fell down stane-dead when his tongue grew mute. Thousands o' curious, na, unaccountable anecdotes, ceased to be, the day his een were closed; for he tel't them, sir, as ye ken, wi' his een mair than his lips; and his verra hawns spak, when he snapped his forefinger and his thoomb, or wi' the hail five spread out—and he had what I ca' an elegant hawn' o' fine fingers, as maist wutty men hae—manually illustrated his soothjeck, till the words gaed aff, murmuring like bees frae the tips, and then Johnny was quate again for a minute or sae, till some ither freak o' a fancy came athwart his gewie, and instantly loup't intil look, lauch, or speech—or rather a' the three thegither in ane, while Sir Walter himsell keekled on his chair, and leanin' wi' thae extraordinar' chowka o' his, that often seem to me maist as expressive as his pile o' forehead, hoo wou'd he fix the grey illumination o' his een on his freen Johnny, and ca' him by that familiar name, and by the sympathy o' that maist capawcious o' a' sowles, set him clean mad—richt doon wudd a'thegither—till really, sir, he got untholeably divertin', and folk compleen'd o' pains in their sides, and sat wi' the tears rinnin' doon their cheeks, praying him for goodness to haud his tongue, for that gin he saidna, somebody or ither wou'd be fa'tu doon in a fit, and be carried out dead.

NORTH.

Atruce, my dear James, to all such dreams. Yet pleasant, though mournful to the soul, is the memory of joys that are past! And never, methinks, do we feel the truth of that beautiful sentiment more tenderly, than when dimly passeth before our eyes, along the mirror of imagination,—for I agree with thee, thou sagest of Shepherds, that when the heart is finely touched by some emotion from the past, the mirror of imagination and of memory is one and the same, held up as if 'n moonlight by the hands of Love or Friendship,—never feel we the truth of that beautiful sentiment more tenderly, I repeat, James, than when we suddenly re-behold there the image—the shadow of some face that when alive wore a smile of personal acquaintance—somewhat saddened now, though cheerful still, in the and then, as we continue to gaze upon it, undergoing and ~~and~~, and soon disappearing in total eclipse.

Enter MR AMBROSE, MONS. CADET, KING PEPIN, SIR DAVID GAM, TAPPI-TOURIE, and the PECH, with Tea, Coffee, Toast, Muffins, &c.

SHEPHERD.

When a body has had an early dinner, what a glorious meal's the FOWERS-DOORS! Hooly—hooly, lads. Aye—that's richt, Tappy—just set doon the muffins there close to ma nieve; oh! but they seem sappy! Sir Dawvit, be ye baronet or be ye knight, you've a fine ee for the balancin' o' a table, or ye had never clashed doon on that spat thae creeshy cramped. Pippin, you're a dextrous cretur, wi' your ashets o' wat and dry toast. And oh! my man Pechy! but you've a stoot back and a strong arm to deposit wi' sic an air o' majesty that twa-quartern loaf fresh frae the bakers, and steamin' as sweet's a bank o' v'ilets after a shower.—Mr Awmrose, ye needna bile ony inair eggs—for though they're no verra big anes, yet whatever the size, sax is ma number—thae bit chickens maun hae belonged to a late cleckin'—But whare's the Roond? Aye—aye—Prince o' Picardy! I see ye bearin' him frae the bit side-boardie.—Noo attend to Mr North, Mr Awmrose, and diuna mind me—tak tent o' Mr North, sir—and see that he wants for naething—for I discern by the glegness o' the een o' him, that he's yaup—yaup—yaup—and 's sharpenin' his teeth wi' the fork, till you hear them raspin' like a mower whettin' his scythe.

NORTH.

Ambrose, bring yon.

AMBROSE.

Here they are, sir.

[Placing them before Mr Hooc.

SHEPHERD.

Angels and ministers o' grace defend us—what the deevil's thae?

NORTH.

What think ye, James?

SHEPHERD.

Hauns! Human hauns! Preserved human hauns! Pickled human hauns! The preserved and pickled human hauns o' a Christian!

NORTH.

Well—what although?

SHEPHERD.

Weel! what altho'! Are they a present frae Dr Knox, or his freen Hare? Aiblins the verra hauns o' Burke himself! What throttlers!

NORTH.

Why, they are throttlers, James—but they never belouged in life to any of the gang.

SHEPHERD.

That's a great relief—But excuse me, sir, for haudin' ma nose—for I fear they're stinkin'.

NORTH.

Sweet, I assure you, James, as the downy fist of a virgin, yet warm from her own bosom. Bear-paws from Scandinavia—a Christmas-present from my intrepid friend Lloyd, now Schall-king of the Frozen Forests.

SHEPHERD.

Let's pree them.

[The SHEPHERD takes one Paw, and NORTH another, and they both begin to masticate.

AND.

Exquisite!

SHEPHERD.

Are ye at the tact, sir?

NORTH.

I am.

SHEPHERD.

Mines is picket as clean's an ivory kaim for the tap-knot o' a bit bonnie lassie. Noo for thae pawms.

NORTH.

The mustard!

SHEPHERD.

Eh?

NORTH.

The mustard?

SHEPHERD.

Eh? Oh! but the pawms is prime. The ile o' pawms! Far better nor the ignom'nt warld suspects. Nae wunner the beasts sooks them in their wunter-caves.

NORTH.

Try your paw with chicken, James.

SHEPHERD.

I'm dooin' sae, sh. Frae this time, henceforit and for evermair, hoo weresh the race o' hams! What's pig-face to bear-paw!

NORTH.

Hyperion to a Satyr.

SHEPHERD.

Say Satyr to Hyperion, sir. Mine's anatameezed—and lo! the 'skeleton' O the wonderfu' warks o' natur!

NORTH.

There!

SHEPHERD.

What'n a what! I'm hungrier than if I had ate a hale solan guse. What'n a what!

NORTH.

Let us now set in to serious eating, James.

SHEPHERD.

Be't sae. Seelence!

[There is silence in the Snuggery from half-past seven till half-past eight; or, rather, a sound like the whutter of wild-fowl on the feed along a mud-bank, by night, in Poole Harbour, at low water, as described by Colonel Hawker.

NORTH.

James?

SHEPHERD.

What's your wull, sh?

NORTH.

A caulker?

SHEPHERD.

Wi' a' my heart and sowle. Here's to Mr Lloyd's health and happiness—and when he's done huggin' the bears, may he get a wife!

NORTH.

Amen!

SHEPHERD.

Noo, sir, let's hae some leetery conversation.

NORTH.

I was just going to propose it, James. Suppose we have a little poetry.

SHEPHERD.

What a cauld squash o' poetry's this we've had blawn intil our faces o' sae many blashy shoors o' 'leet! But Stoddart has genits.

NORTH.

As. Let us speak now of the great masters. Lean back, James—over head—and pull out the volume it chances to light on—one o' the works of the Immortals.

SHEPHERD (obeying the mandate.)

Muir's Life o' Byron—First volumn! Whan are we to hae the second?

NORTH.

I know not. Probably ere next Noctes.

SHEPHERD.

I'm wearyin' unco sair for the second volumn. But our carrier, when he's gotten a heavy load o' the necessaries o' life, sic as rivers, and pots and na, and other household utensils, ave leaves ahint him at Selkirk a' patshels that he jalouses may cōnteen byeuk, "Especialy," quo' he, "thae great muckle clumsy square anes ye ca' quartos."

NORTH.

Not so with Maga?

SHEPHERD.

Na, na! A hale o' Blackwood's as light as a feather, and he swears that his beast never recents on the steyist brae gin Maga's aboard. The enjoyment o' the bale, sir, gars his cart dance alang a' the ups and downs i' the road through the Forest, like a bit pleasure yott tilting outowre the waves at Windermere Regatta.

NORTH.

Poetry!

SHEPHERD.

I can tell ye a curious tale about this quarto. It lay for the best part o' a moon amang some cheeses, at Selkirk, afore it was discovered by some weans to be a byeuk, by means o' the brood paper and the direction, and was forwarded at last to Mount Benger in a return cart loaded wi' strae. But Gudefallow clean forgot that his lordship was there, and sae by some queer mischance he got bundled up intil the last, and mair nor a month afterwards, you may guess the surprise o' ane o' the hizzies that had gaeu up for fodder, when a great big broon square paper pairshel bounced out o' her lap in the byre——

NORTH.

Poor Girzzy!

SHEPHERD.

—— to the sair disappointment o' Crummaie, wha, after smellin' an' snokin' an' snortin' at it for a while, began cavin' her head like a dementit cretur, and then etlin' to toss't out o' the door, gettin' entangled by the twine on the point o' ane o' her horns, she brak out o' the byre, as if stung by a gadfly, or some divine astrum——

NORTH.

Classical!

SHEPHERD.

—— and then doon the knowe, across the holm, owre the Yarrow, up the brae, and out o' sight ahint the hill, richt awa like a red-deer, clean out the region o' Yarrow a'thegither, and far awa ayont the head o' Etrick into the verra heart o' Lakdalemuir, whar she was fun', days after, sair forfeuchan, ye may weel suppose, wi' the Beeography across her een, just as if she had been a bill gien to stickin', wi' a brodd on his griesly forehead. A' the shepherds, ye ken, sir, are gude scholars in our region—and him that first fand her was the President o' the Lakdalemuir Spootin', Theological, and Philosophical Club. Puttin' on his specs—for he's a gae auld cretur—he sune made out the inscription in capitals on the forehead o' the beast—"JAMES HOGG, ESQ., MOUNT BENGLE, YARROW, BY SELKIRK," and then in Ecclētics aneath—"To be forwarded by the first opportunity."

NORTH.

That must have been a poser to the President.

SHEPHERD.

It was that, sir. Nor was his perplexity diminished by the twa sma' words in ane o' the corners—"Per mail." The mail hasna begun yet to rin that road, ye ken, sir, in the shape o' a coach, and the President himself confessed to me, on tellin' the tale, that amang the multitude o' oot-o'-the-way thochts that crooded intil his brain, to account for the faynomenon,—ane o' them was, that in this age o' inventions, when some newfangled notion or ither, out o' some ingenious noddle, is pitten dally intil practice for expeditin' human intercourse, the coo was an express——

NORTH.

Hee—hee—hee! James, you tickle my fancy, and I get slightly convulsed about the midriff.

SHEPHERD.

Yes, sir—that the coo was an express sent by Mr Elliot o' Selkirk.

NORTH.

Instead of a carrier-pigeon.

SHEPHERD.

Just see, sir. And that the coo, haen been bred in Eskdalemuir, had returned to the spat o' her nativity, eager to browse the pasturage on which she had fed when a young and happy quey. Howsomever, to mak a lang story short, our freen contrived to get the quarto aff Crummie's horns, and brocht it doon, neist day, himsell to Mount-Benger, when, by layin' a' our heads thegither, we cam to see intil the heart o' the mystery, which, like maist others, when severely scrutineezed, degenerated intil an accoontable though somewhat uncommon tack.

NORTH.

Open the volume, James, at haphazard—and let the first page that meets your eyes be the text of our discursive dialogue.

SHEPHERD.

Shall I read it up, sir?

NORTH.

Do, ore rotundo, like a Grecian. What seems it about?

SHEPHERD.

The marriages of men o' genius—if I dinna mistak—

NORTH.

Hark! and lo! [The time-piece strikes nine, and enter PHOEBUS and TITUS, with the material. They sweep away the "Reliquias Danuum, and deposit all things needful in their place."]

SHEPHERD.

Clever chieles, thae, sir.

NORTH.

I hope, James, that Mr Moore will strike out of the volume, before it becomes an octavo, that misbegotten, misconceived, misdelivered, misplaced, and mistimed abortion—

SHEPHERD.

What'n a skrow o' misses, like a verra boardin'-school let'n lowse; puir bit things, I pity them—a' walkin' by themsells, rank and file, twa deep, the feck o' them gae'n sickly, and greenin' for hame—But no to pursue that cessage—what was you beginnin' till abuse, sir, when I interruppt you about the misses?

NORTH.

Mr Moore's Homily on Husbands.

SHEPHERD.

He says—"The truth is, I fear, that rarely, if ever, have men of the higher order of genius shown themselves fitted for the calm affections and comforts that form the cement of domestic life." Hoots—toots! Toots—hoots! Hoots—hoots! Toots—toots!

NORTH.

You are severe, James, but your strictures are just.

SHEPHERD.

The warst apothegm that ever was kittled in the shape o' a paradox; and then, sir, the expression's as puir's the thocht. The cawm affection—if by them Mr Muir means a' the great natural affections, and he can mean naething else—are no the "cement" merely o' domestic life, but they are its Sowle, its Essence, its Being, itself. Cement's a sort o' lime or slime—

NORTH.

I should not quarrel with the words, James, if their meaning—

SHEPHERD.

But I do quarrel wi' the words, sir, and they deserve to hae their noses pou'd for leearn. I recollect the passage perfectly weel, and its as easy to rend it intil flinders, as to tear to rags a rotten blanket left by some spy on a nyceuck by the roadside. Tak you the byeuck, sir—for you're amainst as gude an electionist as Mr Knowles himsell. You're twa natural readers—wi' a' your art—therein you're aboot equal—but in action and gesture, sir, he beats you sair.

NORTH.

"However delightful may be the spectacle of a man of genius, tamed and domesticated in society, taking docilely upon him the yoke of the social ties, and enlightening, without disturbing, the sphere in which he moves, we must, nevertheless, in the midst of our admiration, bear in mind that it is not thus smoothly or amiably immortality has been ever struggled for, or won. The poet thus circumstanced, may be popular, he loved; for the happiness of himself, and those linked with him, he is in the right road—but not for greatness. The marks by which Fame has always separated her great martyrs from the rest of mankind, are not upon him, and the crown cannot be his. He may dazzle, may captivate the circle, and even the times in which he lives, but he is not for hereafter!"

SHEPHERD.

What infernal folly's that ye're taukin', sir? I wuss ye maynae ha'e been drinkin' in the forenoon owre mony o' thae wicked wee glasses o' noyau, or sherry-brandy, or ither leecures in confectionary chops, and that's the effects o' breakin' out upon you the noon, sae sune after the paws, in a heap o' havers, just like a verra rash on the face o' a patient in the measles. Eh?

NORTH.

The words are Mr Moore's. My memory, James, is far from being tenacious, yet sentences of extreme absurdity will stick to it—

SHEPHERD.

Like plaguy burrs to the tails o' a body's coat walkin' through a spring wood, aliv' wi' sweet-singing birds, and sweet-smelling flowers, whose balm and beauty's amais't a' forgotten as June's he comes out again into the open every-day world, and appear faint and far off, like an unassured dream, while thae confounded realities, the burrs, are stickin' as if they had been shued on by the tailor, or rather incorporated by the wicked weaver wi' the verra original wab o' the clath, sae that ye cannae get rid o' the inextricable cleggs, without clipping the bit oot wi' the shears, or ruggin' them aff angrily wi' baith hauns, as if they were sae mony waur than useless buttons.

NORTH.

An apt and a picturesque illustration. When Mr Moore speaks of the spectacle of a man of genius "tamed and domesticated in society," he must have been thinking—

SHEPHERD.

(O' the laughin' hyena.

NORTH.

No, James, not the laughing hyena, for he adds, "taking docilely upon him the yoke of the social ties;" and, I believe, neither the laughing nor the weeping hyena—neither the Democritus nor the Heraclitus of the tribe—has ever been made to submit his shoulders to the yoke—nor, indeed, have I ever heard of any attempt having been made to put him into harness.

SHEPHERD.

Mr Muir's been thinkin' o' the Zebra, or the Quagga, sir.

NORTH.

But then, James, he goes on to say forthwith, "and enlightening, without disturbing, the sphere in which he moves."

SHEPHERD.

Ay, there Mr Muir forgets the kind o' animal he set oot wi', and whether he was a laughing hyena, as I first surmised, or a zebra, or quagga, why, by a slip o' the memory or the imagination, he's transmogrified either intil a star or a watchman, "enlightening, without disturbing, the sphere in which he moves,"—maist probably a star; for a watchman does disturb "the sphere in which he moves," by ever and anon crawin' oot something about the hour—at least folk hae tellt me that it's about the hour, and the divisions o' the hour, that the unhappy cognambulists are scrauching;—whereas, as to enlightening the sphere which he disturbs, what can you expect, sir, frae a fawrthin cawle? It maun be a star, sir, that Mr Muir means. Tak me word for't, sir, it's a star.

NORTH.

But, James, Mr Moore adds, "that it is not thus smoothly or amiably immortality has been ever struggled for or won."

SHEPHERD.

There again, sir, you see the same sort o' slip o' the memory or the imagination; see that, no to be severe, the hail sentence is mair like the maunderin' o' an auld wife, sittin' half asleep and half paralectic, and aiblins rather a big wee fou frae a chance drappie, at the ingle-cheek, lecturin' the weans how to behave theirselles, and mair especially that nae gude's ever likely to come either frae reading or writing ungodly ballants, like them o' Bobby Burns—

NORTH.

Or Jamie Hogg—

Just see, sir;—for that, as she hersell cam to ken by cruel experience, it a' "ends in houghmagandy!"

NORTH.

I fear, James, the star won't do either. For Mr Moore inditeth, that "for the happiness of himself (the Poet aforesaid) and those linked with him, he is on the right road," which is not the language men use in speaking of a star, or even a constellation. And in the sentence that follows, he is again a good Christian; but not one of "the great martyrs separated by Fame from the rest of mankind," as may be known from her "marks not being to be found upon him," (he is no witch, James,) and from the want of a crown on his temples. Still, whether a laughing hyena, a zebra, a quagga, a star, or a watchman, he "may dazzle," Mr Moore tells us, "may captivate the circle, and even the Times in which he lives, (Mr Moore himself, I believe, does so,) but he is not for hereafter;" and this, James, is a specimen of fine writing in the philosophy of human life!

SHEPHERD.

O hoch! hoch! hoch! O hoch! hoch! hoch!

NORTH.

You are not ill, my dear James?

SHEPHERD.

Just rather a wee quawmish, sir. I can stannach as strang nonsense as maist men; but then there's a peculiar sort o' wersh tuzionless nonsense that's gotten a sweaty sweetishness about it, no unlike the taste o' the purest imaginable frost-bitten parsnip eaten along wi' yesterday's sowens, to some dregs dribbled out o' an auld treackle bottle that has been stannin' a' the season on the window-sole catchin' flees,—that I confess does mak me fin' as gin I was gaun to bock. That sentence is a sample o't—see here's to you, you Prince o' Jugglers.—(Oh! but that's the best you hae brew'd these fifty years, and drinks like something no made by the skill o' man, but by the instinck o' an animal, like hinny by bees. We maun hain this Jug, sir; for there'll never be the marrow o't on this earth, were you to leave till the age o' Metusalem, and mak a jug every hour, till you become a Defunk.

NORTH.

Tolerable tippie.—Besides, James, how can Mr Moore pretend to lay down an essential distinction between the character of those men of genius, who are born to delight the circle in which they move, and to be at once good authors and good men, delightful poets and admirable husbands, and those who are born to win a crown of immortality as bards, and as Benedicts to go to the devil?

SHEPHERD.

Na. You may ask that wi' a pig's tail in your cheek.

NORTH.

With a pig's tail in my cheek! What is the meaning and origin, pray, of that expression?

SHEPHERD.

A pig's tail's a quod o' tobacco.

NORTH.

'Oh!—According to this creed, Poets born to delight their ch. cleomust always be trembling on the brink of marriage misery.

SHEPHERD.

And mony o' them tumble ower, even according to Mr Muir's ain theowem. For the difference—if there be ony—can only be a difference o' degree—Sae wha's safe?

NORTH.

Pope, it seems, once said, that to follow poetry, as one ought, "one must forget father and mother, and cleave to it alone." This was not very reverent in Pope, perhaps a little impious or so—at all events not a little self-conceited; but while it might be permitted to pass without blame, or even notice, among the many clever things so assiduously set down in Pope's letters, it must be treated otherwise when brought forward formally by a brother bard to corroborate a weak and worthless argument on the nature of genius and virtue, by which he would endeavour to prove that they are hostile and repugnant.

SHEPHERD.

I aye pity Pop.

NORTH.

In these few words is pointed out, says Mr Moore, "the sole path that leads genius to greatness. On such terms alone are the high places of fame to be won—nothing less than the sacrifice of the entire man can achieve them!"

SHEPHERD.

Sae to be a great poet, a man maun forget—bonny feedy forget—mind no in the scriptural sense, for o' that neither Pop nor Muir seem to hae had ony recollection, or aiblins they would hae qualified the observe, or omitted it—father and mother, sisters and brothers, freens and sweethearts, wife and weans, and then, after havin' obliteratit their verra names frae the tablets o' his memory, he is to set down and write a poem worthy an immortal crown! Oh the sinner! the pair, paltry, pitifu', contemptible, weak, worthless, shamefu', shameless, sowlless, heartless, unprincipled, and impious atheist o' a sinner, for to pretend, for the length o' time necessary to the mendin' the slit in the ueb o' his pen, to forget a' that—and be a—Poet.

NORTH.

James—James—James—be moderate——

SHEPHERD.

I'll no be moderate, sir. A' sorta o' moderation hae lang been ma abhorrence. I hate the verra word—and, for the year being, I aye dialike the minister that's the Moderator o' the General Assembly.

NORTH.

But be merciful on Mr Moore, James. Do not extinguish altogether the author of Lalla Rookh.

SHEPHERD.

I wadna extinguish, sir, the maist minute cretur in the shape o' a poet, that ever twinkled, like a wee bit tiny insect in the summer sun. I wad rather put ma haun' untill the fire, sir, than to claught a single ane o' the creatures in ma neeve, as aue might a butterfly wi' its beautifu' wings expanded, wavering or steadfast in the air or on a flower, and crush his mealy mottledness untill annihilation. Na—na—let the ble variegated ephemeral dance his day—his hour—shining in his ain colours and multifarious and so bonny blent, as if he had dropped doon alang wi' the laverock frae the rainbow.

NORTH.

What? Thomas Moore!

SHEPHERD.

I'm no speakin' the noo o' Tammas Muir—except by anither kind o' implication. Sin I wudna harm a hair on the gaudy wings o' an ephemeral, surely I wudna pu' a feather frae them o' ane o' the Immortals.

NORTH.

Beautiful—James.

SHEPHERD.

Mr Muir's a true poet, sir. But true poet though he be, he maunna be alloo'd to publish pernicious nonsense in prose about Poets and Poetry, without gettin't across the knuckles till baith his twa hauns be as numb as lead. Let you and me convict him o' nonsense by the Socratic method. Begin the Sorites, sir.

NORTH.

' The Sorites, James! A good Poet must be a good man—a great Poet must be a great man.

SHEPHERD.

Is the law universal in nature?

NORTH.

It is, and without exception. But sin steals o' storms its way into all human hearts—and then farewell to the grander achievements either of genius or virtue.

SHEPHERD.

A man canna imagine a' the highest and holiest affections o' the heart, without having felt them in the core—can he, sir?

NORTH.

No.

SHEPHERD.

A man, therefore, maun hae felt a' that man ought to feel, afore he——

NORTH.

Yes.

SHEPHERD.

Can what?

NORTH.

Can be enrolled among the

"Parbo digna locuti"

SHEPHERD.

But can a man who has ance enjoyed the holiest affection o' natu', in his ain heart, ever cease to cherish them in its inmost recesses?

NORTH.

Never.

SHEPHERD.

But is it possible to cherish them far apart, and aloot frae their natural objects?

NORTH.

Impossible.

SHEPHERD.

But can they be cherished, even amang their natural objects, without being brocht into active movement towards them, without cleaving to them, as you may see bees cleaving to the flowers as they keep sook, sookin' until their verra hearts?

NORTH.

They cannot.

SHEPHERD.

Then Mr Muir's dished. For collect a' thae premises, inferences, conclusions, admissions, axioms, propositions, corollaries, maxims, and apothegms intil ae GREAT TRUTH, and in it, beside a thousan' ithers, will be found this ane——

NORTH.

"The sacrifice o' the entire man is the sacrifice o' the entire poet."

SHEPHERD.

Or, in other words, the man withouten a human heart, humanly warmed by the human affections, may as weel think o' becoming a poet, as a docken a sun-flower. Mr Muir's dished.

NORTH.

Ma Moore forgets, that without the practice of virtue, virtue

"Languishes, grows dim, and dies;"

and that, without the indulgence of action, so do the highest and holiest feelings; so that the poet who neglects, disregards, shuns, or violates the duties of life, is forsaken of inspiration, and dies a suicide.

SHEPHERD..

Ony mair nonsense o' Mr Muir's ?

NORTH.

Lots.

SHEPHERD.

But what's that paper-ba' that you're aye keepin' rowin' atween your forefinger and your thoom :

NORTH.

Let me unroll it, and see—why, it's something quizzical.

SHEPHERD.

Fling't owre. Let's recete it.

A CHRISTMAS CAROL

IN HONOUR OF MAGA.

SUNG BY THE CONTRIBUTORS.

Noo—hearken till me—and I'll beat Mathews or Yates a' to sticks wi' my impersonations.

TICKLER.

When Kit North is dead,
What will Maga do, sir ?
She must go to bed,
And like him die too, sir !
Fal de ral, de ral,
Iram coram dago ;
Fal de ral, de ral,
Here's success to Maga !

a Timothy depicteth the consequences of North's death to Maga.

Chorus, in which the whole company joineth.

SHEPHERD.

When death has them flat,
I'll stitch on my weepers,
Put crape around my hat,
And a napkin to my peepers !
Fal de ral, de ral, &c.

The Shepherd waxeth melancholy, and wipeth his sky-eghts.

NORTH.

Your words go to my heart,
I hear the death-owl flying,
I feel death's fatal dart—
By jingo, I am dying !
Fal de ral, de ral, &c.

North apprehendeth death, and falleth down in a swoon.

COLONEL O'SHAUGHNESSY.

See him, how he lies
Flat as any flounder !
Blow me ! smoke his eyes—
Death ne'er closed eyes sounder !
Fal de ral, de ral, &c.

The Colonel describeth the appearance of Kit.

DELTA.

Yet he can't be dead ;
For he is immortal,
And to receive his head
Earth would not ope its portal !
Fal de ral, de ral, &c.

Delta declareth him immortal.

ODOBERTY.

Kit will never die;
That I take for saytain!
Death "is all my eye"—
An't it, Betty Martin?
Fal de ral, de ral, &c.

Odoberthy declareth leath to be all in his eye.

MODERN PYTHAGOREAN.

Suppose we feel his arm—
Zounds! I never felt a Human pulse more firm;
What's your opinion, Delta?
Fal de ral, de ral, &c.

The Pythagorean
feeleth his pulse,
and giveth a favourable prognosis.

CHARLES LAMB.

Kit, I hope you're well,
Up, and join our ditty;
To lose such a fine old fel-Low would be a pity!
Fal de ral, de ral, &c.

Charles hopeth Kit is well, and adviseth him to get up and sing.

NORTH.

Let's resume our booze,
And tiddle while we're able,
I've had a bit of a snooze,
And feel quite comfortable!
Fal de ral, de ral, &c.

North awaketh
from his swoon,
and singeth.

MULLION.

Be he who he may,
Sultan, Czar, or Aga,
Let him soak his clay
To the health of Kit and Maga!
Fal de ral, de ral, &c.

Mullion adviseth
all men to drink to Kit and Maga.

OPHIUM-EATER.

Search all the world around,
From Greenland to Malaga,
And nowhere will be found
A magazine like Maga!
Fal de ral, de ral,
Iram coram dago;
Fal de ral, de ral,
Here's success to Maga!

The Opium Eater declareth Maga to be matchless.

NORTH.

Admirable impersonations! The faculty of imitation always belongs, in excess, to original minds.

SHEPHERD.

Does't?

NORTH.

Mimicry is the farthest thing in the wide world from imitation.

SHEPHERD.

Na. No the farthest thing in the wide world, sir, but I cheerfully grant that a man may be a mere mime and nae imitawtor. I'm baith.

NORTH.

And besides, an original.

SHEPHERD.

At Mister Muir again, sir, tooth and nail!

NORTH.

"The very habits of abstraction and self-study, to which the occupations of men of genius lead, are in themselves necessarily of an unsocial and detaching tendency, and require a large portion of allowance and tolerance not to be set down as unamiable." So argueth Mr Moore, and that is another reason why men of genius are not "fitted for the calm affections and comforts that form the cement of domestic life."

SHEPHERD.

I houp, sir, there's no muckle truth in that, although it souns like a sort o' vague pheelosophy. Demolish't.

NORTH.

The habits of abstraction and self-study, of which Mr Moore here speaks, are those of the poet. Now, so far from being, in themselves, necessarily of an unsocial and detaching tendency, they are pervaded by sympathy with all that breathes, and were that sympathy to die, so would the abstraction and self-study of the poet. True, that they seek and need seclusion from cark and care; and sometimes—say often—even from the common ongoing of domestic life. But what then? Do not all professions and pursuits in this life do the same?

SHEPHERD.

Aye, ye may weel ask that! A lawyer routin' hours every day at the bar, and then dictatin' papers or opinions a' afternoon, evening, and night, on to past his natural bed-time—are his habits, pray, "better fitted for the calm affections and comforts that form the cement of domestic life," than them that's natural to the poet?

NORTH.

I should think not, James. They are very different from those of the poet—but much more disagreeable, and requiring, again to use Mr Moore's words, a large "portion of allowance and tolerance not to be set down as unamiable."

SHEPHERD.

Yet amais't a' the lawyers I ken in the Parliament House are excellent domestic characters,—that is to say, far frae being the dour deevils you wad suppose aforehaun' frae hearin' them gullorin' at the bar, and sitin' on ane another like sae mony randies. Gin they can sling aff the growl wi' the gown, and frae lawyers become men, mayna poets far mair easily and successfu'ly do the same?

NORTH.

I undoubtedly, James. You might instance, in like manner, physicians and clergy men—

SHEPHERD.

Aye, the classes that profess to tak especial care o' our twa pairts, the body and the sowle. Hoo profoun' sir, oucht to be their self-study, and their study o' ither folk! Physicians, ane might think, seein' folk dyin' nicht and day, in a manner o' agonies, and being accustomed to pocket fees by the death-bed-side, would become, in the core o' their hearts, as callous as cuss-tocks; and I shall na say that some o' them do not—

NORTH.

Most eminent physicians are good men; and, what is better, pleasant men—

SHEPHERD.

What? Is't better to be pleasant than good?

NORTH.

Yes, James, for our present argument. According to Mr Moore, they, too, ought "to require a larger portion of allowance and tolerance, not to be set down as unamiable."

SHEPHERD.

Then the clergy, again, were they to devote theirsells, tooth and nail, to their manifold duties, ane might argue that they wou'd hae time neither to sleep nor eat, nor attend to the ither common comforts and affections that form the cement of domestic life. Yet the clergy are far frae being a very immoral, irreligious, or home-hating class of people; and manes are amazingly crowded wi' weans, sir, on the verra sma'est steepens—

NORTH.

Why, certainly, according to Mr Moore's argument, a deep divine, engaged on some great theological work, would make but an indifferent husband. But look at him, James—yes, look at our Dr Wodrow——

SHEPHERD.

And look, I beseech you, at his pew o' weans.

NORTH.

'All the most distinguished poets of the age in Britain, are either middle-aged, or elderly, or old gentlemen. They are, therefore, not at all dangerous, personally, to the fair sex—Cupid sneers at them—Venus jeers—and Hymen weeps, like a crocodile, with his hands in his breeches pockets.

SHEPHERD.

Haw! haw! haw!

NORTH.

Breathe the tender passion as they may, not a young lady in the land who would not prefer to the best of them, any undeformed ensign in a marching regiment, either of the foot or the dragoons.

SHEPHERD.

The sex has been aye desperate fond o' the army.

NORTH.

It is fortunate for some of the old bards that they have wives. Crabbe, Bowles, Wordsworth, Southey, Moore, and others—four-score—threescore-and-ten—and threescore—have long been happily provided with that leading article. So are Milman and Barry Cornwall, and most of "the rest" between forty and fifty; two or three are widowers—and the remainder likely to remain bachelors for life. Not a female bosom beats, with a pulsation worthy the name of beating, at this moment, for any British bard.

SHEPHERD.

I'm no sae sure o' that, sir. But prate awa'.

NORTH.

The sex regard all the bachelors as so many old foggies—as so many uncles; and the idea would be too much for the gravity of any of the demigods, of the celebration of her marriage rites with the prettiest and most popular poet, seeing that he is aged, either by a lusher or a blacksmith.

SHEPHERD.

Prate awa', sir—prate awa'.

NORTH.

The truth is, that, in modern times at least, poets, whatever their time of life, have been held rather cheap by the fair sex. I suspect it was the same in the ancient world—and in the days of chivalry and romance, singing certainly was less esteemed by young ladies than fighting, and a poet with his pen had no chance whatever against a knight with his lance.

SHEPHERD.

Prate awa', sir—prate awa'.

NORTH.

There are reasons for all this lying deep in human nature.

SHEPHERD.

Lying deep in human nature! Doon wi' the bucket, and then roun' wi' the windlass, and up wi't again fu' o' the clear waters frae the well o' truth.

NORTH.

Making love, and making love-esses, are two of the most different things in the world; and I doubt if both accomplishments were ever found highly united in the same gifted individual. Few Irishmen, in the first, excel Tom Moore; in the second, millions. Lord Byron, in lyrical measures, was a formidable wooer; but in plain matter-of-fact courtship, he had to stoop his anointed head to Corporal Carey.

SHEPHERD.

Wha was he?

NORTH.

Apollo himself, god though he was of light, and music, and medicine, setting aside two or three trivial amours, was a harmless sort of a body; while there were other deities who could not have tagged together two rhymes, before whom goddesses and nymphs fell flat as flounders.

SHEPHERD.

Prate awa', sir—prate awa'.

NORTH.

Inspiration, in short, is of little avail either to gods or men in the most interesting affairs of life—those of the heart. To push your way in them, there is nothing, in the long run, like good plain prose. Now, though it must be granted, that, in much that passes for poetry, there is no inconsiderable mixture of that useful commodity, yet it is so diluted as no longer to be strong drink; and repeated doses of it administered to a maiden in the shade, fail to produce the desired effect—the intoxication of love. The pretty dear seems to sip the philtre kindly; and the poet doubts not that she is about to fall into his arms. But she merely and next morning, perhaps, is off before breakfast in a chaise-and-four to Gretna Green, with an aid-de-camp of Wellington, as destitute of imagination as his master.

SHEPHERD.

Prate awa', sir—prate awa'.

NORTH.

If such have been often the fate even of young bards—and Sir Walter, with his usual knowledge of human nature, has charmingly illustrated it in the story of Wilford—how much more to be pitied must they be, who have served the Muses, till the crow-feet are blackening below their eyes, and who are labouring under symptoms, not to be concealed, of incipient pot-bellies.

SHEPHERD.

Let's return to the snashin' o' Mister Muir.

NORTH.

There is no need to knock the nail on the head any longer with our sledge-hammers, James. Yet I cannot help expressing my wonder at the confusion of Mr Moore's ideas, as well as at the weakness of his arguments. He wishes to prove, that “men of the higher order of genius” are seldom good domestic characters; and yet he buddles and jumbles them all together,—poets, philosophers, and so forth,—making his reasoning the most miscellaneous and heterogeneous hotch-potch that ever was set down on a table.

SHEPHERD.

Are you dune wi' cuttin' him up, or only gauw to begin?

NORTH.

I am somewhere about the middle, James.

SHEPHERD.

Ony mair bear-paws in the house, think ye, Sir?

NORTH.

To prove that men of the higher order of genius—no matter what kind—are unfitted for the calm affections and comforts that form the cement of domestic life, Mr Moore observes, that “one of the chief causes of sympathy and society between ordinary mortals being their dependence on each other's intellectual resources, the operation of this social principle must naturally be weakened in those whose own mental stores are most abundant and self-sufficing, and who, rich in such materials for thinking within themselves, are rendered so far independent of the external world.”

SHEPHERD.

Would you repeat that again, sir, for it sounds aw sonorus, that the words droun the ideas? 'Tis like the murmur o' a bit waterfa', or a hive o' bees, which the indolent mind loves to listen to, and at times amaisit deludes itself intil the belief that there's a meanin' in the murmur—as if the stream so-leeloqueezed and the insects de-alogueezed wisdom in the desert. Would you repeat that again, sir?

NORTH.

Be shot if I do. Why, James, all that is—

SHEPHERD.

Drivel. Dungeons o' learning there are—leevin' dungeons o' dead learning—in wham the operation o' the social principle is weak indeed—less than the life that's in a mussel. The servant lass has to gang in upon him in his study, and rug him aff his chair by the cuff o' the neck, when the kail's on the table, and the family hae gien the first preliminary flourish o' the horn-spoons.

NORTH.

Picture drawn from the life.

SHEPHERD.

Aiblins. But "men o' the higher order o' genius," sir, I manteen, are in general impatient o' solitude, though dearly do they love it; and sae far frae their mental stores being abundant and self-sufficing, why, the mair abundant they are, the less are they self-sufficing; for the owners, "rich in such materials for thinking within themselves," would think and feel that they were in a worse condition than that o' the maist abject poverty and pauperism, gin they werena driven by a sense and an instinct, fierce and furious often as a fiver, to pour their pearls, and their jewels, and their diamonds, and their gold and silver, out in great glitterin' heaps afore the astonished, startled, and dazed een o' their fellow-creatures less prodigally endowed by nature, and then wi' a strange mixture o' pride and humbleness, to mark the sudden effect on the gazers,—inwardly exclaiming, "I did it!"

NORTH.

Did what?

SHEPHERD.

Why, by inspiring them with a sense of beauty, elevated their haill moral and intellectual being, and enabled their fellow-creatures to see farther into their ain hearts, and into the heart o' the haill creation!

NORTH.

Good, James, good. But to pitch our conversation on a lower key, allow me to say, that "thinking within themselves," when too long pursued, is of all employments the most wearisome and barren to which men can have recourse—and that "men of the higher order of genius," knowing that well, so far from feeling that they "are independent of the external world," draw thence their daily bread, and their daily water, without which their souls would speedily perish of inanition.

SHEPHERD.

Ca' ye that pitchin' your tawk on a laigh key? It's at the tap o' the gawmut.

NORTH.

The materials for thinking within ourselves are gathered from without; in the gathering, we have enjoyed all varieties of delight; and is it to be thought that the gardens where these flowers grew, and still are growing, are to be forsaken by us, after we have, during a certain number of seasons, culled ga. lands wherewith to adorn our foreheads, or plucked fruit wherewith to sustain and refresh our souls?

SHEPHERD.

Ca' ye that pitchin' your tawk on a laigh key, sir? It's at the tap o' the gawmut.

NORTH.

No, James—Men of the higher order of genius never long forsake the Life-Region, and is not its great Central Shrine, James, the Hearth? The soul that worships not there, my dear Shepherd—and true worship cannot be unfrequent, but is perennial, because from a source that the dew of heaven will not let run dry—will falter, fail, and faint in the midst of its song, and will know, ere that truth invades, one after another, its many chambers, that the wing that soareth highest in the sun, must have slowly waxed in the shade—

SHEPHERD.

Ca' ye that pitchin' your tawk on a laigh key? It's at the tap o' the gawmut.

NORTH.

That the Bird of Jove, sun-starer and cloud-cleaver though he be—

Storm-lover——

SHEPHERD.

NORTH.

Glorying in the storm, and enamoured of the tempest——

SHEPHERD.

Yet is happy to sink down frae heaven, and fauld up his magnificent wings at the edge o' his eery, fond o' the twa unfledged cannibals sleepin' wi' fu' stammachs there, cozy in the middle o' a mighty nest, twenty feet in circumference, and covering the hail platform o' the tap o' the cliff, aye, as fond, sir, though I alloo a hantle fiercer, as ony cushy-doo on her slight and slender "procreant cradle,"—you can see through't, ye ken, sir, frae below, and discern whether she hae eggs or young aunes,—in the green gloom o' some auld pine central in the forest.

NORTH.

Yes, James, all great poets are great talkers——

SHEPHERD.

Tiresome aften to a degree—though sometimes, I grant to Mr Muir, that they are a sulky set, and as gruffly and grimly silent as if they had the toothache, or something the matter wi' their inside. Far be it frae me to deny, that "men o' the higher order o' genius" are aften disagreeable deevils. They maun aften be a sair fash to their wives and their weans—and calm a the poet's cottage looks, upon the hill or in the dell, mony a rippet is there, sir, beyond the power o' the imagination o' ony mere prosier to conceive. Oh, aye, sir ' mony a fearfu' rippet, in which, whether appellant or respondent, defender or pursuer, the "man o' the higher order o' genius" wishes, wi' tears in the red een o' him, no that his wife and weans were a' dead and buried—for nae provocation in their power can drive the distractit fallow to that—but that he himsell had never been kittled, or, if kittled, instead o' hae'n been laid in the cradle by Apollo, and tended on by the Muses—nine nurses, and nae less—which o' them wat and which o' them dry it's no easy for me at this distance o' time to remember—he had been soockled like ither honest men's bairns, at the breast o' his nain mither, had shewn me pœcorious genius in his leading strings,—but, blessed lot! had died booby o' the lowest form, and been buried among the sabs o' a' that ever saw him, a wee senseless sump, as stupid as a piggie, yet as happy as a lamb!

NORTH.

Hee! hee! hee! James!

SHEPHERD.

But what then?

NORTH.

Yes, James, what then?

SHEPHERD.

Eh?

NORTH.

Hem!

SHEPHERD.

Aye, clear your throttle. You've gotten a vile crinklin' cough, sir,—a short, kirk-yard cough, sir—a wheezy host, sir—an asthmatic——

NORTH.

Poo! It has teased me a little for these last fifty years——

SHEPHERD.

What? Hae ye carried a spale-box o' lozenges since the aughty? Recover your wund, sir—while I chant a stave.

KING WILLIE.

O, Willie was a wanton wag,
The blithest lad that e'er I saw;
He 'mong the lasses bure the brag,
An' carried aye the gree awa'.

An' was nae Willie weel worth goud?
 When seas did rowe an' winds did blaw,
 An' battle's deadly stoure was blent,
 He fought the foremost o' them a'.

Wha has nae heard o' Willie's fame,
 The rose o' Britain's topmast bough,
 Wha never stain'd his gallant name,
 Nor turn'd his back on friend or foe.
 An' he could tak a rantin' glass,
 An' he could chant a cheery strain,
 An' he could kiss a bonny lass,
 An' aye be welcome back again.

Though now he wears the British crown—
 For whilk he never cared a flea—
 Yet still the downright honest tar,
 The same kind-hearted chield is he.
 An' every night I fill my glass—
 An' fill it reaming to the brim,
 An' drink it in a glowing health
 To Adie Laidlaw an' to him.

I've ae advice to gie my King,
 An' that I'll gie wi' right good-will,
 Stick by the auld friends o' the crown,
 Wha bore it up through good an' ill:
 For new-made friends, an' new-made laws,
 They suit nae honest hearts ava;
 An' Royal Willie's worth I'll sing
 As lang as I hae breath to draw.

NORTH.

Spirited. Who is Adie Laidlaw?

SHEPHERD.

Queen Adelaide—a familiar title o' endearment the Queen enjoys in the Forest.

NORTH.

But what say you to the last stanza—now, James?

SHEPHERD.

Wait a while—sir.

NORTH.

I am delighted to hear that Mr Blackwood is about to publish a volume of your Inimitable Songs. 'Twill be universally popular, my dear James—and must be followed up by a second in spring. The wing of your lyrical ~~snare~~ never flags, whether she skim the gowans or brush the clouds. The shade of Burns himself might say to the Shepherd, "Thengie's your hand, my trusty feer," for, of all the song-writers of Scotland, you two are the best—though Allan Cunningham treads close upon your heels—and often is privileged to form a trio—such a trio of peasant bards as may challenge the whole world.

SHEPHERD.

Your haun, sir. I cou'd amais't greet.

NORTH.

But it is the "cultivation and exercise of the imaginative faculty," quoth Mr Moore, "that, more than any thing else, tends to wean the man of genius from actual life, and by substituting the sensibilities of the imagination for those of the heart, to render, at last, the medium through which he feels no less unreal than that through which he thinks. Those images of ideal good and beauty that surround him in his musings, soon accustom him to consider all that is beneath this high standard unworthy of his care; till, at length, the heart becoming chilled, in proportion as he has refined and elevated his theory of all the social affections, he has unfitted himself for the practice of them." Such are the ipsissima verba of Mr Moore, James.

SHEPHERD.

I'm nae great reader o' byenicks, sir, as you weel ken, and, I believe, dinna disapprove, yet mony's the time and aft that I've lauched to peruse that apogtheum.

NORTH.

If not a "wise saw," perhaps 'tis a "modern instance."

SHEPHERD.

Mr North, if Mr Muir was sittin' on that empty chair there, wi' the laddie kissin' the lassie embroidered on the inside o' the back o't—Patie and Roger, I juloose—I would just say till him, wi' a plesant vice, and kind een, and a lauch about my mouth,—Mister Muir, you're under a great mistak. Nae man o' a high order o' mind, either thinks or feels through "an unreal medium." But I'll tell you, sir, what he does—he thinks and feels through a fine medium. He breathes the pure air o' the mountain-top—and he sees through the clear an' a' the dwellins o' man—and richt through their roofs untill their hearths and their hearts. Did Burns feel and think through an unreal medium, Mister Muir, when,

"In glory and in joy,

Following his plough upon the mountain-side,"

his soul saw the Cottar's Saturday Night, and in words gave the vision imperishable life :

NORTH.

James—

"You are attired

With sudden brightness, like a man inspired."

SHEPHERD.

Na, na—'tis but the glow o' the fire on ma face. Yet ma heart's a' on a low—for as sure as God is in heaven, and that he has gien us his word on earth, that Picture is a Picture of the Truth, and Burns, in drawing it, saw, felt, and thoct through that real medium, in which alone all that is fairest, lovebest, briestest, best in creation, is made apparent to the eyes o' genius, or permanent in its immortal works.

NORTH.

Ca' ye that itchin' your tawt on a laigh key? 'Tis at the tap o' the gawmut.

SHEPHERD.

Hoo can you, Mister Muir, sit there and tell me that men o' a high order o' mind sune get ene enamoured o' the eemages o' ideal good and beauty, that they consider all that is beneath that standard unworthy o' their care? Let me come owre and sit beside you for a few minutes. There, dinna be feared—I'm no a grain angry—and I'm sittin', you see, my dear sir, wi' my airm owre the back o' your chair.

NORTH.

Don't press so close upon Mr Moore, James—

SHEPHERD.

Mister Muir's makin' nae compliments, sir.—It is "men o' a laigh order o' genius," ma freen, that is subject to sic degeneracy and adulteration. A puny, sickly sensibility there is, which is averse frae all the realities of life; and Byron or somebody else spoke well when he said that Sterne preferred whining owre a dead ass to reliev'ing a living mother! But wha was Sterne? As shallow a sentimentalist as ever grat—or rather tried to greet. O, sir! but it's a degrawdin' sight to humanity, yon—to see the shufflin' sinner tryin' to bring the tears intill his een, by rubbin' the lids wi' the pint o' his pen, or wi' the feathers on the shank, and when it a' winna do, takin' refuge in a blank, sae —, or hidin' his head amang a set o' asterisks, sae * * * * ; or boltin' aff the printed page a'thegither, and disappearin' in a black blotch!

NORTH.

Sterne had genius, James.

SHEPHERD.

No ae grain, sir.

NORTH.

Some—not a little——

SHEPHERD.

‘Weel, weel—be it sae—a’ that I mean to aver, is, that had he been “o’ the first order o’ minds,” he would not hae preferred whining owre a dead ass to relieving a living mother; but if news had been suddenly brocht to him that his mother was ill, he wad hae hired a livin’ horse, and aff to her house like a flash o’ lichtning, slingin’ himsell oot o’ the saddle to the danger o’ his neck, up stairs to her bedside, and doon upon his knees, beseeching God for her recovery, and willing to die for her sake, so that she who gave him birth might yet live, nor be taken from the licht of day and buried among the tombs!

NORTH.

Don’t press, my dear James, so heavily on Mr Moore’s shoulder.

SHEPHERD.

Mister Muir’s makin’ nae compliments.—There’s ma sell, sirs—I shanna pretend to say whether I’m a man o’ the higher order o’ genius or no; but——

NORTH.

Yes, James, you are; for you wrote Kilmeny.

SHEPHERD.

But if I haena ten thousand times the quantity o’ genius that ever Sterne had, may this be the last jug, sirs, that ever we three drink thegither——

NORTH.

Shades of my Uncle Toby and Corporal Trim!

SHEPHERD.

Fantastic phantoms!

NORTH.

Why, James, your voice trembles with emotion. You are not the man, my boy, to whine over a dead ass; but you are the man, my boy, to be pensive over the very fear, however unfounded, of an empty jug—so I may replenish?

SHEPHERD.

Do sae.—I am surrounded in my musings—to use your ain words, Mister Muir—with images o’ ideal good and beauty; and, at times, when lyin’ on the greenward in the heart o’ the Forest, a sweet strange perplexity has it been to the Shepherd, sirs, to determine within the consciousness o’ his ain sowle, whether the bonny creatures that seemed to come to him in solitude, were creatures o’ this earth or no—and if o’ this earth, then whether they were all but Fancy’s phantoms, or beings that had their abiding-place in heaven, and cam o’ their ain accord; or were sent to wave peace into my wearied spirit frae the white motions o’ their arms celestial in their whiteness as the blue lights of love and pity, that bathed in ineffable beautiful ness the steadfast expression of their angelic eyes!

NORTH.

My dear James!

SHEPHERD.

But did these visitations accustom me, sir,—I’m speakin’ to you, Mister Muir,—to consider a’ else unworthy o’ my care? Na, na, na. I appeal to you, Mr North, for you hae seen me and the auld man thegither there, gin I didna return back to my ain hut, anxious as ever about my father, who used then to sit warmin’ himsell at the bit ingle, stricken in years, though far frae frail yet, and aften glowerin’ at me wi’ that gash kind o’ face that somehow or ither in verra auld folk carries ane’s thoughts at ance to their coffin and their grave—as anxious about him as if the breathin’ o’ genie had never visited the Shepherd on the hill, and I had been only a mere common ordinar prose-hash o’ a chiel, whose heichest explite in leetatur had been a rejected agricultural report to the Kelso Mail, on the fly in turnips, or the smut in wheat.

NORTH.

You tended the old man most fithally, James, till the last sugh—

SHEPHERD.

Nor did I forget ma mither either, sir; though, thank God, she never needed but sma' assistance frae me, for "poortith cauld" was never her lot, sir, though the necessaries o' life were a' she ever had,—and as for its luxuries—gin you except a dish o' strang tea, and noo and than a whiff o' bacca—for she was nae regular smoker—she had a speerit abune them a', sir; and had the deevil tempted her even in a dream, when sometimes ane's sowle seems to lose its nature, wi' the shadows o' a' the eatables and drinkables that his wild warlockry cou'd hae conjured up, hoo she wou'd hae strauchened hersell up to her haillicht, and, wi' a smile far prooder and sterner than his ain froon, hae sent Satan and a' his visionary viands awa' back to the regions o' everlastin' dolour and despair.

NORTH.

She was a stately old lady.

SHEPHERD.

Wha was?

NORTH.

Your mother.

SHEPHERD.

Wha was speakin' about ma mither?

NORTH.

Why, yourself, James.

SHEPHERD.

Ou aye, sae I was. But my imagination, sir, a' at ance wafted me awa' intil the laneliest spat amang a' the hills whare my childhood played—and amang the broom-bushes and the brackens there, I was beginnin', when you reca'd me by that rap on the table, to sink awa' back again intil the dream o' dreams!

NORTH.

The dream o' dreams?

SHEPHERD.

Aye, sir—The dream, sir, in which I saw Kilmeny! For though I wrott doon the poem on the slate in the prime o' manhood, anither being than mysell did in verity compose or creawte it, sir, ae day when I was lying a' by mysell in that laneliest spat, wi' but twa-three sheep aside me, ae linty and nae mair; but oh! how sweetly the glad cretur sang! and after that some other cretur nor me had composed or creawted it, she keepit whisper, whisperin' the words far within my ears, till memory learned them a' off by heart as easy as the names o' christian creturs ~~that~~ we meet wi' on Sabbath at the kirk; and frae that ~~ganie~~ haunted hour, known now through a' braid Scotland is the Ettrick Shepherd—

NORTH.

Britain and America—

SHEPHERD.

But for many obscure years a' nameless man, or kent but by the name o' Jamie amang my simple compeers, I carried bonny Kilmeny for ever in the arms o' my heart, kissin' her shut eenowhan she sleepit, and her lips as cawm as the lips o' death, but as sweet as them o' an undying angel!

NORTH.

And such was the origin of the finest Pastoral Lyric in our tongue!

SHEPHERD.

Sic indeed, sir, was its origip. For my sowle, ye see, sir, had fa'n into a kind o' inspired dwawm—and the Green Leddy o' the Forest, nae less than the Fairy Queen hersell, had stawn out frae the land o' peace on my slumber; and she ~~it~~ was that stooped down, and wi' her ain lily-haun shed-ding frae my forehead the yellow hair, left a kiss upon my temples, just where the organ o' Imagination or Ideality lies; and at the touch arose the vision in which

"Bonny Kilmeny gned up the glen," and frae which you, sir, in your freendship say, that I becam aue o' the Immortals.

NORTH.

'The moral of the tale?

SHEPHERD.

The moral o' the tale is this—that never was I sae happy in my parent's hoose as I was that night—that Saturday night. Thae images o' ideal goodness and beauty had saftened a' ma heart—and sae far frae my heart becoming chilled as my fancy warmed, as you, Mr Muir, aver is the case, I sat as mute as a mouse by the ingle, thinkin' on my father and mither, and brithers and sisters, and on the possible force o' affection in filial and parental hearts, till I could ha' dee'd for ony o' them; but since there was nae need o' that, I took a silent oath that I wou'd behave mysell weel in life, that the hearts o' ma twa' parents might sing aloud for joy, and that I wou'd work hard at ony manner o' wark my maister chose to set me—auld Mr Laidlaw—that I might in time mak up a sma' pose again' the day o' their auld age, and see that nae ither snaws than what Time draps frae his frosty fingers shou'd ever let ae single flake fa' on their unsheltered heads.

NORTH.

And that oath you devoutly kept, James.

SHEPHERD.

Ma "theory, at least, o' the social affections, was never sae refined and elevated as to unfit me for the practice o' them;" and yet I shou'd be doing injustice to the spirit within me, to the spirit that breathed in the bosoms of Thomson, and Ramsay, and Burns,—to the spirit that reigns a' owre Scotland, and hath its holy altars at this day in ilka hut and ilka shieling, did I fear to say, I—even I—have refined and elevated my theory of all the social affections far beyond the reach o' sic a meeserable deevil as Lowry Sterne; and that if people will whine owre dead asses, and neglect living mothers, the blame maun be attributed no to a refined and elevated theory o' the social affections; for I defy ony theory beneath the skies to be mair refined and elevated than is the practice o' the Christian, or imagination to conceive thochts or feelings half as beautifu' or shooblime as thousands that the real agonies o' life, be they agonies o' woe or bliss, send into men's hearts, driving like hurricanes, or breathe them like the hush o' some lown place. Think o' the speerit o' a son or a father ca'd upon by nature to do his duty on some great emergency—think, sir, on his haen done it—and done it because he knew it was well-pleasing to God—and then shew me, sir, any theory o' the social affections so high and so refined, that the mind wou'd feel a fall frae it, if required to ack in the light and glow o' common humanity?

NORTH.

Mr Moore seems, by his mild-looking silence, James, to acquiesce—

SHEPHERD.

Do you acquiesce, Mr Muir?—Weel, a god's eneuch.

NORTH.

But Mr Moore, James, says, "that not only is the necessity of commerce with other minds less felt by such persons—(the men of a higher order of genius)—but, from that fastidiousness which the opulence of their own resources generates, the society of those less gifted with intellectual means than themselves, becomes often a restraint and burden, to which not all the charms of friendship, or even love, can reconcile them."

SHEPHERD.

What? He wou'd indeed be a pretty fallow, wha, in opulence o' his ain resources, fand a fastidiousness generated within him, towards his aweet-heart!—because, forsooth, the benny lassie was less "gifted w' intellectual means!" That wou'd be rather philosophical, or rather pragmatikal or pedantic, than poetical; and a girl wou'd need to be a great gawpus indeed, provided she was modest, and loving, and handsome, and weel-faured—and a poet's mistress must be endowed wi' sic qualities—afore a man o' the higher order o' genius wou'd feel fastidious to Fanny. Dinna you think sae, sir?

NORTH.

I do. Nay, I believe, that, were a true poet to marry an idiot, 'tis a thousand to one that he would never find it out.

SHEPHERD.

Just as wi' a dowdy.

NORTH.

Precisely.

SHEPHERD.

The idiot would, in his eyes, be a Minerva, fresh frae the brain o' Jove——

NORTH.

Lempriere!

SHEPHERD.

—— and the dowdy, a Venus attired by the Graces.

NORTH.

"Men of a high order of genius" are not unfrequently fastidious in the formation of their friendships. They are privileged to be so; but their friendships, when once formed with congenial spirits, though perhaps less gifted, are imperishable—and they are sacred, far beyond the conception of vulgar souls.

SHEPHERD.

What do you mean by vulgar souls, sir?

NORTH.

Not the souls of shepherds, James, but of Bagmen.

SHEPHERD.

Aneuch.

NORTH.

And what more common than friendships between men of transcendent genius, and men of no genius at all!

"Worth (not wit) makes the man—the want of it the fellow;"

and before the power of Virtue, Genius loves to stand, not rebuked, for haply there was no occasion for rebuke, but in abasement of spirit, and reverence of her who is a seraph.

SHEPHERD.

A' orders o' minds mingle naturally, and o' their ain accord; and life woudna possess that delightfully variegated character that is noo sae charmin', gin ilka class keepit aloof by itself, and trusted to itself for a' its enjoyment o' this world.

NORTH.

Proceed to paint the inevitable results of any opposite system.

SHEPHERD.

Suppose poets, for example, and o' poets we're speakin', s' flocked thegither——

NORTH.

On pretence of being birds of the same feather.

SHEPHERD.

——For a while they would a' luk unco bonny in the sunshine, sitting thegither on "some heaven-kissing hill," and assistin' ane anither to sort their plummage, till it purpled wi' many-shifitin' colours in the eye o' day, and seemed to set their necks and their wings on fire.

NORTH.

"But ere the second Sunday came"——

SHEPHERD.

——The knowe would be a' covered wi' bluidy feathers, as if there had been foughten there a Welsh main o' cocks! Some o' the poets would be seen sittin' on their doupes, wi' their een picket oot, and yet, like true ggemms, dartin' their nebs round' aboot on a' sides, in houns o' sinnin' a foe. Others o' them wou'd be aff and awa, whurr, ower the back o' beyont, and there venturin' to raise an occasional craw on their new domain. And ane, obnoxious to a' the rest, would be lyin' battered to bits, stane-dead. So much air, for birds o' a feather flocking thegither—when thae birds happened to be poets.

NORTH.

Whereas, by the economy of nature, "poets and all other men of the higher order of genius" are sprinkled over society, and all their ongoings intermingled with those of the children of the common clay. And thus "poets and men of the higher order of genius" are made to submit or to conform to the usages of this world, and its ordinary laws, or, if they do not, they soon are made to feel that they are ridiculous, and that genius is never less respected than when it chooses to wear a cap and bells.

SHEPHERD.

Anither skreed.

NORTH.

Mr Moore, towards the close of his disquisition, says, "that if the portrait he has attempted of those gifted with high genius, be allowed to bear, in any of its features, a resemblance to the originals, it can no longer be matter of question whether a class, so set apart from the track of ordinary life, so removed, by their very elevation, out of the influences of our common atmosphere, are at all likely to furnish tractable subjects for that most trying of all social experiments—matrimony."

SHEPHERD.

I dinna like the soun' o' that sentence.

NORTH.

Nor I, James. In the first place, the portrait may bear, "in some of its features, a resemblance to the originals," and yet the question started by Mr Moore, by no means be pfit to sleep.

SHEPHERD.

His logic's oot at the elbows.

NORTH.

Secondly, Mr Moore has utterly failed in shewing, that the class he speaks of, are set apart from the track of ordinary life, and removed, by their very elevation, out of the influences of our common atmosphere.

SHEPHERD.

And you, sir, have utterly succeeded in pravin' the very contrar.

NORTH.

Thirdly, there is a Cockneyish and Bagman-like vulgarity in the would-be fashionable slang-whangishness of the terms, "at all likely to furnish subjects for that most trying of all social experiments—matrimony."

SHEPHERD.

Hoo the deevil, Mr Muir, can ye, wi' ony semblance o' sense ava, man, ca' that the maist tryin' o' a "social experiments," which is, has been, and will be, performing by all men and women in the "varsal world," with the exception of a few fools or unfortunates, called bachelors and old maids, frae the beginning till the end o' time—frae Milton's First Man, to Campbell's Last?

NORTH.

Why, really, James, Mr Moore here speaks of matrimony in the style of a sentimental farce-writer for the Cobourg Theatre. (Observe what a silly look the word "matrimony" wears, and how like minnies the "men of the higher order of genius" kythe on being brought forward by Hymen, in a string, and kicking and flinging out unlike "tractable subjects.")

SHEPHERD.

The haill discussion grows ludicrous on reflection, and an air o' insincerity, almost o' banter, Mr Muir, at last plays owre your features, as if you were bammin' the public;—but the public's no sae easy bammed, sir, and imperiously demands "a wise and learned spirit" in him who takes it upon him to prove that the holiest o' a' God and Natur's ordinances, is no suited to men o' the higher order o' genius, wha sou'd be a' monks and celibates, sae fastidious necessarily are they alike in freenship and love! Ony mair havers?

NORTH.

A few.

SHEPHERD.

Say awa', for ony thing's better nor politiks—and I'm gratefu' to you for keepin' aff them the nicht.

NORTH.

Politics! I had forgotten there was such a thing in all the wide world. But here is a bit of poetical politics, by a young friend of mine, James—a promising youth, of the right kidney—and who, I doubt not, will one day or other do honour to an honourable name. My young friend informs me that the lines are written by one, who, without positively condemning the late French Revolution, cannot bestow upon it that unqualified approbation which many wish it to receive,—much less can justify those in our own country, who, while they profess themselves friendly to the constitution, take advantage of the late transactions in France for the purpose of inflaming the minds of an ignorant populace, and actually wear the Tri-color—the acknowledged badge of revolution.

THE TRI-COLOR.

Again o'er the vine-cover'd regions of France,
 "See the day-star of Liberty rise!"
 The plaudits of nations shall hail its advance
 To its own native place in the skies.
 O'er her patriot legions behold—as of yore—
 The Tri-color banner unfurled;
 'Tis the banner whose glory Napoleon bore
 To the uttermost ends of the world.

The Red is the flush on the cheek of the brave,
 As they tell of the deeds they have done;
 And the Blue is the soft eye of Pity—to save,
 When the battle of Freedom is won.
 The White is the robe virgin Innocence wears,
 France's triumphs are innocent now,
 For unmurtured by blood, and unwater'd by tears,
 Is the wreath that encircles her brow.

But though freshly and fairly the laurel may bloom
 For France in this hour of her pride,
 And the voice of her martyrs proclaim from the tomb,
 "'Twas in Liberty's cause that we died;"
 Shame to those! who, unconscious of Liberty's worth,
 Sound the tocsin of groundless alarm,
 Nor know, that, when brought from the land of its birth,
 The Tri-color loses its charm.

For the Red is Rebellion's appropriate hue,
 The Blue, livid Envy's foul stain;
 And the White is pale Terror, that trembles to do
 The deeds the base heart can contain;
 But the red rose of England, and Scotland's brown leath, Twined with Ireland's green shamrock we see,
 Then let's bind them the closer with Loyalty's wreath,
 That's the Tri-color, Britain, for thee!

SHEPHERD.

Capital—air—capital!

NORTH.

In looking back through the lives of the most illustrious, we shall find, says Mr Moore, "that with scarcely one exception, from Homer down to Lord Byron, they have been, in their several degrees, restless and solitary spirits"——

SHEPHERD.

That's a lee.

NORTH.

——“with minds,” he continues, “wrapped up like silkworms in their own tasks”——

SHEPHERD.

Oh! Mister Muir, but that's a desperate bad eemage. Homer and Byron—twa silkworms! But wull ye answer me this, sir, dinna silkworms marry? Linnaeus says they do—and James Watson shewed me a box o' them a' enjoyin' their hinney-moon. If sae, why souldna poets marry too, as weel's thae bit “restless and solitary spirits” the silkworms, wham they, in their ither warks, it seems, sae nearly resemble?

NORTH.

Mr Moore may know more o' Homer's life than I do, James; but I for one will never believe that he was a restless and solitary spirit——

SHEPHERD.

Wrapped up like a silkworm. Nor me.

NORTH.

“A stranger and rebel,” Mr Moore insanely adds, “to domestic ties, and bearing about with him a deposit for posterity in his soul, to the jealous watching and enriching of which almost all other thoughts and considerations have been sacrificed.”

SHEPHERD.

Says he that o' the ever-rejoicing Homer, wha was equally at hame on the battle-field, the plain o' ocean, the tent-palace o' the king o' men, the sky-dwelling o' the immortal gods:

NORTH.

Mr Henry Nelson Coleridge says well, in his Introduction to the Study of the Classics, Part First, “that Homer always seems to write in good spirits, and he rarely fails to put his readers in good spirits also. To do this is a prerogative of genius in all times; but it is especially so of the genius of primitive or heroic poetry. In Homer, head and heart speak, and are spoken to together. Morbid peculiarities of thought and temper have no place in him. He is as wide and general as the air we breathe, and the earth upon which we tread; and his vivacious spirit animates, like a Proteus, a thousand different forms of intellectual production—the life-preserving principle in them all. He is as the mighty strength of his own deep-flowing ocean,

‘Whence all the rivers, all the seas have birth,
And every fountain, every well on earth.’”

SHEPHERD.

Oh, sir, what a wonnerfu' memory is yours! You're the only man I ever kent that can repeat aff by heart great screeds o' prose composition on a manner o' souljects, just as if they were extemporaneous effusions o' his ain, thrown aff in the heat o' discourse. Mr Henry Nelson Coleridge maun be a clever fallow.

NORTH.

A scholar and a gentleman—though I intend taking him to task for a few trifles one of these days.

SHEPHERD.

What's Hartley about?

NORTH.

Dreaming in the leafless woods! Many an article he promises to send me—but I ask, “Where are they?” and echie answers, “Where are they?”

SHEPHERD.

Send him to boord wi' me in the Forest.

NORTH.

But to return to Mr Moore—he picks out the names of some great philo-philosophers who died bachelors, and having observed that they all "silently admitted their own unfitness for the marriage tie by remaining in celibacy"—

SHEPHERD.

Hoot, toot. That's nae reasonin'—

NORTH.

—he observes, that the fate of poets in matrimony has but justified the caution of the philosophers. "While the latter," he says, "have given warning to genius by keeping free of the yoke, the others have still more effectually done so by their misery under it, the annals of this sensitive race having, at all times, abounded with proofs, that genius ranks but low among the elements of social happiness—that, in general, the brighter the gift, the more disturbing its influence—and that, in the married life particularly, its effects have been too often like that of the 'wormwood star,' whose light filled the waters on which it fell with bitterness."

SHEPHERD.

Screeds o' prose-composition again, I declare! Oh! what'n a storehouse!

NORTH.

And then he boldly avers at once, that "on the list of married poets who have been unhappy in their homes, are the four illustrious names of Dante, Milton, Shakspeare, and Dryden—to which we must now add, as a partner in their destiny, a name worthy of being placed beside the greatest of them—Lord Byron."

SHEPHERD.

I never read a word o' Dante's Comedy o' Hell, sae I sall say nae mair anent it, than that the soobjerk seems better adapted for tragedy—and as for Dryden, I'm no sae familiar 's I sould be wi' "Glorious John"—sae Byron may be equal, inferior, or superior to baith them twa—But I hae read Shakspeare and Milton mony thousan' times, and, Maister Muir, ye had nae richt, sir, by your ipse-dixie, to place Byron by the side o' them twa, the greatest o' a' the children o' man—he maun sit, in a' his glory, far doon aneath their feet.

NORTH.

He must. But Mr Moore had no right to place Shakspeare and Milton on the list of miserable married men. Milton's character and conduct as a husband appear to have been noble and sublime. Of Shakspeare's married life we know nothing—or rather, less than nothing—a few dim and contradictory-seeming expressions, almost unintelligible, on the strength of which Mr Moore has not scrupled to place him as a partner in destiny along with Byron, the most miserable of the miserable, and at last a profligate. The destiny of Dante lay not in his marriage, however unhappy it might have been, and 'tis a sorry way of dealing with the truth to slur and slobber over all its principal features.

SHEPHERD.

It is that, sir.

NORTH.

Te idiosyncracies—

SHEPHERD.

What a lang-nebbed polysyllable!

NORTH.

—of 'all the Philosophers—and Poets—and men of the higher order of genius—whom Mr Moore adduces as examples of unfitness for marriage, were different, through all the possible degrees of difference—and yet he seeks to subject them all to one general law of life!

SHEPHERD.

Maist illogical, and maist unphilosophic. I was just gaun to sae—maist irrational—but that micht be oweg strang a word. He was bound to hae taken them ane by ane, and to hae analaezed their specific characters, and to hae illustrated their fortunes and their fates, and their position in the times and places they flourished in, and then to hae applied the upshot o' the baill enquiry to the pint in haun—Were they, or were they not—and why and wherefore—likely or unlikely to hae been wicked or meeserable married men? Having failed to do a' that, and twice as muckle's a' that, why, Mister

Muir, let me tell you to your face, ma canty chiel, that you hae dune naething ava', and that your argument's aboot as strang's a spider's wab, that keeps flaffin' in the wind beside a broken lozen, feckless even to catch fleas—for by comes a great buntmer, like Mr North or me, and carries it aff on his doup intil the open sunshine.

NORTH.

The subject of Mr Moore's elaborate failure, James, deserves discussion—

SHEPHERD.

And it's had it.

NORTH.

But a few hints—

SHEPHERD.

Sparks struck out by your steel and ma flint, which hae only to fa' intil the gunpother o' the thoctfu' reader's mind, in order to set the heaven o' his imagination in a bleeze, and shew him a' the Life-region illuminated far and wide roun' the haill horizon.

NORTH.

Heaven and earth, my dear Shepherd, what a libel on the Living Illustrious of our own land! Great men are now among us—

SHEPHERD.

Ay, Great Poets—born for a' time, sir—and a' married—a' wi' wives and weans—that is, the maist feck o' them—an' first-rate husbands and fathers, croose as ggem-cocks on their walks, wi' fierce een, sharp nebs, lang claws, and rainbow tails, crawin' till the welkin rings wi' their shrill clarions, and then doon wi' ane o' their wings—

NORTH.

Stop, James. I suspect Mr Moore, with all his palaver, has been fishing for a compliment—

SHEPHERD.

And he shall catch ane—or rather I'll fasten ane on his hycuck—and he may whup it owre his head. A better husband and a better father than Mister Muir—except, aiblins, it be masell—canna be pictur'd, and yet, whatever may be the fate o' Lalla Rookh, his sangs'll last to a' eternity—that is, as lang's the Eerish nation—and afore it be extinguished, there'll be bluidy wark, for they're deevils for fechtin', and whatever prevails owre them to their utter extermination, wull hae little to brag on—but the twa nations'll be fund lyin' stane-dead by ane anither's sides, and the dead'll hae to bury the dead.

NORTH.

One word more, James, and I have done.

SHEPHERD.

Where's Mister Muir? This moment he was sittin' at my elbow—and do and behold he has vanished!

NORTH.

A phantom of your imagination, James—Would it were a reality, for Mr Moore is a delightful person, and his genius glances in conversation bright as the diamond-ring on his little finger.

SHEPHERD.

Weel, I coud hae ta'en ma Bible-oath that he was sittin' in this chair, nod, noddin', noo at me, and then, at you, wi' a sort o' slicht sardonic smile about the silent but expressive mouth o' him, amaisht as much as to say that "what is writ is writ," and maun e'en remain in secula seculorum.

NORTH.

I hope better things. But if the passages now gently criticised be retained in the octavo edition, I shall tackle to Mr Moore in a different trim, and, natthless my admiration of his genius, his character, and himself, his scone shall feel the crutch.

SHEPHERD.

What gin he pu't out o' your haun, and gie ye a clour on the side o' the head wi' your ain weapon? Grasp it furm, sir.

NORTH.

No—James. He that is cunning of fence—and I have taken lessons from Francalanza—has a fine, easy, seemingly almost loose hold of the hilt—but out of that hold, sleight or strength has never yet beat or twitched my timber.

SHEPHERD.

But you maunna hurt Mister Muir's head owre sair, although he has libelled us married men "o' the higher order o' genius."

NORTH.

Married men? By 'St Benedict, I am but a bachelor of hearts. Had I been double—instead of single—I might have sung small—

SHEPHERD.

Sung sma' ? Hae I sung sma' on this theorem ? Why, sir, it's in the power o' ony ae man o' the higher order o' genius—say poetical genius—to lavish in the prodigality o' his sowl, mair love on his wife, during ony ae day—aye, ony ae hour, than it's in the capacity o' a goof to bestow on his during fifty years, beginnin' wi' the first blink o' the hinney-moon, and endin' wi' the last lower o' the nicht that fa's upon her coffin. O ! what a fearfu' heap o' passion can the poet cram intil ae embrace—ae kiss—ae smile—ae look—ae whisper—ae word—towards the partner o' his life—the mither o' his weans—the—

NORTH.

" You speak to me who never had a wife."

SHEPHERD.

Puir chiel, I pity you. What although the poet's marriage-life be sometimes stormy—what though sometimes " Blackness come across it like a squall, Darkening the sea ?"

Yet wha can pent the glory and the brightness o' the celestial cawn—when the world o' them twa—o' him and his wife—may be likened till the ocean and a' her isles, in the breezy sunshine—and them twa themselfs till consort-ships steering along wi' a' their sails and a' their streamers—nae fear o' shoals or lee-shore rocks—on, on, on thegither towards the haven o' everlastin' rest, among the regions o' the setting sun ! Or when it may be likened—that is, the world o' them twa—o' him and his wife—till the blue lift, a' a-lit wi' laverocks—

NORTH.

Beautiful, James.

SHEPHERD.

Is't ? Weel, I'll sing't again—Till the blue lift, a' a-lit wi' laverocks—and themselfs twa, like consort-clouds—noo a wee way apairt—and noo meltin' intil ane another—purshued by een lookin' up frae below—along their sky-course—o' which the goal is set by God's ain haun far in among the stars o' heaven !

NORTH.

More than beautiful, James—sublime.

SHEPHERD.

And maun a' thae divine days and nichts be left out o' the estimate made o' the poet's married life ? As weel micht a man libel a beautifu' and glorious summer, by taukin' o' naething else but a few mountain spates, or twa-three dreadfu' glooms o' thunner and lichtuin'.

NORTH.

I give in. I am beat all to sticks. I am but Pan—

SHEPHERD.

And I Apollo. Hurraw—hurraw—hurraw ! Your nieve, sir.

NORTH.

The misery of marriage lies among the common herd.

SHEPHERD.

There you have it, sir—among the mean, the vile, the coorse, the brutal—where Hymen may be almost said, in the language o' Milton, " among the bestial herds to range ;" for what are men and women, mutually " feeding on garbage," as Shakspeare says, but the bestial? But wi' a' their sins and sorrows, and sometimes baith are sair, "men o' the higher order o' genius" still partake o' an almost divine natur,—the women that marries them are to "radiant angels link'd"—Shakspeare again, sir;—nor do they "sate themselves in celestial beds"—Wullie ance mair—for, on leavin' the elder-down o' the nuptial couch, out walks the poet among the dew-drops o' the mornin', and as he sings his hymns at the shrine o' Natur, he feels that, lang as he is true to that religion, there is a perpetual "bridal o' the earth and sky," (said Herbert) reminding him, as by a divine emblem, o' his ain union wi' her whom he has left in bliss, wi' a loving blossom in her bosom, aiblins the last-born o' the flock, wi' a look o' baith its pawrents mysteriously blended in its sleeping smilen.

SHEPHERD.

What's your wull?

NORTH.

The "history of a chapter" is not a very happy expression, James, neither is "a chapter in human nature." "The increasing civilization of all well-instructed countries," is very bad indeed, James; and it is not true that it has now almost blotted out "that dark chapter in human nature," for that dark chapter may be read now in the Book of Nature as plainly as before, provided we seek for it in the right place.

SHEPHERD.

In Dahomey, Coomassie, Gondar—Oh! sic eisters!

NORTH.

"Though the subject"—what subject—"attracted no ordinary degree of consideration" is poor writing; and then mark the cacophonous repetition, James, of the word history at the close of the sentence!

SHEPHERD.

I canna defend it.—Whar's the vinegar cruet?

NORTH.

"Among much reading of my early days, it is no doubt true that I travelled a good deal in the twilight regions of superstitious disquisition. Many hours have I lost. 'I would their debt were less.'"

SHEPHERD.

He didna lose them, sir. He carried them a' to a gude market.

NORTH.

"In examining old, as well as more recent narratives of this character, and even in looking into some of the criminal trials so frequent in early days, upon a subject which our fathers considered as matter of the last importance; and of late years the very curious extracts published by Mr Pitcairn, from the Criminal Records of Scotland, are, besides their historical value, of a nature so much calculated to illustrate the credulity of our ancestors on such subjects, that, by perusing them, I have been induced more recently to recall what I had read and thought upon the subject at a former period." "As, however, my information is only miscellaneous, and I make no pretensions, either to combat the systems of those by whom I am anticipated in the consideration of the subject," &c. &c. "A few general remarks on the nature of demonology, and the original cause of the almost universal belief in communication betwixt mortals and beings of a power superior to themselves, and of a nature not to be comprehended by human organs, are a necessary introduction to the subject." Here we have "early days" twice within the compass of two sentences—"a subject which our fathers considered as matter of the last importance," is a clumsy repetition of "the subject attracted no ordinary degree of consideration,"—the word subject occurs six times, so as by its jingle to "attract no ordinary degree of consideration,"—and "nature" four times—while several other words are repeated with equal poverty of language—and not one sentence I have read, James, that is not cramped, clumsy, awkward, or inaccurate.

SHEPHERD.

That's mortal bad writing, sir.—The pepper.

"Some ideas of the existence of a deity," and "these spirits, in a state of separate existence, being admitted to exist!" "To the multitude, the indubitable fact that so many millions of spirits exist," "the more numerous part of mankind cannot form in their mind the idea of the spirit of the deceased existing," and "spectres which only exist in the mind," &c.

SHEPHERD.

"More than one learned physician, who have given their attention to the existence of this most distressing complaint, have agreed that it actually occurs"——

SHEPHERD.

Stap—stap—stap, sir—nae forgery—that canna be it—sir towological repetition o' aue and the same fack.

NORTH.

'Tis odd—but let me get on to a specimen of Sir Walter's philosophy.

SHEPHERD.

Do.—Here's a moothfu'!

NORTH.

Sir Walter tells us that "unfortunately, as is now universally known and admitted, there certainly exists more than one disorder known to professional men, of which one important symptom is a disposition to see apparitions. This frightful disorder is not properly insanity, although it is somewhat allied to that most horrible of maladies, and may, in many constitutions, be the means of bringing it on, and all such hallucinations are proper to both. The difference I conceive to be, that in cases of insanity the mind of the patient is principally affected, while the senses, or organic system, offer in vain to the lunatic their decided testimony against the fantasy of a deranged imagination."

SHEPHERD.

I'll try this ane wi' moostard.

NORTH.

Sir Walter must have read little indeed on insanity, or he never could have written so. No doubt that in all cases of insanity the mind of the patient is principally affected; but in none is the organic system sound—in few, have we reason to know that the senses do not deceive—and in many—indeed in by far the greater number—we have reason to know that they do deceive, and are wofully disordered. The difference, therefore, which Sir Walter points out, is rarely indeed the real difference. That lies always wholly in the mind.

SHEPHERD.

I'm inclined to gang along wi' you, sir.

NORTH.

You must go along with me, James.

SHEPHERD.

Na—no unless I like.

NORTH.

However, suppose that Sir Walter had stated the real difference, how does he illustrate it?

SHEPHERD.

Hoo can I tell?

NORTH.

By the story of an insane patient in the Infirmary of Edinburgh, who, though all his meals consisted of porridge, believed that he had every day a dinner of three regular courses and a dessert—and yet confessed, that somehow or other every thing he ate tasted of porridge! The case, says Sir Walter, is obvious—the disease lay in the extreme vivacity of the patient's imagination, deluded in other instances, but not absolutely powerful enough to contend with the honest evidence of his stomach and palate. Here, therefore, Sir Walter adds, “is one instance of actual insanity, in which the sense of taste controlled and attempted to restrain the ideal hypothesis adopted by a deranged imagination.” But who knows that all this insane patient's senses were not diseased? He acted as if they were so—though his palate was still sensible to the porridge taste. They might, or they might not be diseased—but Sir Walter's conclusion is most illogical. The “sense of taste controlling and attempting to restrain an ideal hypothesis,” is language altogether new in mental philosophy.

SHEPHERD.

Sae muckle the better.

NORTH. •

No—so much the worse.

SHEPHERD.

Oh, sir! but ye're dictatorial the nicht!

NORTH.

Hitherto Sir Walter, though not happy in his illustrations, is yet intelligible, and not absolutely self-inconsistent. But by and by he falls into sad self-contradiction.

SHEPHERD.

It's wonnerfu', sir, hoo common that is. 'I really maun publish ma “Logic.” Do you think the bairds o' Fosters pushionush?

NORTH.

“The disorder to which I previously alluded is entirely of a bodily character, and consists, principally, in a disease of the visual organs, which present to the patient a set of spectres, or appearances, which have no actual existence. It is a disease of the same nature which renders many men incapable of distinguishing colours, only the patients go a step farther, and pervert the external form of objects. In this case, therefore, contrary to that of the maniac, it is not the mind, or rather the imagination, which imposes upon, and overpowers the evidence of the senses, but the sense of seeing or hearing, which betrays its duty, and conveys false ideas to a sane intellect.”

SHEPHERD.

Weel then, isna a' that intelligible aneuch?

NORTH.

Perfectly so—but wait, James, for the illustrations.

SHEPHERD.

I'm quite wullin' to wait for the illustrations, sir, as lang's there's a Pan-door on the brodd.

NORTH.

Meanwhile, how could Sir Walter say that the disease of the visual organs, which presents to the patient a set of spectres or appearances which have no existence, is a disease of the same nature with that which renders many men incapable of distinguishing colours? The latter is but a defect—the other is indeed a disease; but I suppose Sir Walter merely means that they both belong to the eyes.

SHEPHERD.

Aiblins,

NORTH.

There is something to my mind not a little ludicrous in Sir Walter's simplicity, when he says, “only the patients go a step farther, and pervert the external form of objects.”

SHEPHERD.

An' a patient gangs yet another step farther when he dees—that is his last step—for after it, he's carried.

NORTH.

The two cases, James, which Sir Walter proposes, are essentially distinct and different.

SHEPHERD.

They are sae—but noo for your objections to Sir Walter's illustrations.

NORTH.

Sir Walter has been at great pains to tell us, that "this disease is entirely of a bodily character"—"It is not the mind, or rather the imagination, which imposes"—

SHEPHERD.

I ken a' that—gang on.

NORTH.

You may ken a' that, James, but Sir Walter, in the very next page, has forgotten it, and with difficulty could I believe my eyes, James, when in the paragraph immediately following, I read—"The most frequent source of the malady is in the dissipated and intemperate habits of those who, by a continued series of intoxication, become subject to what is popularly called the Blue Devils, instances of which MENTAL DISORDER (!) may be known to most who have lived in society where hard drinking was a common vice." Here Sir Walter not only loses sight of his own distinction, which he had so pompously laid down, but he dishes it at one blow. This disease, which he told us before was "entirely of a bodily character," is now, it seems, a "mental disorder."

SHEPHERD.

It's a pity to see folk writin' on subjects they hae na considered, and therefore canna understan'. It's a cut-throat o' a contradiction.

NORTH.

Sir Walter then goes on to illustrate "this disease, which is entirely of a bodily character," and thereby distinguishable from insanity, and yet is at the same time "a mental disorder," by the case of a young gentleman, one of whose principal complaints was the frequent presence of a set of apparitions resembling a band of figures dressed in green. Sir Walter then tells us, with astounding forgetfulness of his own theory, that the whole "corps de ballet existed only in the patient's imagination." If they did, then the disease was of the imagination, and not of the sense—but the story is told to show that the disease was one of the sense, and not of the imagination!

SHEPHERD.

Eh? Eh? That is really stoopit-in Sir Walter.

NORTH.

Sir Walter again speaks of the patient's depraved imagination—and adds a word or two about association, which, if they have any meaning at all, must likewise refer to a mental, and not to a bodily disease. But it was of a bodily disease, and not of a mental disorder, that he formally announced his ambition to speak, and to illustrate, it by a tale!

SHEPHERD.

The Baronet has wrott that ~~before~~ he had been fairly wauken'd out o' a 'soon' sleep, and had got a life wanderin' wuts colleckit.

NORTH.

Just so. I beg leave to recommend the shower-bath.

SHEPHERD.

Or the plunge.

NORTH.

One other sample of confusion of ideas, James, and I have done with Demonology. Sir Walter wishes to explain and illustrate the effect sometimes produced on the mind in sleep, by the dreamer touching with his hand some other part of his own person.

SHEPHERD.

I ken about that. He's right there.

NORTH.

No. He is wrong. The dreamer, says Sir Walter, is clearly in this case "both the actor and patient, both the proprietor of the member touching, and of that which is touched; while to increase the complication, the hand is both toucher of the limb on which it rests, and receives an impression of touch from it; and the same is the case with the limb, which at one and the same time receives an impression from the hand, and conveys to the mind a report respecting the size, substance, and the like, of the member touching."

SHEPHERD.

That's gaen kittle.

NORTH.

It is so only because badly expressed—and indeed the last part of the sentence does not contain the meaning which the Baronet supposes or intends—but let that pass—

SHEPHERD.

You're no lettin't pass, you savage.

NORTH.

But hark what follows. "Now, as during sleep the patient is unconscious," quoth Sir Walter, "that both limbs are his own identical property, his mind is apt to be much disturbed by the complication of sensations arising from two parts of his person being at once acted upon, and from their reciprocal action; and false impressions are thus received, which, accurately enquired into, would afford a clew to many puzzling phenomena in the theory of dreams."

SHEPHERD.

What! is a patient in sleep unconscious that baith limbs are his ain identical property?—I canna swallow that.

NORTH.

But suppose we do swallow it, James, and then consequences the very reverse of those Sir Walter mentions must ensue. For by this unconsciousness, all the complication of sensations which Sir Walter so clumsily explains the cause of, is prevented from taking place. It becomes impossible.

SHEPHERD.

Sae it does, sir. I never observed that afore, till you pointed it oot. 'Tis anither cut-throat contradiction.

NORTH.

But, countryman, lend me your ears. As an illustration of the effect of this complication of sensations that may be produced in a dream, Sir Walter tells us a story of a nobleman, who once awoke in horror, still feeling the cold dead grasp of a corpse's hand on his right wrist. It was a minute before he discovered that his own left hand was in a state of numbness, and with it he had accidentally encircled his right arm. Now, James, this story, which Sir Walter tells to illustrate how the "patient's mind was disturbed by the complication of sensations arising from two parts of his person," illustrates the very reverse, namely, how the patient's mind was disturbed, but by one simple sensation, that of a corpse's hand, his own hand being perfectly numb, that is, without sensation at all, and acting therefore precisely as a corpse's hand, or a piece of lead. So much for Sir Walter's metaphysics.

SHEPHERD.

Hurraw—hurraw—hurraw!—Hollo! Gurney!

[The time-piece strikes Twelve—and enter St Ambrose and his Menks with a roasted goose, son of the celebrated prize-goose who won the stubble-sweepstakes in 1829; and ditto hare, the identical animal killed by Lord Eglinton's gooshawk, by which he won the cup at the last meeting of the Ardrossan Coursing-Club. GURNEY emerges from the ear of Dionysius, and the Noctes close.]

ON THE LATE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

No. I.

It is a melancholy fact, verified by every day's observation, that the experience of the past is totally lost both upon individuals and nations. A few persons, indeed, who have attended to the history of former errors, are aware of the consequences to which they invariably lead; and lament the progress of national violence in the same way as they do the career of individual intemperance. But, upon the great mass of mankind, the young, the active, and the ambitious, such examples are wholly thrown away. Each successive generation plunges into the abyss of passion, without the slightest regard to the fatal effects which such conduct has produced upon their predecessors; and lament, when too late, the rashness with which they slighted the advice of experience, and stifled the voice of reason.

It is now sixty years since Mr Hume closed the History of the English Revolution with these remarkable words: "All parties had now successively reaped the melancholy pleasure of seeing the injuries they had suffered revenged on their enemies; and that, too, by the same arts which had been practised against themselves. The King had, in some instances, stretched his prerogative beyond the due bounds, and aided by the church, had well nigh put an end to the liberties of the nation. The Presbyterians checked the progress of the court and clergy, excited by cant and hypocrisy the popular spirit to tumults, then to war, against the King, the Peers, and all the royalists. No sooner had they reached the pinnacle of grandeur, than the Independents, under the appearance of still greater sanctity, indicted the army against them, and reduced them to subjection. The Independents, amidst their empty dreams of liberty, were oppressed by the rebellion of their own servants, found themselves at once exposed to the insults of power and the hatred of the people. By recent, as well as all ancient example, it was become evident, that illegal violence, with whatever pretences it may be covered, and whatever object it may pursue, must inevitably end at last in the arbitrary and despotic government of a single person." *

Substitute the Constituent Assembly and their supporters for the Presbyterians—the Girondists for the Independents—the Jacobins for the Fifth-Monarchy Men—Napoleon for Cromwell, and the history of the progress of the English may be taken for that of the French Revolution.

Shortly after the publication of Mr Hume's History, the French Revolution broke out. The lessons of ancient, as well as of modern experience were immediately forgotten—the enthusiasm of freedom overspread Europe—a new era in the political system was anticipated, and perfect virtue expected, during the tumults of faction, as if no such names as those of Marius and Sylla, of Pompey and Octavius, of Cæsar or Cromwell, had been known in the world.

Forty years elapsed—a generation passed away through the lapse of time, or were mown down by the sword—new causes of complaint arose in the French nation, and a second Revolution took place. The dear-bought experience of recent times was immediately forgotten—the horrors of 1793 were passed over in silence—a new era of social happiness was anticipated—revolutionary hopes were again awakened—democratic ambition of new arose—and the mass of the people shared in the joy at the supposed triumph of freedom, as if its past consequences had been obliterated from the book of time—as if the efforts of patriotism had not been succeeded by the rise of wickedness—humanic philanthropy by revolutionary cruelty—the conquests of freedom by the reign of Robespierre.

* Hume, chap. ix. ad finem.

What is still more extraordinary, the recent Revolution was almost, by common consent, characterised as totally distinct from the former, in consequence of the bloodless triumph by which it was said to be distinguished—the moderation displayed by the mob in the use of victory—the generous abstinence from pillage after the overthrow of the royalist troops—the absence of any judicial murders after the strife had ceased. These proceedings were exultingly contrasted with the savage ferocity of former times—the bloody annals of the reign of terror, with the pacific termination of the battles in Paris—the Dictatorship of Robespierre, with the constitutional throne of Louis Philippe.

Human nature, however, is still the same: a Revolution now is not different from what it was in 1793—the mob of 1830 is not more virtuous than that which stormed the Tuileries in 1792. The supposed difference between the two Revolutions vanishes where that great corrector of error, DATE, is brought into view; the superior virtue of the present time is only supported by suppressing the period which elapsed between the overthrow of the King, and the bloody revenge of his antagonists.

The Bastille was stormed on July 14, 1789. The revolt of the French guards, and the disaffection of the troops round Paris, had previously destroyed the supports of the monarchy, and from that day the supreme power passed into the hands of the Constituent Assembly.

The mob of Paris immediately formed themselves into armed bands; 50,000 national guards were speedily organized, with that rapidity and effect which have in all ages been the characteristic of the French populace; and from that time forward, the safety of the metropolis was exclusively intrusted to its insurrectionary force.*

No pillage of private houses—no disorders of any kind, followed this first triumph of the popular arms. With the exception of those killed during the combat, or by the populace in the first heat of revenge, no murders took place. The royal palaces were respected, and in a few days, Paris wore its usual appearance, and, but for the animated looks of its citizens, it could not have been discovered that any convulsion had taken place.

The excessive scarcity of provisions in the end of September, 1789, produced a popular convulsion, which led to the invasion of Versailles, and the inundation of the palace by an armed rabble, and had well-nigh proved fatal to the royal family. Yet, even on this trying occasion, when the horrors of famine were added to the natural excitation of a Revolution, and the very lowest classes, the poissardes and porters, headed the tumult, but little blood was shed; and with the exception of two of the garde du corps, who were killed in resisting the invasion of the royal apartments, no lives were lost. The national guard, after the resistance had ceased, mingled with the revolutionary pikemen; and the body guard of Louis marched in procession on the following day with the forces of the populace, amidst the shouts of the multitude.

From the time that the royal family settled in Paris, on October 6, 1789, till the revolt of August 10, 1792, a period of nearly three years, hardly any bloodshed, and no pillage or conflagration, took place in Paris. With the exception of the baker, Foulon, who was murdered in a mob, produced by the scarcity of provisions, and one or two other persons who fell victims to the same cause of popular excitation, no individual lost his life; and, excepting the Marquis de Favras, who was convicted of high treason by the Court of Chatelet, no person whatever was sent to the scaffold by the Constituent Assembly during more than two years that their power was unresisted in France.†

Even on August 10, 1792, when the Fauxbourg rose in open insurrection against the throne and the Legislative Assembly, and the Monarch, with all his family, were made prisoners by the multitude, no greater violence was perpetrated than on 27th July, 1830. On both occasions the Tuileries were plundered, and the Swiss guard defeated and massacred; but no general or indiscriminate violence took place. No plunder of private houses—no conflagration of the city, ensued. No completely were the foremost of the assailants masters of their passions, that, after the Swiss guards were driven from the Place Caroussel through the palace into the gardens of the Tuileries, the insurgents, fearful of injuring the marble statues with which that fine quarter is ornamented, by firing at the fugitives who had climbed upon them, pricked them with their pikes until they came down, and murdered them at their foot with their bayonets. On the following morning all Paris came out to view the scene of the conflict; and groups of well-dressed citizens and inquisitive females were to be seen amidst the fragments of the strife, and on ground yet reeking with the blood of the unfortunate defenders of the throne.

It was not till the 2d September, 1792, three years after the storming of the Bastille, that the massacres in the prisons commenced, and that bands of ferocious ruffians, paid by the Municipality of Paris, murdered six thousand unoffending victims in the public places of confinement. Then, and not till then, began the reign of blood, and each successive convulsion brought a more sanguinary faction to the head of affairs. The Girondists, or humane republicans, who had aided the revolt in order to bring themselves into power, speedily fell beneath the sword of the Jacobins, and were led out to the scaffold, amidst the applause of the people, whom they had so recently led to victory; the Jacobins, after defiling France with blood, yielded to the sanguinary rule of the Committee of Public Safety; and it, in its turn, crouched beneath the iron despotism of Robespierre.

What went on in the interval, from July 14, 1789, to Sept. 2, 1792? How were the people roused to the deed of blood, which, after a tranquillity of three years, commenced with such appalling energy, and continued with such merciless severity? What distinguished the humane philosophers who instigated the Revolution, or swept off the generous republicans who strove to mitigate its fury? The answer is, in one word, AGITATION: During the whole intervening period, the demagogues never ceased to disturb the public mind. Absurd reports of danger, appeals to the spirit of freedom, incessant abuse of the Aristocrats, continued flattery of the people, were the methods by which the character of the revolt was changed, by which the moderate measures of rational men were brought into discredit, and an appetite created for fresh convulsions and more sanguinary revenge.

The wicked men, who are ultimately dangerous, do not appear in the commencement of public disturbances. Resistance against oppression is generally begun and headed by generous minds; men who put their lives in peril to save their country, and run the danger of the scaffold, to secure the liberties of their fellow-citizens. Such were Hamden and Sidney in the English; Bally and Roland in the French Revolution. There is an aversion, too, to blood in the commencement of civil dissensions; the last stages of violence are not reached in the outset of strife, and the better feelings of our nature frequently prevail in the first triumphs of the arms of freedom. It is, accordingly, remarkable, as Guizot has observed,* with how much humanity the English Cavaliers and Roundheads behaved towards each other in the beginning of the Civil Wars; and it was not till its later stages, that the exasperation arising from mutual injury, rendered the practice common, of making prisoners those who were taken in battle. In France, in like manner in 1789, equally as 1830, all was humanity and gentleness in the commencement of the Revolution; the horror evinced at Barnave for his celebrated expression on the death of Berthier, "Was then the blood which has been shed so very pure?" was such that he never recovered the good opinion of the public; and the President of the Constituent Assembly fainted when he read the letter containing the details of the massacre of Avignon; and that celebrated body evinced from first to last, even according to the admission of the royalist historians, a constant repugnance to the shedding of blood."⁶

But after this first ebullition of virtuous feeling, the bad passions come into play which have been stirred up in the public contentions. Vulgar Ambition is roused from its lethargy, Poverty is deprived of its employment, the populace become habituated to the intoxication of flattery, public credit, shaken by the convulsions of the state, rapidly falls, and the multitudes who are thrown out of work by the stoppage of commercial enterprise, assemble in tumultuous bodies, and demand some benefit from the dangers they have incurred. Human wickedness speedily takes advantage of the passions which have arisen, the public suffering is ascribed to the faults of government, and starving multitudes lend a ready ear to the flattering tale, that their ranks are alone immaculate, and that tyranny and corruption universally prevail in the higher classes of the state.

In this way, from good beginnings, ensue bad consequences; to virtuous resolution succeeds guilty ambition; to the gilded anticipation of hope, the sad realities of despair. This progress rapidly took place in France, immediately after the Revolution. The public revenue, which, in 1789, was £24,000,000 sterling, fell, in 1790, to £17,000,000;† and the distress which ensued among the people infinitely exceeded any thing which had been experienced before the popular rule commenced. The ablest of the republican historians† confess, that one quarter of the evils which assailed the Republic would have crushed the Monarchy.

Nothing, accordingly, can be more instructive than the Character of the different classes who successively rose to eminence during the progress of the French Revolution. First appeared the Constituent Assembly, headed by Lafayette, Bailly, and Mirabeau, ardent in patriotism, courageous in resolution, firm in the love of freedom, but the decided friends of order, and attached to a constitutional monarchy. So long as they headed the populace, all was harmony in the ranks of freedom; but when the King's flight to Varennes had shaken the public mind, the republican leaders appeared; an insurrection took place, planned by Brissot and the Girondists, and the friends of the Constitutional throne, headed by Lafayette, engaged and defeated the forces of the populace in the Champ de Mars. Instantly Lafayette, Bailly, and the early leaders of the Revolution, fell into obloquy; the latter was doomed to a cruel and ignominious death, by the people whose liberties his firmness had saved; and the former only owed his life to his captivity in an Austrian dungeon. The Girondists then rose to eminence; republican in principle, humane in intention, gentle in character, but destitute of the audacity to seize, or the firmness to command success. Their reign, as that of all good men, in public convulsions, was short; they supported the insurrection of August 10th, which overturned the throne, and immediately became the victims of the Jacobins, a set more daring, more sanguinary, less scrupulous than themselves. Then came the reign of Blood; the unrelenting sway of revolutionary Cruelty and plebeian Revenge. A merciless sword waved over France, mowing down alike the dignity of rank, the splendour of opulence, the lustre of talent, and the graces of beauty.

Such is the natural progress of revolution. Its counterpart may be traced in the successive sway of the Presbyterians, the Independents, and the Fifth-Monarchy men, in the English Rebellion. Each successive faction which rises to the head of affairs is more extravagant, more cruel, more tyrannical, than that which preceded it. Liberty is totally destroyed during the struggle for power, and her name invoked only as the means of rousing the people to new exertions, and to the support of more sanguinary ambition.

These truths are familiar to every one acquainted with the history of Revolution; but they seem to have been totally forgotten in the public estimation of the last French Revolution. When the leaders of the Opposition in this country contrasted the bloodless termination of the strife in 1830 with the dreadful excesses of the former contest, had they forgotten that these excesses began THREE YEARS AFTER the establishment of the popular rule, and that, during the intervening period, the patriots presented the same amiable features which are so much the object of encomium at this time? Have they forgotten that the early leaders of the Revolution became, in a few years, the object of more violent hatred than the King or the aristocrats; that Lafayette, the moment he strove to control the populace, felt his rod of power break in his hands, and was compelled to take refuge from the fury of his countrymen within the Austrian lines; that, for the philosophic Bailly, the first President of the Assembly, the idol of France, the firm opponent of despotism, the author of the Tennis Court oath, was invented a new and unusually cruel mode of death in the Champ de Mars; that, for two long hours, he was laid on his face, with the guillotine suspended over his head, shivering with cold, amidst the severity of a December storm?

Those who will coolly compare the two periods, will find that the downward progress of the Revolution has been far more rapid on the present than the former occasion. The rise of the heaven of democracy, the dismissal of the philosophic Ministry, the clamour for blood, the weight of tumultuary assemblages, the unbridled license of the press, has taken place within as many months as it required years in 1790.

The first Revolution was effected on 14th July, 1790, and Bailly remained Mayor of Paris, and Lafayette ruled the National Guard till May, 1792, a period of nearly three years.

The second Revolution broke out on 28th July, 1830, and the moderate and philosophic Guizot, the able Duke de Broglie, and the whole cabinet of the Doctrinaires, were dismissed in October, 1830. Their reign was only two months and a half. As usual in all public convulsions, the men of thought and principle, the humane, the enlightened, and the benevolent, were the first to be discarded; the difference is, that their destruction was effected, in 1830, in three months, whereas, in 1790, it required three years.

The Ministers of the King were varied according to the temper of the nation, in the early period of the first Revolution, but never imposed upon the sovereign by a tumultuary rabble till after the 20th June, 1792. For three years, Louis XVI. exercised the functions of an independent sovereign, yielding no doubt to the public voice, when strongly expressed, but never bending to popular violence, till a few months before the overthrow of the throne. Whereas, in October, 1830, a mob of 30,000 men, the very lowest and basest of the rabble, filled the Palais Royal, threatened the royal family, and gave such a shake to the throne, that the Ministry were overturned, and the humane measures resolved on for the salvation of the Polignac Ministers abandoned. Popular violence, in the first instance, became omnipotent in three years, in the last in three months.

The agitation of Paris, by means of inflammatory journals and revolutionary pamphlets, did not rise to any great height, in the first Revolution, till the winter 1791-2. It was then that Marat began to issue his infernal journal, "L'Ami du Peuple," that republican institutions became the open subject of encomium, and the leaders of the opposite faction were first pointed out to public vengeance.

In 1830, this tremendous engine has been at work from the first day of the Revolution. Paris was instantly inundated with a deluge of pamphlets, tracts, and journals, which worked incessantly upon the passions of the people, already violently excited by recent success and present distress. We have no idea on this side of the Channel, of the violence, energy, and extent of the revolutionary press in Paris, or of the degree of ferment which it has excited in the minds of the lower orders. The destruction of the House of Peers is spoken of as certain: The throne only tolerated as the head of a republic. The most absurd reports are incessantly circulated in these vehicles of falsehood, to continue the public agitation: One day, that a levy of 500,000 men had been ordered: Another that Prussia had declared war: A third that Austrian troops had crossed the frontier. This exposure of these falsehoods has no effect towards diminishing their frequency: In public convulsions, the craving for excitation, terror, and agitation is insatiable.

The cry for blood did not commence in the first Revolution, till after the imprisonment of the King; and the first blood shed on the scaffold, with the exception of the illustrious Marquis de Favras, was that of Louis, on the 21st January 1793, three years and a half after the beginning of the troubles. In 1830, the thirst for vengeance manifested itself from the very commencement of the Revolution: The public cry for the execution of the Polignac Administration speedily became irresistible: Thousands of infuriated wretches surrounded the castle of Vincennes, nightly for weeks together, clamouring for the blood of their victims; and the humane measures of the King, and the Administration, to save their lives, were overturned.

The fate of these men, we fear, is now sealed. Public clamour, the voice of the mob, has pronounced their doom, and that without the least regard to the legal question on which their trial depends. They may be guilty of a capital crime, though it is certain that their accusers have never yet pointed out the clause in any statute or law which embraces their case. But this is of little importance. The vociferous mob, who overturned Guizot's administration, are as incapable of understanding the merits of their case on legal principles, as they are the policy of attempting to save them on philosophical. It is enough for them that they are aristocrats, the enemies of the people, the authors of the obnoxious ordinances, to render their destruction certain.

We give no opinions at present, either on the legality or expedience of these famous ordinances. The first is a question of French law, on which we do not possess the requisite information to decide: The last is a point hitherto involved in such obscurity, that no rational opinion can, as yet, be formed on it. The liberals stigmatise them as unnecessary and illegal stretches of power, which threw the country at once into a convulsion, and most justly precipitated the king from the throne.

The royalists assert that they were conservative measures, indispensable to save the country from the horrors of a Revolution: That the King was only the first to drop the mask, which both parties had long been wearing, and that he boldly threw the last die for his crown and the monarchy. Which of these is the better founded opinion, we do not pretend to determine: But of this we are well assured, that there is no man in existence, on this side the Channel, who possesses the information requisite to decide it correctly.

These considerations shew how rash the judgment was, which was so generally formed in this country on the French Revolution; and how unfounded the comparison was which they so triumphantly drew between the first and the last convulsion. We are, as yet, in the infancy only of its effects, and our children will experience its lasting consequences. The first Revolution, for two years and a half, was as much the object of the wishes of philanthropists, the praises of the enlightened, and the applause of the humane, as this has been: But this did not prevent the revolutionary fury from working incessantly during that period, and at length hurling the rational and the good from the seat of government, and establishing the reign of Blood in their stead.

Let no one imagine, that because there were a stock of real grievances, which required to be redressed in 1789, therefore a less serious convulsion to society is to be anticipated at this time. It is not the reality of grievances, so much as the temper with which they are viewed, which produces a revolution. All the evils which afflicted France in 1789, existed in still greater force in 1689, when the throne of Louis XIV. was the most popular in Europe. The evils which afflict the most turbulent European state, are nothing to those which press upon the dynasties of the East, where unbroken tranquillity prevails. Imaginary grievances,—the thirst for power, the influence of democratic ambition, often produce far greater disturbances at one period, than the most dreadful political evils occasion at another. There is no novice in the study of history, who is not familiar with that truth.

If incomparably fewer real grievances exist in 1880 than in 1789, there is to be found among the French people an hundred times more of the true revolutionary spirit; "that is of the ambition to have all the powers of government practically vested in the population."

The people were taught, by the Constituent Assembly, to taste the sweets of popular sovereignty. This was not a mere high-sounding name, it brought an immediate accession of consequence, and a deluge of flattery, to the very lowest classes of the state. The right of voting for the national representation was conferred upon every man in France who was worth the price of three days' labour; that is, every body but paupers and children were admitted. The people elected their own magistrates, clergy, bishops, and intendants; the judges of the courts of law, the municipality of towns, the officers of the national guards, were in their nomination. The practical result of this was, not only that vast numbers of the lower orders rose into situations of importance and emolument, but that the whole of them were continually exposed to the flattery and attentions of the demagogues. The adulation lavished upon the multitude was at least equal to any which is bestowed on an Eastern despot. "The people alone are virtuous, free, and incorruptible: Sovereignty resides in them: The majesty of the people. Tyrants may tremble before the newly roused voice of the multitude;"—were the expressions constantly used by their orators, and without which no one had a chance of success. Flattery of this description is agreeable to all: To persons in the lower walks of life it is irresistible.

Nor was this all. The lower classes were incessantly beset with competitors for the offices in their nomination; generals, colonels, clergymen, statesmen, judges, magistrates, prefects, constantly attended at their doors, soliciting their votes, and praying for their patronage. Hardly a week elapsed, without some canvass going forward, and the rabble being brought into immediate enjoyment of their powers of sovereignty. The exercise of such powers is ludicrously fascinating to the lower orders. Its influence may be seen in every city, borough, and village, where the utmost ambition will always be seen to exercise the patronage which is in the gift of the people. The rich neglect such canvasses; the thoughtful despise them; but the vulgar catch at them with the utmost avidity, and swell up at the idea of their newly-acquired importance.

This is the circumstance which renders the present French Revolution so formidable, and is likely to stir up the spirit of Jacobinism, even without any serious cause of complaint. Many, no doubt, may be influenced by the genuine love of freedom; the wish to exercise their industry without vexatious fetters, and to enjoy, in security, the fruits of their toil. But many more are influenced by a different motive; by the passion for power; the desire of exercising the force of sovereignty, the vanity of being courted by their superiors, and made the object of flattery. It is not surprising that the people should love the exercise of such prerogatives; but experience has proved that they are inconsistent with the well-being of the state, and the higher classes may rest assured, that, when once the lower have tasted their sweets, they will never cease longing to retain them.

The influence of this desire may be distinctly perceived in the language which is at present held by the popular writers and orators at Paris. The maxim that all sovereignty not only flows from the people, but is to be constantly exercised by them, is of new inculcated and embraced with the utmost avidity. The innumerable journals which deluge the metropolis, incessantly propagate that principle: any one which should oppose it would immediately lose its whole circulation. The people are now the masters, and they will bear no control upon their new-born sovereignty.

It is to no purpose to say that the deputies in the Chamber are inclined to moderate measures, and that they are returned by 80,000 proprietors in France, who are interested in the preservation of order. No doubt they are; and these 80,000 men may be relied on as likely to resist any revolutionary measures. But the question is, Will they be able to do so? Is it not likely that this body of electors will be signified as an oligarchy, inclined to tyrannize over their fellow-citizens, and that the tide of revolutionary fury will overthrow them, as it has overthrown the throne?]

No imagination can figure the impulse which a successful revolution, like that in France, gives to the factions, the turbulent, the ambitious among the people. Their numbers are quadrupled, their strength augmented tenfold by such an occurrence. The friends of order, panic-struck and divided in opinion how the evil is to be resisted, become incapable of any united effort, while their antagonists, elated by success, and strong in anticipation of victory, speedily acquire the self-confidence which ensures it.

All the most fatal changes which took place in the first French Revolution, were the result of insurrections of the populace against the Legislature. The Legislative Assembly, albeit chosen by the universal suffrage of the people, soon became so obnoxious from not going the utmost length of their wishes, that a new legislature was loudly called for, and the revolt of August 10, which brought Louis to the scaffold, was not less against the National Assembly than the throne. The arrest and condemnation of the thirty-one illustrious deputies of the Gironde, on 31st May, 1793, was occasioned by the insurrection of the Fauxbourg, and the imprisonment of the National Assembly in the midst of 10,000 rebellious citizens. In vain the president sought to overawe the insurgents by the majesty of the legislature, and set forth at the head of the members to force a passage; the stern order of Henriot, Canoniers, a las piques, drove them back in dismay, and the captive legislature was compelled to obey the mandates of the sovereign people.

Nor is the National Guard any effectual security against the occurrence of such disasters. Those who rest on this armed force as an effectual check on the madness of the populace, forget that the national guard was organized in August 1790, and continued in full activity through all the subsequent changes of the Revolution, without being ever able to moderate its fury. They forget that the National Guard, feeble and irresolute, were unable to control the excesses of the populace at Versailles on October 5, 1789; that they witnessed without a struggle the dethronement and captivity of the king on August 10, 1792; that they beheld the legislature enthralled by an armed mob, and the thirty-one republican leaders of the Gironde conducted to prison and the scaffold, on 31st May, 1793; that they were passive spectators of the murder of the King and Queen, of the Princess Elizabeth, and Madame Roland; that they crouched and trembled beneath the reign of terror, and saw eighty wretched captives daily led out to execution, when the beat of their generals could have summoned 40,000 disciplined men to resist the murders; that they bent beneath the despotic yoke of the Directory, and fawned under the iron sceptre of Napoleon.

In truth, it is impossible to expect any considerable or sustained exertions from a civic force, composed as the National Guard of Paris at present is. Burghers and shopkeepers will turn out, and resist the multitude, so long as they retain the conviction that they are supporting the dominant and prevailing power. But no sooner does public opinion or public terror incline to the other side — no sooner does the conviction gain ground that they are to be required to combat a force which is likely to prove unrulers, than they rapidly melt away, and the civic force, lately so numerous, is reduced to a handful of men.

The great body of men in all civil convulsions are inclined to be passive; to side with the current, and range themselves with the party which is likely to prove successful in the strife. No reliance can be placed for any length of time on any thing but regular soldiers, during the political divisions which distract a country in civil war. Public opinion varies so rapidly; the shades of difference are so endless, that when a crisis arrives, it is ten to one that the whole body is paralyzed and incapable of rendering any effectual service to the state.

A signal proof of the truth of these principles occurred in France during the first Revolution:—For a long time the National Guard, under Lafayette, opposed a steady front to the fury of the multitude; and the same predictions were made which are now repeated as to the efficiency of this force in checking all the excesses consequent on civil dissensions. They even went so far, that when an insurrection was attempted on occasion of the return of the King from Varennes, a large body, under Lafayette, fired on the mob in the Champ de Mars, and brought down 120 of the Jacobins on the first discharge. But no sooner did the danger become more urgent, than the inherent weakness of a volunteer force appeared. The tumult of June 20th, 1792, when a lawless rabble invaded the palace of the Tuileries, brought Lafayette from the armies on the frontier back to Paris: he made an energetic speech at the bar of the Assembly, and obtained from that body a decree, ordering the arrest of the authors of these disorders: he reviewed the National Guard, of which he had so long been the adored commander, and appointed a rendezvous at his hotel in the evening of the most trusty battalions, with the design of marching against the Club of the Jacobins, and closing that great focus of sedition. But scarce thirty men obeyed the summons; and Lafayette, seeing the task hopeless, set off in the night for the army, and was shortly after denounced at the Jacobin Club, burnt in effigy in the Palais Royal, and compelled to seek safety by surrendering himself a prisoner to the Austrian forces.

The National Guard have already evinced symptoms of the same vacillating disposition. It is understood, that the corps destined for the protection of the Luxemburg, during the trial of Pögnac, have declared that they are willing to go every length in resisting the populace, short of actually firing on them. In other words, when matters come to a crisis they will do nothing.

For these reasons we regard the present juncture as fraught with the utmost peril to France and to Europe. Those who will attentively consider the history of the first Revolution, will not, we are persuaded, form an opposite opinion.

The supposed difference between the two cases vanishes when the real facts which have occurred, and the chronological order of events, are brought into view.—It is by confounding the beginning with the middle of the Revolution: by supposing that 1789 was 1793, that the general delusion which exists has arisen. We much fear, before many years, perhaps many months are over, the reality of the resemblance between the two convulsions, will be proved in characters of blood.

No truth is so strongly impressed on the mind by the history of the French Revolution, and none is so little attended to by the unthinking part of mankind, as that the ultimate effect of public measures, is neither to be judged of by their first consequences, nor the character of their original promoters. The material thing to look to, in periods of excitement, is not what measures are, but what they will lead to—not then present effects, but the spirit they are likely to produce. Concessions, which would be safe and expedient in moments of tranquillity, become to the last degree dangerous in moments of excitement. When the point of the wedge is once introduced, in such circumstances, popular violence will soon drive it home. It is to no purpose to say, in these moments, the proposed measures are in themselves reasonable: they are brought forward by public men, who have a great stake in the country; reformation can never be dangerous when placed in such hands. The regimen which is salutary in ordinary health, is fatal amidst the flames of a fever. "No revolution in a great state," says Madame de Staël, "can arise, unless it is commenced and headed by the higher classes. The lower seize possession of the current when it is set a-going, but they cannot put it in motion."* The French Revolution itself was commenced by the resistance of the nobles, magistrates, and parliament of France. Yet, how soon were its early leaders cast down and forgotten, in the strife; how soon did the wave of popular ambition overwhelm its first supporters; how speedily did virtuous intention fall beneath the vigour of democratic audacity. These lessons are still recent; the blood of the victims of insurgent violence is yet reeking; a generation has not passed away since all was accomplished; and yet all is already forgotten; measures are judged of by the men who propose, not those who are about to follow them; the danger of concession to public excitement is overlooked, and the partisans of the people, like the courtiers of Canute the Dane, flatter their leaders with the vain hope, that they shall be able to say to the waves of popular ambition, "Hitherto shalt thou come, and no farther; and here shall thy proud waves be stilled."

A SCENE ON THE "COSTA FIRME." *

I WAS awakened by the low growling, and short bark of the dog. The night was far spent; the tiny sparks of the fire-flies that were glancing in the door-way, began to grow pale; the chirping of the crickets and lizards, and the snore of the tree-toad waxed fainter, and the wild cry of the tiger-cat was no longer heard. The terral, or land-wind, which is usually strongest towards morning, moaned loudly on the hillside, and came rushing past with a melancholy wough, through the brushwood that surrounded the hut, shaking off the heavy dew from the palm and cocoa-nut trees, like large drops of rain.

The hollow tap of the wood-pecker; the clear flute note of the Paro del monte; the discordant shriek of the macaw; the shrill chor of the wild Guinean howl; and the chattering of the paroquets began to be heard from the wood. The ill-omened gallinazo was sailing and circling round the hut, and the tall flamingo was stalking on the shallows of the lagoon, the haunt of the disgusting alligator, that lay beneath, divided from the sea by a narrow mud-bank, where a group of pelicans, perched on the wreck of one of our boats, were pluming themselves before taking wing. In the east, the deep blue of the firmament, from which the lesser stars were fast fading, all but the "Eye of Morn," was warming into magnificent purple, and the amber rays of the yet unrisen sun were shooting up, streamer-like, with intervals between, through the parting clouds, as they broke away with a passing shower, that fell like a veil of silver gauze between us and the first primrose-coloured streaks of a tropical dawn.

"That's a musket shot," said the Lieutenant. The Indian crept on his belly to the door, dropped his chin on the ground, and placed his open palms behind his ears. The distant wail of a bugle was heard, then three or four dropping shots again, in rapid succession. Mr Splinter stooped to go forth, but the Indian caught him by the leg, uttering the single word "Espanoles."

On the instant, a young Indian woman, with a shrieking infant in her arms, rushed to the door. There was a blue gunshot wound in her neck, from which two or three large black clotting gouts of blood were trickling. Her long black hair was streaming in coarse braids, and her features were pinched and sharpened, as if in the agony of death. She glanced wildly behind, and gasped out "Escapa, Orceque, escapa, para mi son, muerto ya." Another shot, and the miserable creature convulsively clasped her child, whose small shrill cry I often fancy I hear to this hour, blending with its mother's death-shriek, and, falling backwards, rolled over the brow of the hill out of sight. The ball had pierced the heart of the parent through the body of her offspring. By this time a party of Spanish soldiers had surrounded the hut, one of whom kneeling before the low door, pointed his musket into it. The Indian, who had seen his wife and child thus cruelly shot down before his face, now fired his rifle, and the man fell dead. "Siga mi Querida Boydia—malito." Then springing to his feet, and stretching himself to his full height, with his arms extended towards heaven, while a strong shiver shook him like an ague fit, he yelled forth the last words he ever uttered, "Venga la muerte, yí soi listo," and resumed his squatting position on the ground. Half a dozen musket balls were now fired at ran-dem through the wustles, while the Lieutenant, who spoke Spanish well, sang out lustily, that we were English officers who had been shipwrecked. "Mentira," growled the officer of the party, "Piratas son ustedes." "Pirates leagued with Indian braves; fire the hut, soldiers, and burn the scoundrels!" There was no time to be lost; Mr Splinter made a vigorous attempt to get out, in which I seconded him, with all the strength that remained to me, but they beat us back again with the butt of their muskets.

Where are your commissions, your uniforms, if you be British officers?" —We had neither, and our fate appeared inevitable.

The doorway was filled with brushwood, fire was set to the hut, and we heard the crackling of the palm thatch, while thick stifling wreaths of white smoke burst in upon us through the roof.

"Lend a hand, Tom, now or never, and kick up the dark man there," but he sat still as a statue. We laid our shoulders to the end wall, and heaved at it with all our might, when we were nearly at the last gasp it gave way, and we rushed headlong into the middle of the party, followed by Sneezer with his shaggy coat, that was full of clots of tar blazing like a torch. He unceremoniously seized "par le queue," the soldier who had throttled me, setting fire to the skirts of his coat, and blowing up his cartouch-box. I believe, under Providence, that the ludicrousness of this attack saved us from being bayoneted on the spot. It gave time for Mr Splinter to recover his breath, when, being a powerful man, he shook off the two soldiers who had seized him, and dashed into the burning hut again. I thought he was mad, especially when I saw him return with his clothes and hair on fire, dragging out the body of the captain. He unfolded the sail it was wrapped in, and pointing to the remains of the naval uniform in which the mutilated and putrifying corpse was dressed, he said sternly to the officer,—"We are in your power, and you may murder us if you will; but that was my captain four days ago, and you see, he at least was a British officer—satisfy yourself." The person he addressed, a handsome young Spaniard, with a clear olive complexion, oval face, small brown moustachios, and large black eyes, shuddered at the horrible spectacle, but did as he was requested.

When he saw the crown and anchor, and his Majesty's cipher on the appointments of the dead officer, he became convinced of our quality, and changed his tone—" Es verdad, son de la marina Realista;" "But, gentlemen, were there not three persons in the hut?" There were indeed—the flames had consumed the dry roof and walls with incredible rapidity, and by this time they had fallen in, but Oreeque was no where to be seen. I thought I saw something more in the midst of the fire, but it might have been fancy. Again the white ashes heaved, and a half-consumed hand and arm were thrust through the smouldering mass, then a human head with the scalp burnt from the skull, and the flesh from the chaps and chuck-bones, the trunk next appeared, the bleeding ribs laid bare, and the miserable Indian, with his limbs like scrawled ratters, stood upright before us, like a demon in the midst of the fire. He made no attempt to escape, but reeling to and fro like a drunken man, fell headlong, raising clouds of smoke and a shower of sparks in his fall. Alas! poor Oreeque, the newly risen sun was now shining on your ashes, and on the dead bodies of the all-starved Bondia and her child, whose bones, ere blazetting, the birds of the air, and beasts of the forest, will leave as white and fleshless as your own. The officer, who belonged to the army investing Carthagena, now treated us with great civility; he heard our story, and desired his men to assist us in burying the remains of our late commander.

We remained all day on the same part of the coast, but towards evening the party fell back on the outpost to which they belonged—after travelling an hour or so we emerged from a dry river course, in which the night had overtaken us, and came suddenly on a small plateau, where the post was established on the promontory of "Punto Caña." There may be braver soldiers at a charge, but none more picturesque in a bivouac than the Spanish. A gigantic wild cotton-tree, to which our largest

English oaks were but as dwarfs, rose on one side, and overshadowed the whole level space. The bright beams of the full moon glanced among the topmost leaves, and tipped the higher branches with silver, contrasting strangely with the scene below, where a large watch-fire cast a strong red glare on the surrounding objects, throwing up dense volumes of smoke, which eddied in dun wreaths amongst the foliage, and hung in the still night air like a canopy, leaving the space beneath comparatively clear.

A temporary guard-house, with a rude verandah of bamboo and palm leaves, had been built between two of the immense spurs of the mighty tree, that shot out many yards from the parent stem like wooden buttresses, whilst overhead there was a sort of stage made of planks laid across the lower boughs, supporting a quantity of provisions covered with tarpaulins. The sentries in the back ground with their glancing arms, were seen pacing on their watch; some of the guard were asleep on wooden benches, and on the platform amongst the branches, where a little baboon-looking old man, in the dress of a drummer, had perched himself, and sat playing a Baccayan air on a sort of bagpipe; others were gathered round the fire cooking their food, or cleaning their arms.

It shone brightly on the long line of Spanish transports that were moored below, stem on to the beach, and on the white sails of the armed craft that were still hovering under weigh in the offing, which, as the night wore on, stole in, one after another, like phantoms of the ocean, and letting go their anchors with a splash, and a hollow rattle of the cable, remained still and silent as the rest.

Farther off, it fell in a crimson stream on the surface of the sheltered bay, struggling with the light of the gentle moon, and tinged with blood the small waves that twinkled in her silver wake, across which a guard boat would now and then glide, like a fairy thing, the arms of the men flashing back the red light.

Beyond the influence of the hot smoky glare, the glorious planet reassumed her sway in the midst of her attendant stars, and the relieved eye wandered forth into the lovely night, where the noiseless sheet lightning was glancing, and ever and anon lighting up for an instant some fantastic shape in the fleecy clouds, like prodigies forerunning the destruction of the stronghold over which they impended; while beneath, the lofty ridge of the convent-crowned Popa, the citadel of San Felipe bristling with cannon, the white batteries and many towers of the fated city of Carthagena, and the Spanish blockading squadron at anchor before it, slept in the moonlight.

We were civilly received by the captain, who apologized for the discomfort under which we must pass the night. He gave us the best he had, and that was bad enough, both of food and wine, before shewing us into the hut, where we found a rough deal coffin lying on the very bench that was to be our bed. This he ordered away with all the coolness in the world. "It was only one of his people who had died that morning of comito, or yellow fever." "Comfortable country this," quoth Splinter, "and a pleasant morning we have had of it, Tom!"

Military Events of the late French Revolution; or, An Account of the Conduct of the Royal Guard on that occasion. By a Staff-Officer of the Guards. Translated from the French.

The French Revolution of 1830; The Events which produced it, and the Scenes by which it was accompanied. By D. Turnbull, Esq.

THESE two publications reached us nearly at the same time. The one is a brief pamphlet, the other a bulky volume; and if merit, or even importance, were to be judged by size, we should certainly be inclined to notice Mr Turnbull's production first. But not being at all of the opinion of that learned Dutchman, who observed,

" My broder be de great poet,
Who all de world must please,
For he have writte ron book
As big as all dis chiese,"

—We quote from memory—we shall begin with the pamphlet, which is decidedly the most interesting document that has hitherto been published upon those celebrated TREI JOURS, which overturned a throne, and changed a dynasty.

Before proceeding to our task, let us still make one or two observations. First, it may be necessary to state, that we know nothing of either of the authors under our review. We sit down impartially to consider both. We have no predisposition to exalt the Staff-Officer above Mr Turnbull, or to raise Mr Turnbull at the expense of the Staff-Officer; and, in every respect, we are perfectly unprejudiced towards either of them. Our feeling we do certainly entertain on the subject of their writing. We have heard, for the last three months, of an immense deal of disgusting boasting on the late French Revolution, till our very stomachs turn at the reiteration of the words heroism, enthusiasm, patriotism, from the burlesque absurdities to which those noble names have been applied; and we certainly shall feel and express unqualified disgust wherever we meet with that turgid exaggeration which caricatures great actions by vain hyperbole.

Amongst the multitude of publications to which the late Revolution in France has given rise, there have been two great wants, which every one who wished to form for himself a sane judgment of that extraordinary event, must have felt and lamented. The first of these wants has been, a statement of the party who succumbed in the struggle. On this point we have hitherto had no light. The motives on which the King and his Ministers acted, have been surmised; but, of the actual current of events—of those movements and actions, which are always so disfigured by party prejudice, and in regard to which no just conclusion can be drawn, without examining and comparing the accounts on both sides—of these, we know nothing. But from the faction which has triumphed. The second great want, has been any publication on the subject, giving a calm unexaggerated history of facts, without any touch of that caricatured excitement of feeling which the French so often mistake for enthusiasm, or of that bombast of language, which they fancy the sublime. We have seen nothing before the publication of the pamphlet under our notice, but partial statements, exaggerated by all the gasconade of highly stimulated vanity.

"The Account of a Staff-Officer of the Guards," in a great measure remedies both these defects in the history of the Revolution. The style is clear, unaffected, dignified; enough of the Frenchman and of the partisan appears to leave on the mind of the reader the strongest moral conviction of its authenticity; while wounded pride, and national vanity, and some degree of generous indignation, are all tempered by a high tone of gentlemanly feeling. The matter is as valuable as the manner is agreeable and convincing. A clear brief statement is given of all the movements of the royal troops opposed to the Parisian mob. The refutation of innumerable errors is thus obtained, and half the tumid pretensions of the victors are put down by the plain tale of a hundred pages. We must, however, enter more into detail, without at all wishing to steal the pith and marrow of a pamphlet, which ought to form part of the library of every one who wishes to know and preserve the history of the time in which he lives.

The pamphlet opens with the motives which induce the author to publish an account of the conduct of the Royal Guard during the Revolution; the origin of which motives is to be found in the ungenerous calumnies with which this corps had been assailed for keeping their oath, and doing their duty. The author proceeds to point out, that the French army, like the army of every other nation, is subject to a peculiar code of laws; and he then states the oath taken by every military man, in the following words:

"I swear to be faithful to the King, to obey my superior officers under his authority, and never to abandon my colours!"

It is too certainly a fact, that by the multitude of revolutions and changes, which, within the last thirty years, have taken place in France, that sacred thing, an oath, sanctified as it ought to be, both by religion and honour, has unfortunately become cheap and almost valueless in that country. What king, what government, what people, can depend upon vows that have been broken thirteen times; and the whole world, when it hears the French nation take its new oath to its new king, may be inclined to exclaim with Talleyrand, "Pray God it be the last!" However that may be, honour be to those who have kept their oaths. There certainly may be occasions on which two duties contend, and then the highest, to the best of our judgment, must be preferred; but the French guards had but one course to follow with honour, and they followed it.

A statement of the effective force in Paris, which could be brought to act against any tumultuous assemblage, comes next, by which we find that,

"On the 25th of July, 1830, the garrison of Paris was composed as follows —

Remain effective and disposable on the morning of the 28th July, Infantry, Cavalry, and Artillery 4200

This is, perhaps, the most extraordinary fact which has yet appeared in regard to the Revolution, that, at the moment when the council of Charles X. contemplated the annihilation of that anarchical and revolutionary spirit which had shewn itself for nearly two years, by a great and unprecedented exertion of the royal authority, there should not have been at hand to support its measures, above six thousand troops in whom any reliance could be placed.

In the annals of political infatuation—too extensive a page in the book of history—no parallel folly can be found. One conclusion may, however, be fairly drawn from this fact, namely, that both the King and his ministers firmly believed that the ordonnances which were issued on the 25th of July were just and reasonable. Had they looked upon those ordonnances as that gross violation of law which they undoubtedly were, some force would have been prepared to maintain them: but no force was provided, and that this negligence was the effect of a feeling of security, rather than any difficulty in procuring steady and loyal troops, is evinced by the statement, that, at a week's notice, the guards and household troops who remained firm to the last, might have been increased in number to nearly twenty thousand effective men, by calling in the detachments stationed at Caen, Rouen, Campéigne, Fontainebleau, and other places not far from Paris. As another proof of the confidence of the ministers, the pamphlet states, that

“On that day the 26th mobs collected in various parts of the town. The windows of the Minister of Finance, and of M. de Polignac on the Boulevard, were broken; but still no precaution on the part of the police—no measure whatever taken by the military authorities. — and such was the blind security in which the Government seemed plunged, that the officers who asked as usual temporary leaves of absence, obtained them without demur.”

In this state of self-confident security was the French Government when the tumultuous assemblages and vehement harangues of the morning of the 27th gave notice, that the people, in whose minds the seeds of revolution had for months been sown by the inflammatory addresses of the periodical press, were preparing to take advantage of the monarch's imprudence, and to make it a pretext for instantly accomplishing the work that had been long meditated.* The king, by the ordonnances he issued, strove to defend his crown against this long meditated Revolution, but by the illegality of his measures he afforded the pretext, and by the absence of preparation afforded the means, of carrying the purpose of the people into execution.

On the evening of the 27th this purpose became no longer a matter of doubt; and the Officer of the Guards goes on to detail the real events of the tumult which occurred on that day. The actors in that tumult were supplied from the lowest dregs of the Parisian population; but it was easy to see, by the immense number of discharged workmen, that this was only a screen behind which more powerful engines were in preparation, and that shortly the operations of the Revolution would be openly conducted by those who had been long labouring for it.

No event of any great import is noted during the course of that day, except the active commencement of hostilities between the people and the royal troops. On this subject, the writer affirms, that after repeated attacks on the part of the people, the guards fired twice in the air before they proceeded to retaliate upon the multitude the violence to which they had themselves so long submitted. Enough surely had taken place before the close of that momentous day, to warn the members of the government of the popular feeling. Had they possessed eyes they must have seen, had they had ears they must have heard, the awful signs of a roused-up nation. Then was the moment to concede if they found that they had mistaken the feelings of their country,—if they found that they had neither justice nor power to support them;—then was the moment to have used every exertion, and to have prepared every means, if they felt that right and strength were on their side;—then was the moment to have displayed their whole force, their whole activity, their whole wisdom, to guard against the possibility of reverse, and to render the struggle as short as mercy could desire. Instead of such precaution, what is the picture presented to us by an eye-witness and a principal actor in the scenes he describes?

* Such is the admission made by M. Guizot in his speech to the Chamber of Deputies, 25th November. “The movement,” he says, “was spontaneous, universal, national; when once it broke out, not an arm, not even a voice, was raised against it. The reason is, that it had long been maturing.” Again,—“before having even been accomplished by deed, it existed already in the minds of men.”

“Almost the whole strength of the garrison had been already employed, and it was evident it would have to face next day an increased force of from 60,000 to 80,000 men, of which a great portion would be armed. There were known to exist in Paris 10,000 equipments of the old National Guard; the attempts on the gunsmiths’ shops had not altogether failed; at daybreak they might be expected to be renewed, and the several guard-houses scattered through the town, which could offer no resistance, would of course afford a considerable number of muskets; the Arsenal was well supplied both with arms and ammunition. The powder-magazine of Deux-Moulins was unguarded. All these points ought to have been considered and provided for. This night offered leisure to arrange, and opportunity to execute, all necessary precautions;—the circumstances were urgent,—the danger obvious and imminent, yet NOTHING AT ALL WAS DONE. All that I have just stated was represented to the proper authorities, but nothing was attended to, blindness, folly, and fatality, were triumphant.

“At eleven o’clock the troops were ordered to return to their respective quarters; the streets through which they had to pass were dark and silent; the capital looked, as it were, motionless. ‘The voice of the great city was still.’ It was, they now tell us, this very silence and apparent tranquillity that contributed to strengthen the fancied security of M. de Polignac—a security in which Marshal Marmont, it would seem, at least participated.”

We must now proceed to the military operations of the 28th, when Paris was declared in a state of siege, and Marmont, Duke of Ragusa, took the command of the royal forces. Be it remarked, that after clearing the streets the night before, the troops had been marched back to their barracks, where they remained without orders till eight o’clock the next morning. During this time the whole of the town remained unguarded; and long before eight the people were in arms, the detached guard-houses, the arsenal, and the powder magazine, were attacked and taken, and the Hotel de Ville was in the hands of the populace ere a single battalion had quitted its barracks. When at length the troops were assembled on the Place du Caroussel, where Marmont had established his head-quarters, that officer proceeded to act upon a plan which might have been very successful had he possessed a force of fifty—thirty—nay, twenty thousand men; but which naturally proved abortive when attempted by an army not exceeding eleven thousand in number, of which only six thousand could be depended upon. The author before us takes the following review of the Duke of Ragusa’s scheme. His surmises are evidently very near the truth, and the deductions from them are beyond doubt correct.

“But the troops at his disposal did not, either in number or spirit, suffice for the execution of such a plan. The delay which prevented the 15th light infantry occupying the Place de Grève wholly disarranged it; and, to confess the truth, the attitude and spirit of the regiments of the Line were alone sufficient to defeat that, or even a better digested arrangement.

We shall soon see that the neutrality of the Line was not only the real cause of the final result of the contest, but that it was the special occasion of the terrible struggle which took place on the 28th at the Hôtel de Ville, and on other points. It left the Guards isolated and unsupported, and with no alternative but to fight, as it were, a fatal duel with the people to extricate themselves from the position in which they were placed, and to fight under the dispiriting conviction that the defence or abandonment of the positions were alike destitute of any real military advantage."

Finding that the 15th regiment of the line, which had been ordered to occupy the Place de Grève and the Hôtel de Ville, had not accomplished that object, and shewed no inclination to attempt it, Marmont commanded four separate detachments to march in different directions through the city, thus involving his troops in the most intricate parts of the town, without the possibility of mutual co-operation or support. We shall, however, only follow one of these detachments which marched upon the Hôtel de Ville, and which it is now beyond doubt, the Staff-Officer, whose work is before us, accompanied on its painful and dangerous enterprise. It proceeded from the Place du Carousel to the Pont Neuf, where it met with the 15th of the line, which afterwards refused to act, and which, even then, seems to have hesitated to do its duty. One of the battalions, however, was here joined to the guards, and the rest were stationed to support the force which was marching on the Place de Grève. The detachment then crossed the Pont Neuf, and advancing by the Marché aux Fleurs, prepared to re-pass the river by the Pont Notre Dame, making a demonstration, however, on the Suspension-bridge, to deceive the Insurgents in the Place de Grève. The attack and taking of the Place de Grève is then described as follows:

"While these arrangements were making, the mob, which had since the morning been collecting in the Place de Grève and all the neighbourhood, advanced, in something like order, to occupy the Pont Notre Dame, and they, perhaps, also hoped to reach the Pont au Change and the Palais de Justice. They came down the Rue des Arcis, which leads to the north end of Pont Notre Dame, with drums in front, and headed by a few individuals who appeared to be their leaders. The two guns of the column of Guards, which had been halted at the end of the bridge next the Marché aux Fleurs, were now advanced to the centre of the bridge. At this moment a field-officer* of the Guards advanced across the bridge to meet the Insurgents; he pointed out to the leaders the position of the guns, and explained that they were marching to certain destruction, and he conjured them, in the name of humanity, to retire. The drums ceased to beat, and the crowd withdrew to the left and right, but they fired some shots, one of which killed an adjutant who had accompanied the field-officer. It was then that the guns fired one shot each, and the Quays de Gesvres and Pelletier, at the north end of the bridge, were occupied by the Guards. The people skirmished a little from the windows of the Rue des Arcis, and the corner of the Rue de la Tannerie.

"The detachment which crossed by the Suspension-bridge ought not to have come beyond the arch which supports that bridge till the other party, crossing the Pont Notre Dame, had reached the Place by the Quay Pelletier; but the impetuosity of the commanding officer hastened this movement, and, for a short time, exposed his detachment to the whole fire of the Place, and the windows of the surrounding houses. At length, however, the Place was taken, and the people in the houses remained quiet. A firing was still kept up from the angles of the Rue du Mouton, which enters the Place from the northward, and in which there was a barricade, which, however, the troops carried. The guns were placed in battery on the Place, and pointed towards the Quay de la Cité, and the entrance of the Pont de la Cité, which leads over into the Rue St Louis de l'Isle. It was, indeed, all that could be done with them, for the height of the parapet wall of the Quay prevented their being directed to any other point. I must here observe, once for all, that the eight guns, which were distributed, two and two, to the several columns, were nowhere of much use, and were everywhere a considerable embarrassment. We have heard a great deal of the grape and canister shot (mitraille) supposed to have mowed down so many thousand Insurgents; but I repeat, with a full certainty of the truth of my assertion, that there were but four rounds of that kind of shot."

* The author of the pamphlet. It is generally believed.

After several hours of severe fighting, being attacked in their position by the continual efforts of the people, the Commandant of the Guards determined to retire into the Hotel de Ville, and limit his operations to the defence of that place. We must again give his own words:—

"Having determined to occupy the Hotel de Ville, it became necessary to abandon the Place and its outposts, and limit the defence to the Hotel itself. This edifice covers an island, if I may so call it, formed by the streets of La Truanderie—Moureaux-St-Gervais, and La Martellière. The troops caused all the apartments to be opened which had windows on the Place and surrounding streets, and they were occupied by sharpshooters of the Guards. They obtained cartridges from the regiment of the Line; and, when all was ready, the Swiss and grenadiers of the Guards were withdrawn from the Place. The barricade at the Rue du Monton was confided to the light infantry of the Guards. This movement was mistaken by the insurgents for a retreat, and they followed it up with another general attack; but the fire from the windows of the building—now for the first time used for this purpose—defeated this attempt; and even the purlieus in the back streets, in which the insurgents had been safe all day, became now, by the fire from the apartments, wholly untenable; and the Parisians suffered considerably. Towards night, a non-commissioned officer, in disguise, arrived to announce that the second column from the Porte St Antoine would not come to the Place de Greve—this was already known by means of the detachment of Cuirassiers—and that the troops in the Hotel de Ville were to make their retreat to the Tuileries how they could.

"There was now nothing to be done but to execute this retreat in good order, which, however, was only rendered difficult by the number of wounded, to the amount of between fifty and sixty, whom they would not abandon, and by the guns, which they would have to get over the barricades; this last obstacle, however, the excellence and mobility of the newly-constructed carriages rendered comparatively light. The wounded were the real embarrassment; but their comrades undertook to carry them. There was now only to fix the hour, and the line of, the retreat. The first line seemed to be that by which they had come. The Quay aux Fleurs is very wide. The Quay de l'Horloge is sheltered, during the greater part of its length, by the buildings of the Palais de Justice and the Conciergerie; and the houses are but thinly inhabited.

"It is known that the Parisians never disarrange themselves as to hours. They had fought well all day; at eleven o'clock the moon would be down; the lamps were broken. People do not willingly remain chatting in the dark when they have deeds of prowess to tell to admiring hearers at home; it was therefore concluded that the way would be clear at midnight, and that hour was finally fixed on."

We have heard so much of the heroism of the people of Paris, of the feats that they performed, and the mighty things which they accomplished, that we were inclined to imagine, on the first view, that some two or three thousand citizens had defeated an immensely superior force of regular troops; instead of two hundred thousand armed men, with the advantage of houses which were fortresses, and streets which were defiles, having maintained their city against six thousand brave, but ill-commanded and unwilling, soldiers. It may be as well to hear the estimate which one of their countrymen, whose national prejudices are balanced in some degree by his esprit de corps, forms of the efforts of the Parisians:—

"As to the energy displayed by the people, it is undeniable: every account from individual officers, and every official report, concur in establishing the fact. But truth must, on the other hand, be also told: for instance, the kind of attack and defence which was most effective in the hands of the Parisians, was that which was attended with the least danger:—I mean—war from the windows. All the barricades, about which we have heard so much, were cleared by the troops. The open attacks made by the people in mass, could only be mere failures—an idle waste of life. At the Hotel de Ville, where they made simultaneous efforts on every side, and where fresh assailants were ready to relieve those that were either wounded or wearied, they made no impression; for it is now indisputable, that this edifice was not, during the whole of the 28th, retaken by the people; and after it was evacuated at midnight by the Guards, it remained unoccupied and deserted till the morning of the 29th. It must be admitted, however, that in the efforts which were made to retake it, we recognise the military instinct and courage of the bravest nation in the world."

Amongst the mistakes and follies of that ever memorable week, which are recorded with truth, nature brevity, and force, in the pamphlet before us, we shall only select one more example; and that less from its interest, however great that may be, than as the well-substantiated account of an event which has been invested with a thousand false and ridiculous forms. We allude to the taking of the Louvre, which is thus described by the Officer of the French guards—

"The Marshal, as we have just stated, had sent for one of the two battalions of Swiss which happened to be under the orders of the same officer who had so strangely lost his way in proceeding to the Marché des Innocens, the day before. This officer, on this regulation, determined to send to the Marshal precisely en vau over of his two battalions which defended the whole position namely, that which occupied the colonnade and galleries of the Louvre, all the interior communications of which had been opened for that purpose. With the other battalion he remained quietly in the interior court below.

"When the Parisians observed that the firing from the colonnade and windows of the Louvre had ceased, whether it was that the proposition for the suspension of arms had not reached them, (which I believe, though I cannot assert it, or whether they thought the opportunity of breaking the truce too advantageous to be lost, they approached the edifice, and, finding no opposition, got into the garden called de l'Intante which is in front of the Louvre, finding still no opposition they got in at the lower windows and glass doors, and took possession of the whole interior of the edifice. They first occupied the windows which looked into the inner court, and fired on the battalion below. Others ran along the great picture-gallery, filling every window, and firing on the troops in the Place du Carrousel.

"The recent news of the desertion of the line, and this sudden appearance of the insurgents over their heads along the whole of that vast line, and, perhaps, also, some recollections of the 10th August, disordered the imaginations of the Swiss. Having attempted in vain to recall the Parisians to the armistice, they left the Louvre, and left it with precipitation and in disorder. When they arrived at the Carrousel, they found there their third battalion, in presence of the Parisians, who were posted all around, but observing, on both sides, the suspension of arms. The retreating battalion was hotly pursued by the fire of the Parisians, and, at this moment, those who occupied the windows of the picture gallery opened their fire on the Swiss, and, above all, on the two squadrons of Lancers, which were, as I have before described, cooped up in the railed enclosure of the Tuilleries. This example instigated the Parisians, on the other side, to break the armistice, and they also recommenced firing on the whole body of troops in the Carrousel."

The retreat of the royal forces—the operations at St Cloud, Versailles, and other places, are related with that clearness, vigour, and detail, which nothing but personal knowledge can give. The ridiculous bravades of the Parisians at Rambouillet, are treated with the calm contempt they deserve; and the final separation of the royal family from their faithful guards, is painted with the beautiful simplicity of nature and true feeling. As a last quotation from this most interesting work, we cannot refrain from selecting this specimen:—

"At seven o'clock, Charles X. quitted the chateau of M de Nouilles. The Guards were under arms, and formed in order of battle along the sides of the road, to pay the last honours to that unhappy family, in whose service they had been for sixteen years.

"This last farewell of soldiers, who could not repress their tears is probably the most sincere homagium that those princes have ever received. Although they might have committed some faults, misfortunes so great and unexpected could not but meet with sympathy, especially in a country whose love for its kings had so long been a kind of passion, and even in our own days had burst forth with transports almost unanimous.

"The Duchesse de Berni having in her carriage Madame de Contant and her children, preceded the Dauphine, whom her husband escorted on horseback.

"Charles X. came next, followed by the Commissioners of the Government, and after wards, some carriages of the suite, and some baggage-carts. The arms on the carriages had been defaced, even on that of the King.

"The Duke of Ragusa was by the door of the King's carriage, the Body Guard, and the dragons of the Guard, who went as far as Dreux, preceded and followed this melancholy train, which passed very slowly in front of the ranks. The Princesses, in tears, bade farewell to the officers and soldiers. The Dauphine said to several of the superior officers, Bonne nuit, gentlemen—oh! be well warned, that I have had no share whatever in all this.

"The Duke de Bordeaux and his sister bowed mournfully; they seemed not to be exempted from those moral sufferings which rarely affect childhood.

"Charles X., much affected, and with tears in his eyes, returned the salute of those flags which were no longer to be the colours of the troops whom he now saw for the last time.

"Here ended all the obligations which connected the Guards with the Bourbons. They had fulfilled them, as it was their duty to do, and as they had determined that they would, saying to themselves, 'Do your duty—come what may!'"

We have read this work with pleasure, and close it with regret; and fully convinced that it will remain as one of the most important historical records of our own times, we thank the translator for having given it to the British public. Every page of the work induces us to place the firmest reliance on the author's veracity. There is the distinctness, there is the simplicity, there is the moderation of truth throughout the whole; and, at all events, the brevity and clearness with which each fact is mentioned, leave little room for misstatement, and no possibility of obscurity. If the author has stated any one thing that is false, he is the boldest man that ever lived, for he has done so in the face of a vain and excited population, the interest of whose pride and whose selfishness, is instantly to contradict him. Some errors, probably, he may have fallen into, with regard to the operations on those points where he was not present himself; but, with respect to the numerical strength of the royal forces—to the movements of the various detachments—to the whole of the operations in the Place de Grève, and at the Hotel de Ville, and to all the after circumstances in which the Guards were concerned, we will venture to say, that the statement of the Staff Officer cannot be false. An immense mass of valuable information is thus given to the world, and an immense mass of falsehood and nonsense is consigned to the place it is fitted for.

Having now stated our opinion of the pamphlet, we turn to the more bulky volume of Mr Turnbull, which is, in fact, a repertory of all the vapouring of the French Revolution. To do the work the most perfect justice, we have read it from beginning to end without passing over one single sentence—a feat for which we should deserve more credit, if Mr Turnbull's style were as bad as his matter; but that is not the case, and it is but fair to confess, that the language, without being brilliant or forcible, is flowing, pleasant, and as correct as the printers would suffer it to be. The principal difference between this volume and the brief pamphlet we have noticed first, is, that in the "Account of a Staff Officer," we find much that is new and interesting; in the book of Mr Turnbull, we find nothing but what has been hawked from newspaper to newspaper, from daily to weekly, and from weekly to monthly publications, without either gaining elegance or correctness by the transfer. We do firmly believe, that Mr Turnbull has not stated, and would not on any account state, what he did not imagine to be fact; but we may be allowed to doubt his sources of information, which do not appear on the face of his book; and to reject entirely those statements which are contradicted by better authority. An author may sit down with the fullest determination to speak the truth, but if he have not sufficient discrimination to find out that well, at the bottom of which Truth is hidden, according to the old maxim, and to draw from that and none other, his account will be as different from the matter-of-fact, as the naughtiest puddle in the High Street is from the limpid water of Sir William Wallace's well. Such is the case with Mr Turnbull. He sat down to tell the truth beyond all doubt, but he wanted either the time or the judgment to find it; and instead, he has carefully collected, preserved, published, and transmitted to the butter-shops, all the hyperbolical bombast with which the vainest nation in the world has puffed out, befeathered, befurbelowed, and befrizzled one of her ex-pobits.

But we must justify these remarks by extracts; and here let us observe, that in comparing the book called "The French Revolution in 1830," with the account of the Staff Officer, we shall only assume that the latter is correct on those points where the author's means of information were the most perfect that could be obtained, and where his situation rendered mis-statement—impossible—we were about to say ; but if not impossible, in the highest degree improbable.

We shall take Mr Turnbull's book chapter by chapter, to do it all manner of justice. The first division of the work purposes to be a sketch of the events which preceded the late Revolution, from the restoration of the Bourbon family ; and in this we have a repetition, or rather a summary, of all the abuse with which the revolutionary faction have bespattered the royal family, together with many of those anecdotes, to which the prolific manufactories of the Parisian saloons give birth and currency every day. The marvellous intimacy and acquaintance with the most minute particulars of the private life of Charles X. which Mr Turnbull possesses—his knowledge of what ministers and statesmen did not know—of what passed at the privy-council, and of what passed behind the backs of the privy-councillors,—excites at once our astonishment, our admiration, and our delight. In regard to the disbanding of the National Guard, Mr Turnbull gives some most luminous passages, which rather differ from our own reminiscences. It had appeared to us, that the National Guard, when Charles the Tenth reviewed them in the Champ de Mars, received their monarch with seditious, and almost treasonable cries, and were, therefore, wisely disbanded for the sake of public tranquillity. However, Mr Turnbull differs from us ; and far be it from us to rebel against such authority.

Next appear the royal ordonnances, and the report of the council in which they originated. With regard to this report, we must say one word. Though the measures adopted upon it were unwise and illegal ; and though the conclusions drawn from the premises, even in the report itself, are false, yet the picture it affords of the state of France prior to the Revolution, the abuse of the liberty of the press, which it portrays, and the natural consequences of an impending popular commotion, which it anticipates, were positive and absolute facts, which no one will doubt, who looks over the files of the National, the Tems, and the Globe after it became a daily paper. We extract the passage—

" At no time for these fifteen years has this situation presented itself under a more serious and more afflicting aspect. Notwithstanding an actual prosperity, of which our annals afford no example, signs of disorganization and symptoms of anarchy manifest themselves at almost every point of the kingdom.

" The successive causes which have concurred to weaken the springs of the monarchical government tend now to impair and to change the nature of it. Stripped of its moral force, authority, both in the capital and the provinces, no longer contends, but at a disadvantage, with the factious. Perulcious and subversive doctrines, loudly professed, are spread and propagated among all classes of the population. Alarms, too generally credited, agitate people's minds, and trouble society. On all sides the present is called upon for pledges of security for the future.

" An active, ardent, indefatigable malevolence, labours to ruin all the foundations of order, and to snatch from France the happiness she enjoys under the sceptre of her kings. Skillful in turning to advantage all discontents, and in exciting all hatreds, it foment among the people a spirit of distrust and hostility towards power, and endeavours to sow every where the seeds of trouble and civil war ; and already, Sire, recent events have proved that political passions, hitherto confined to the upper portion of society, begin to penetrate the depths of it, and to stir up the popular classes. It is proved also, that these masses can never move without danger, even to those who endeavour to rouse them from repose.

" A multitude of facts collected in the course of the electoral operations confirm these data, and would offer us the too certain presage of new commotions, if it were not in the power of your majesty to avert the misfortune."

The chapter by which this is succeeded, professes to shew the effect of the ordonnances on the Parisian populace. How far Mr Turnbull is right in his view, we cannot say. We have no doubt that he was in every part of Paris on the evening of Monday ; but in regard to the following passage—

" The Champs Elysees, which, on a summer evening, present so many joyous groups around the bands of itinerant musicians, the jugglers, the marionnettes, and other sources of amusement, so liberally provided for them, presented on this evening, and alas ! on more evenings than this, a very different spectacle"— we can only say, that we are now sitting with a gentleman, who drove through the Champs Elysées, late on that identical evening, and he now informs us, that never did he behold a more gay or lively scene. Never, during a long residence in France, did he see the promenade more thronged with carriages, horses, and pedestrians.

In the next chapter, we come to the beginning of the tumults; and here it is, that the statement being more precise, we more easily discover the egregious mistakes into which Mr Turnbull has suffered himself to be led.

As a specimen, we give the statement of the royal preparations for putting down the rising of the people:

"While the representatives of the people, and the occupants of the judgment-seat, were thus discharging the high functions confided to them, in a manner so honourable to their integrity and independence, the capital and its environs were every instant assuming a more threatening and alarming aspect. It was already known that the command of the troops of the garrison, consisting of 12,000 men of the royal French and Swiss Guard, the 5th, 80th, and 33d regiments of the line, the 10th regiment of light horse, and a formidable train of artillery, had been placed under the command of the Marshal Marmont, Duke of Ragusa."

We have already given the statement of the Staff-officer, who, on this point, could not mistake, and who, we will venture to say, neither wished nor dared to falsify. By the comparison of the two accounts, if we calculate each of the regiments of the line mentioned by Mr Turnbull at 1100 men, we shall find that, including the guards, according to his statement of their number, he overrates the garrison by nearly 4000 men, besides one whole regiment of cavalry. Some deductions also must surely be made from "a formidable train of artillery," when reduced to eight guns and four howitzers which were never used. On this chapter, which ends with the famous Marseillois Hymn, we shall only make one farther observation, namely, that if the new Sovereign have, as stated by Mr Turnbull, granted a pension to the composer of that song, who dared to call the good, the mild, the benevolent Louis XVI. a "Despot sanguinaire," we shall deeply lament, that to fawn upon a faction, Louis Philippe has sacrificed all title to respect.

In the next chapter, we shall select one or two of the passages which are formally contradicted by the account of the Staff-officer, on points where his authority must be considered paramount. In the first instance, Mr Turnbull states, that—

"Towards eight o'clock on Wednesday morning, the scene of strife had become general in all those quarters of the town which during the previous night, had been occupied by the royal forces."

As we have seen, the Staff-officer declares, that at eight o'clock the troops were quiet in their barracks.

Again, we find the following account of the march of the troops to the Place de la Bastille:

"At that moment the report of musketry, at the distance of two hundred paces, announced that an engagement had commenced under the eyes of the observer. He could perceive decided symptoms of commotion in all the neighbouring lines which opened into the boulevard. The cry was then heard of 'Fermez vos fenêtres'" and at the same instant a strong body of troops made their appearance, marching in close column the whole breadth of the boulevard, and in double quick time. The column was preceded by a party of tirailleurs, who fired as they advanced, sometimes in the air to clear the way on their approach, and sometimes at the windows, from the fear, no doubt, lest, if open, the inhabitants should fire from them on the troops. The jalousies, or outer window-blinds of the old man's chamber had been left open; and as they were fastened to the wall, he was quite unable to rise for the purpose of closing them. A soldier of the Royal Guard, mistaking perhaps the crutches which stood by him for some instrument of offence, presented his piece at the window, and fired, but missed his object. A regiment of Infantry having thus passed, there followed a squadron of lancers, with a detachment of cuirassiers, and several pieces of artillery. They were all of the Royal Guard, horse as well as foot, and amounted, by the observer's estimate, to some two thousand men. They took up their position on the Place de la Bastille, and had scarcely arrived there when the sound of musketry, first in files, and afterwards in platoons, announced that the progress of the troops had been opposed.

In so open a space, and under such circumstances, opposition on the part of the inhabitants was an unjustifiable act of temerity. After considerable loss on both sides, they were soon obliged to retire before the column, which then advanced as far as the angle, formed by the carrefour de Reuilly. There the troops of the guard received a reinforcement of a battalion of infantry, and two additional pieces of cannon, from the garrison at Vincennes."

The whole forces here magnified to a host, we find, by the Officer's account, to have consisted of 520 men, and two guns.

The next information we derive from Mr Turnbull, is as follows:—

"The inhabitants of Paris had been suffering all the horrors of a siege long before the appearance of the edict by which it was declared. Its preparation was perhaps called for by the Duke of Ragusa, as his warrant for assuming the command of the troops, and entering the city at their head. This he did at ten o'clock on Wednesday morning. The column under his immediate command consisted of six thousand men and eight pieces of cannon. He entered the city by the quays on the left bank of the Seine, ascended that side of the river, took possession of the Pont Neuf, and ordered an attack on the Hotel de Ville, which was at that time occupied by the National Guards.

"But in marching along the quays, the troops were still exposed on one side to the attacks of the citizens, who did not hesitate to fire on this strong body of men, from the windows of their houses, and from behind the parapets, which occur in various parts of the route. It is said, however, that the men, who had just arrived from Sevres, in the neighbourhood of Saint Cloud, had there received every species of excitement to the performance of their murderous task. They had been passed in review by the Duke d'Angoulême, who had caused a distribution of money, wine, and brandy, to be made among them. The money was given in the proportion of thirty, forty, and fifty francs a man, to the privates of the Foot Guards, the Swiss, and the Lancers, respectively. Crosses of the Legion of Honour were promised to the officers, and were actually bestowed on them in great profusion, before the departure of the royal family for Rambouillet.

"But to return from this digression to the scene of operations on the Boulevards: At the head of the Rue Montmartre, an affair took place in which Marmont commanded in person. During some part of the day, the Place des Victoires had been occupied by troops, part of whom, consisting of a detachment of the line, had been observed to fraternize with the post of National Guards established at the Petits-Pereux. About two o'clock, the Marshal made his appearance on the Place des Victoires, at the head of fresh troops. These he placed in observation at the openings of the Rue de Mail, the Rue des Fosses Montmartre, the Rue Croix des Petits-Champs, and the Rue Neuve des Petits-Champs. A charge was then ordered, which produced a great number of casualties on the side of the troops, as well as of the people. The detachment placed in the Rue de Mail was led by Marmont in person. He entered the Rue Montmartre, and traversed some portion of it without much opposition; but having advanced as far as the Rue Joquelet, the resistance offered by the citizens became so obstinate, and was attended with so much effect, that the Marshal and those under his command found it necessary to fall back on their former position in the Place des Victoires."

This is as fine a piece of imaginary history as we remember to have met with. That it is entirely imaginary, the reader may at once convince himself, by looking over the evidence given before the Chamber of Peers, by Monsieur de Romierowski, Marmont's aide-de-camp, by which he will find that the Duke de Ragusa entered Paris on the Tuesday, not on the Wednesday,—alone, not accompanied by six thousand men; and that, instead of marching up the quays to the Pont Neuf, and ordering an attack on the Hotel de Ville, he drove, in his carriage, up the Boulevards, and walked into Monsieur de Polignac's. Then, if the reader will turn to page 43 of the Staff-officer's account, he will meet with a complete contradiction to the absurd report of the Duke of Ragusa having headed the troops himself in their conflicts with the people. He never quitted his head-quarters, except for the purpose of visiting the posts at the Bank and the Palais Royal, which, to use the words of the Staff-officer—he did, "accompanied by three aides-de-camp, and the usual escort; but his passage did not even make any difference in the position of the troops." Mr Turnbull, however, yields the Marshal the honour of many a well-fought battle in the streets of Paris; and we hear of his marching here, and counter-marching there, with a promptitude and precision which would have delighted Major Sturgeon, had that respectable and ever-to-be-lamented officer been now alive.

Perhaps these instances of egregious error might be sufficient to give the work at once its due place; but we must notice one more passage, which fairly outdoes all its fellows. This refers to the taking of the Hotel de Ville, and we cannot refrain from giving it at length.

"As the Hotel de Ville was a position of considerable importance, the Place de Grève, and the other avenues which lead to it, became the scene of several bloody engagements. In the course of Wednesday, the 28th, the town-hall had been taken and retaken, perhaps ten or twelve different times, by the National Guard and the citizens on the one hand, and the regular troops on the other; and, as the resistance was as obstinate as the attack was courageous, the struggle was necessarily attended with a dreadful slaughter. When the people were the assailants, they rushed out from a number of points on the Arcade Saint Jean, the streets De la Fixanderie and De Monton, the iron bridge, and the adjoining quays. The importance of this central point was felt on all sides, from the great moral influence it would give to the insurgents, through the establishment of a provisional government. Every effort was, in consequence, employed for securing its permanent possession; but, by turns, the chances were favourable and unfavourable to the popular cause. It was nightfall when the firing was interrupted, and then only to be begun again at an early hour on Thursday morning. So many efforts of heroism were crowned at length with complete success. Tired out and disheartened by the constant renewal of the masses opposed to them, the royalist forces were finally forced to evacuate this dangerous post; and there also floated the victorious colours of the nation."

We have but one little sentence to place against this; but that, with the touch of an enchanter's wand, dissolves this mighty fabric into "thin air."

"It is now indisputable," says the Officer who commanded in the Hotel de Ville, speaking in the face of all his fellow-countrymen—"It is now indisputable, that this edifice was not during the whole of the 28th retaken by the people, and after it had been evacuated at midnight by the guards, it remained unoccupied and deserted till the morning of the 29th."

"Ten or eleven times!!!" says Mr. Turnbull. Not once! says the eye-witness. "Utrum horum major?" But this to us is quite sufficient; and we shall say no more in regard to the accuracy of "Paris in 1830."

We must again repeat, that we have no doubt whatever that Mr. Turnbull believes every word which he has written; and judging from the date and several other passages of his preface, we are led to suppose that he lives in Paris, in the midst of scenes where passions have not yet subsided, and where facts are very slowly becoming divested of the exaggerations with which they have been obscured.

He states, also, that dispatch has been solicited of him in the composition of his work; and this, of course, has prevented him from accurately investigating every particular, ere he placed it on paper. We are sorry for it, for his own sake; for this book will not do him credit; and he will have much wherewith to reproach those, who have so hurried him with a work which would have required time and long investigation to have accomplished it properly. He does not want ability, and we hope to see something yet from his pen, very far superior to the production before us. Let us warn him, however, against a certain bad taste which he has caught from the most disagreeable class of French writers. All his anecdotes of heroic bakers, and generous printers, and independent blacksmiths, and disinterested Jews, are of this cast, as well as the details of patriotic lassies, and self-devoted midwives; but the worst of all is the tale of Dr. Fabré Palaprat. This gentleman, roaming through the streets of Paris, seeking whom he might cure, encountered the ugliest man imaginable, armed with a bloody sword, who fell down at his feet through pure inanition, and a wound in his left leg. The Doctor tended him, dressed his wound, and offered him a five franc piece to get some dinner; but so ungrateful was the ugly man with the wounded leg, that he started up, and nearly sabred the good Samaritan, for talking of money and dinner to a Parisian revolutionist!!! So infinitely edified was the Doctor with this attempt to sabre him, that he threw himself on the neck of the ugly man with the gunpowder face, and wept with admiration.—If Mr Turnbull fancies that such tales are calculated to promote any thing but laughter, he is mistaken.

Though we cannot, as we proposed at first, go through each chapter separately, let us remark, that the best of the book consists in two sketches of Lafayette and Louis Philippe, which are given with some spirit. Let Mr Turnbull choose a favourable subject, consider it dispassionately, and add to the sincere desire of truth, which we doubt not he possesses, the spirit of calm and patient investigation, which is absolutely necessary to find it; let him beware of spending high-sounding language on trifles, and of striving for enthusiasm where enthusiasm is not applicable, and we doubt not that we shall see from his hand, something which may distinguish him from the crowd, instead of a book that is of no service to the public, and no credit to himself.

In regard to the late Revolution, we must add one or two words: Let us first remark, that it is an extraordinary fact that Napoleon—who held the crown of France by the same rights as Louis Philippe, that is to say, by the choice of the people, called forth by the necessity of the moment—abdicated exactly upon the same conditions as Charles X., that is to say, provided the nation would receive his heir. In both instances the condition was rejected; and, consequently, the abdication, as a voluntary act, was null. At all events, it did not affect either the King of Rome, or the Duke of Bordeaux. Thus, when Louis Philippe, Charles X., and the Duke of Angoulême, shall have gone to that place whither Napoleon has preceded them, three young competitors will exist for the often contested throne of France, all three claiming by hereditary right alone—Time, the great hazard player, must decide the chances.

On the conduct of Charles X., there can be but little difference of opinion. With the best wishes for the good of his people, and with the fatal consequences of his brother's (Louis XVI.) mildness before his eyes, he thought to stem the tide of Revolution, which was overwhelming France, by a violent and ill-timed exertion of authority. It may be a question, whether, if he had refrained, he would have been still on the throne or not. Perhaps, when the revolutionary faction had thrown off its disguise, and stood forth in all the hideousness of its anarchical features, the good and moderate, at length undeceived, might have rallied round the throne, and protected the monarch from the insidious monster that had glided forward with a thousand convolutions, till it was ready to envelope him in its serpent folds. Perhaps their aid would have come too late, and he might still have succumbed; but in either case, had he refrained till the first blow was struck by his enemy, he would have had right and justice on his side. Had he triumphed, he would have triumphed with the dignity of moderation; and had he fallen, he would have received present sympathy and ultimate redress.

* * * Since writing these pages, a considerable body of evidence has appeared, given in the trial of the ex-ministers. This in every respect corroborates the testimony of the Staff-Officer, and justifies our opinion of the two works under our notice.

THE time is come when, without offence, the truth may be spoken of Dr Parr. Standing by the side of the grave, men's eyes, as it were, fastened upon the very coffin of an excellent person, all literary people under any restraint of honourable feelings—all writers who have trained themselves to habits of liberal sympathy and of generous forbearance—every body, in short, but the very rash or very juvenile, the intemperate or malignant—put a seal upon their lips. Grief, and the passionate exaggerations of grief, have a title to indulgent consideration, which, in the upper walks of literature, is not often infringed; amongst polished Tories, amongst the coterie of this journal, we may say—never. On this principle it was that we prescribed to ourselves most willingly a duty of absolute silence at the time of Dr Parr's death, and through the years immediately succeeding. The sorrow of his numerous friends was then keen and raw. For a warm-hearted man—and Dr Parr was such—there is an answerable warmth of regret. Errors and indiscretions are forgotten; virtues are brought forward into high relief; talents and accomplishments magnified beyond all proportions of truth. These extravagancies are even graceful and becoming under the immediate impulses which prompt them: and for a season they are, and ought to be, endured. But this season has its limits. Within those limits the rule is—De mortuis nil nisi bonum. Beyond them, and when the privilege of recent death can no longer be sustained, this rule gives way to another—De mortuis nil nisi verum et probabiliter demonstratum. This canon has now taken effect with regard to Dr Parr. The sanctities of private grief have been sufficiently respected, because the grief itself has submitted to the mitigation of time. Enough has been conceded to the intemperance of sorrowing friendship: the time has now arrived for the dispassionate appreciation of equity and unbiassed judgment.

Eighteen years have passed away since we first set eyes upon Dr Samuel Parr. Off and on through the nine or ten years preceding, we had heard him casually mentioned in Oxford, but not for any good. In most cases, the anecdote which brought up his name was some pointless parody of a Sam-Johnsonian increpation, some Drury-Lane counterfeit of the true Jovian thunderbolts:

Demens qui nimbos et non imitabile fulmen

Ere et cornipedum sonitu simularet equorum.

In no instance that we recollect had there appeared any felicity in these colloquial fulminations of Dr Parr. With an unlimited license of personal invective, and with an extravagance of brutality not credible, except in the case of one who happened to be protected by age and by his petticoats,—consequently with one power more than other people enjoy, who submit themselves to the restraints of courtesy, and to the decencies of social intercourse,—the Doctor had yet made nothing of his extra privilege, nor had so much as once attained a distinguished success. There was labour, indeed, and effort enough, preparation without end, and most tortuous circumgyration of periods; but from all this sonorous smithery of hard words in osity and ation, nothing emerged—no wrought massy product—but simply a voluminous smoke. Such had been the fortune, whether fairly representing the general case or not, second hand in respect to Dr Parr and his colloquial prowess. When we add, that in those years of teeming and fermenting intellects, at a crisis so agitating for human interests upon the very highest scale, no mere philologist or grammaticaster—though he had been the very best of his class—could have held much space in our thoughts; and, with respect to Dr Parr in particular, when we say that all avenues to our esteem had been foreclosed from our boyish days by one happy sarcasm of the Pursuits of Literature, where Parr had been nicknamed, in relation to his supposed model, the Birmingham Doctor;* and, finally, when we assure the reader that he was the one sole specimen of a whig parson that we had ever so much as heard of within the precincts of the Church of England;—laying together all this, it may be well presumed, that we did not anticipate much pleasure or advantage from an hour's admission to Dr Parr's society. In reality, having heard all the fine colloquial performers of our own times, we recoiled from the bare possibility of being supposed to participate in the curiosity or the interest which, in various degrees, possessed most of those who on that morning surrounded us. The scene of this little affair was—a front drawing-room in the London mansion of one of Dr Parr's friends. Here was collected a crowd of morning visitors to the lady of the house: and in a remote back drawing-room was heard, at intervals, the clamorous laugh of Dr Samuel Parr, then recently arrived from the country upon a visit to his London friend. The miscellaneous company assembled were speedily apprised who was the owner of that obstreperous laugh—so monstrously beyond the key of good society; it transpired, also, who it was that provoked the laugh; it was the very celebrated Bobus Smith. And, as a hope was expressed that one or both of these gentlemen might soon appear amongst us, most of the company lingered in the reasonable expectation of seeing Dr Sam,—we ourselves, on the slender chance of seeing Mr Bobus. Many of our junior readers, who cannot count back far beyond the year in question, (1812,) are likely to be much at a loss for the particular kind of celebrity, which illustrated a name so little known to fame in these present days, as this of Bobus Smith. We interrupt, therefore, our little anecdote of Dr Parr, with the slightest outline of Mr Smith's story and his pretensions. Bobus, then, (who drew his nickname, we conjecture, though the o was pronounced long, from subscribing the abbreviated form of Bobus, for his full name Robertus)—a brother of the Rev. Sydney Smith, who now reposes from his jovial labours in the Edinburgh Review, upon the bosom of some luxurious English Archdeaconry,—had first brought himself into great notice at Cambridge by various specimens of Latin verse, in the Archaic style of Lucretius. These we have sought for in vain; and, indeed, it appears from a letter of Mr Smith's to Dr Parr, that the author himself has retained no copies. These Latin verses, however, were but bagatelles of sport. Mr Smith's serious efforts were directed to loftier objects. We had been told, as early as 1806, (how truly we cannot say,) that Mr Bobus had publicly avowed his determination of first creating an ample fortune in India, and then returning home to seize the post of Prime Minister, as it were by storm; not that he could be supposed ignorant, how indispensable it is in ordinary cases, that good fortune, as well as splendid connexions, should concur with commanding talents, to such a result. But a condition, which for other men might be a sine quâ non,

* One of Dr Parr's biographers argues that this sobriquet had no foundation in fact, the Doctor not being either by birth or residence a denizen of this great officina for the arts of imitative and counterfeit manufacture. But the truth is, that he had sufficiently connected himself with Birmingham in the public mind, by his pointed intercourse with the Dissenters of that town, and by the known proximity to Birmingham of his common and favourite residence, to furnish a very plausible basis to a cognomen that was otherwise specially fitted to express the relations of his style and quality of thinking to those of Johnson.

of our own youthful experience at for himself he ventured to waive, in the audacity, said our informant, of conscious intellectual supremacy. So at least the story went. And for some years, those who had heard it continued to throw anxious glances towards the Eastern climes, which detained her destined premier from England. At length came a letter from Mr Bobus, saying, "I'm coming." The fortune was made: so much, at least, of the Cambridge menace had been fulfilled; and in due time Bobus arrived. He took the necessary steps for prosecuting his self-created mission: he caused himself to be returned to Parliament for some close borough: he took his seat: on a fitting occasion he prepared to utter his maiden oration: for that purpose he raised himself bolt-upright upon his pins: all the world was hushed and on tiptoe when it was known that Bobus was on his legs; you might have heard a pin drop. At this critical moment of his life, upon which, as it turned out, all his vast cloud-built fabrics of ambition were suspended, when, if ever, he was called upon to rally, and converge all his energies, suddenly his presence of mind forsook him: he faltered: rudder and compass slipped away from him: and—oh! Castor and Pollux!—Bobus foundered! nor, from that day to this, has he been heard of in the courts of ambition. This catastrophe had occurred some time before the present occasion; and an event which had entirely extinguished the world's interest in Mr Bobus Smith had more than doubled ours. Consequently we waited with much solicitude. At length the door opened; which recalls us from our digression into the high-road of our theme: for not Mr Bobus Smith, but Dr Parr entered.

Nobody announced him; and we were left to collect his name from his dress and his conversation. Hence it happened, that for some time we were disposed to question ourselves whether this might not be Mr Bobus even, (little as it could be supposed to resemble him,) rather than Dr Parr, so much did he contradict all our rational preconceptions. "A man," said we, "who has insulted people so outrageously, ought not to have done this in single reliance upon his professional protections; a brave man, and a man of honour, would here have carried about with him, in his manner and deportment, some such language as this,—'Do not think that I shelter myself under my gown from the natural consequences of the affronts I offer; mortal combats I am forbidden, sir, as a Christian minister, to engage in; but, as I find it impossible to refrain from occasional license of tongue, I am very willing to fight a few rounds, in a ring, with any gentleman who fancies himself ill-used.' " Let us not be misunderstood; we do not contend that Dr Parr should often, or regularly, have offered this species of satisfaction. But we do insist upon it—that no man should have given the very highest sort of provocation so wantonly as Dr Parr is recorded to have done, unless conscious that, in a last extremity, he was ready, like a brave man, to undertake a short turn-up, in a private room, with any person whatsoever whom he had insulted past endurance. A doctor, who had so often tempted a cudgelling, ought himself to have had some ability to cudgel. Dr Johnson assuredly would have acted on that principle. Had volume the second of that same folio with which he flogged Osborn, happened to lie ready to the prostrate man's grasp, nobody can suppose that Johnson would have gained his right to retaliate; in which case, a regular succession of rounds would have been established. Considerations such as these, and the Doctor's undeniable reputation (granted even by his most admiring biographers) as a sanguinary flagellator, throughout his long career of pedagogue, had prepared us—nay, entitled us—to expect in Dr Parr a huge carcass of man, fourteen stone, at the least. Even his style, puffy and bloated, and his sesquipedalian words, all warranted the same conclusion. Hence, then, our surprise, and the perplexity we have recorded, when the door opened, and a little man, in a buz wig, cut his way through the company, and made for a fautcuil standing opposite to the fire. Into this he lunged; and then forthwith, without preface or apology, began to open his talk upon us. Here arose a new marvel and a greater. If we had been scandalized at Dr Parr's want of thewes and bulk, conditions so indispensable for enacting the part of Sam. Johnson, much more, and with better reason, were we now petrified with his voice, utterance, gestures, and demeanour. Conceive, reader, by way of counterpoise to the fine* enunciation of Dr Johnson, an infantine lisp—the worst we ever heard—from the lips of a man above sixty, and accompanied with all sorts of ridiculous grimaces and little stage gesticulations. As he sat in his chair, turning alternately to the right and to the left, that he might dispense his edification in equal proportions amongst us, he seemed the very image of a little French gossiping abbé.

Yet all that we have mentioned, was, and seemed to be, a trifle by comparison with the infinite pettiness of his matter. Nothing did he utter but little shreds of calumnious tattle—the most ineffably silly and frivolous of all that was then circulating in the Whig salons of London against the Regent. He began precisely in these words: "Oh! I shall tell you" (laying a stress upon the word shall, which still further aided the resemblance to a Frenchman) "a sto-hee" (lispingly for story) "about the Pince Thegent" (such was his nearest approximation to Prince Regent.) "Oh, the Pince Thegent—the Pince Thegent!—what a sad, sad man he has turned out! But you shall hear. Oh! what a Pince! what a Thegent!—what a sad Pince Thegent!" And so the old babbler went on, sometimes wringing his little hands in lamentation, sometimes flourishing them with French grimaces and shrugs of shoulders, sometimes expanding and contracting his fingers like a fan. After an hour's twaddle of the lowest and most scandalous description, suddenly he rose and hopped out of the room, exclaiming all the way, "Oh! what a Pince, oh, what a Thegent,—did any body ever hear of such a sad Pince—such a sad Thegent,—such a sad, sad Pince Thegent? Oh, what a Pince," &c., da capo.

Not without indignation did we exclaim to ourselves, on this winding up of the scene, "And so that then, that lithping slander-monger, and retailer of petty scandal and gossip, fit rather for washerwomen over their tea, than for scholars and statesmen, is the champion whom his party propound as the adequate antagonist of Samuel Johnson! Faugh!" — — —

We had occasion, in this instance, as in so many others which we have witnessed, to remark the conflict between the natural and the artificial (or adopted) opinions of the world, and the practical triumph of the first. A crowd of ladies were present: most of them had been taught to believe that Dr Parr was a prodigious scholar, and in some mysterious way, and upon something not exactly known or understood except by learned men, a great authority, and, at all events, what is called—a public character. Accordingly, upon his first entrance, all of them were awed—deep silence prevailed—and the hush of indefinite expectation. Two minutes dispersed that feeling; the Doctor spoke, and the spell was broken. Still, however, and long afterwards, some of them, to our own knowledge, continued to say—"We suppose" (or, "we have been told") "that Dr Parr is the modern Johnson." Their artificial judgments clung to them after they had evidently given way, by a spontaneous movement of the whole company, to the natural impression of Dr Parr's conversation. For no sooner was the style and tendency of Dr Parr's gossip apparent, than a large majority of those present formed themselves into little parties, entered upon their own affairs, and, by a tacit convention, agreed to consider the Doctor as addressing himself exclusively to the lady of the house and her immediate circle. Had Sam. Johnson been the talker, nobody would have presumed to do this; secondly, nobody, out of a regard to his own reputation, would have been so indiscreet as to do this; he would not have acknowledged weariness had he felt it: but, lastly, nobody would have wished to do this: weariness was impossible in the presence of Sam. Johnson. Not ther let it be said, that perhaps the ladies present were unintellectual, and careless of a scholar's conversation. They were not so : some were distinguished for ability—all were more or less tinctured with literature. And we can undertake to say, that any man of tolerable colloquial powers, speaking upon a proper topic, would have commanded the readiest attention. As it was, every one felt (if she did not even whisper to her neighbour) "Here, at least, is nothing to be learned."

Such was our first interview with Dr Parr; such its issue. And now let us explain our drift in thus detailing its circumstances. Some people will say, the drift was doubtless to exhibit Dr Parr in a disadvantageous light—as a petty gossip, and a man of mean personal appearance. No; by no means. Far from it! We have a mean personal appearance ourselves; and we love men of mean appearance. Having one spur more than other men to seek distinction in those paths where nature has not obstructed them, they have one additional chance (and a great one) for giving an extended development to their intellectual powers. Many a man has risen to eminence under the powerful reaction of his mind in fierce counter-agency to the scorn of the unworthy, daily evoked by his personal defects, who with a handsome person would have sunk into the luxury of a careless life under the tranquillizing smiles of continual admiration. Dr Parr, therefore, lost nothing in our esteem by shewing a meanish exterior. Yet even this was worth mentioning, and had a value in reference to our present purpose. We like Dr Parr; we may say even, that we love him for some noble qualities of heart that really did belong to him, and were continually breaking out in the midst of his singular infirmities. But this, or even a still nobler moral character than Dr Parr's, can offer no excuse for giving a false elevation to his intellectual pretensions, and raising him to a level which he will be found incapable of keeping when the props of partial friendship are withdrawn. Our object is to value Dr Parr's claims, and to assign his true station both in literature and in those other walks of life upon which he has come forward as a public man. With such a purpose before us, it cannot be wholly irrelevant to notice even Dr Parr's person, and to say, that it was at once coarse, and in some degree mean; for his too friendly biographers have repeatedly described his personal appearance in flattering terms, and more than once have expressly characterised it as "dignified;" which it was not, according to any possible standard of dignity, but far otherwise; and it is a good inference from such a misstatement to others of more consequence. His person was poor; and his features were those of a clown—coarse, and ignoble, with an air, at the same time, of drollery, that did not sit well upon age, or the gravity of his profession. Upon one feature, indeed, Dr Parr valued himself exceedingly; this was his eye: he fancied that it was peculiarly searching and significant: he conceived, even, that it frightened people; and had a particular form of words for expressing the severe use of this basilisk function: "I inflicted my eye upon him," was his phrase in such cases.* But the thing was all a mistake: his eye could be borne very well: there was no mischief in it. Doubtless, when a nervous gentleman, in a pulpit, who was generally the subject of these inflictions, saw a comical looking old man, from below, levelling one eye at him, with a knowing an expression as he could throw into it,—mere perplexity as to the motive and proper construction of so unseasonable a personality might flutter his spirits; and to the vain, misjudging operator below, might distort this equivocal confusion, arising out of blank ignorance of his meaning, into the language of a conscious and confessing culprit. Explanations, in the nature of the thing, would be of rare occurrence: for some would not condescend to complain; and others would feel that the insult, unless it was for the intention, had scarcely body enough and tangible shape to challenge enquiry. They would anticipate, that the same man, who, in so solemn a situation as that between a congregation and their pastor, could offer such an affront, would be apt to throw a fresh ridicule upon the complaint itself, by saying—"Fix my eye upon you, did I? Why, that's all my eye with a vengeance. Look at you, did I? Well, sir, a cat may look at a king." This said in a tone of sneer: and then, with sneer and strut at once, "I trust, sir,—humbly, I take leave to suppose, sir, that Dr Parr is not so obscure a person, not so wholly unknown in this sublimity world, but he may have license to look even at as great a man as the Reverend Mr so and so." And thus the worthy doctor would persevere in his mistake, that he carried about with him, in his very homely collection of features, an organ of singular power and effect for detecting hidden guilt.

* Lord Wellesley has been charged with a foible of the same kind; how truly, we know not. More than one person of credit assured us, some six-and-twenty years ago, that at his levees, when Governor-General of India, he was gratified, as by a delicate stroke of homage, upon occasionally seeing people throw their eyes to the ground—degraded, as it were, by the effulgent lustre of his. This is possible; at the same time we cannot but acknowledge that our faith in the story was in some slight degree shaken by finding the same soppery attributed (on tradition, however) to Augustus Cæsar, in the Memoirs of Suetonius.

A mistake at all events it was; and his biographers have gone into it as largely under the delusions of friendship, as he under the delusions of vanity. On this, therefore, we ground what seems a fair inference—that, if in matters so plain and palpable as the character of a man's person, and the expression of his features, it has been possible for his friends to fall into gross errors and exaggerations, much more may we count upon such fallacies of appreciation in dealing with the subtler qualities of his intellect, and his less determinable pretensions as a scholar. Hence we have noticed these lower and trivial misrepresentations as presumptions with the reader, in aid of our present purpose, for suspecting more weighty instances of the same exaggerating spirit. The animus, which prompted so unserviceable a falsification of the real case, is not likely to have hesitated in coming upon ground more important to Dr Parr's reputation, and at the same time much more susceptible of a sincere latitude of appraisement, even amongst the neutral. It is with a view to a revision of too partial an adjudication, that we now institute this enquiry. We call the whole estimates to a new audit; and submit the claims of Dr Parr to a more equitable tribunal. Our object, we repeat, is—to assign him his true place, as it will hereafter be finally assigned in the next, or more neutral generation. We would anticipate the award of posterity; and it is no fault of ours, that, in doing so, it will be necessary to hand the doctor down from that throne in the cathedral of English clerical merit, on which the intemperate zeal of his friends has seated him for the moment, into some humble prebendal stall. How more agreeable it would naturally have been to assist in raising a man unjustly depreciated, than to undertake an office generally so ungracious as that of repressing the presumptuous enthusiasm of partisans, where it may seem to have come forward, with whatever exaggerations, yet still in a service of disinterested friendship, and on behalf of a man who, after all, was undeniably clever, and, in a limited sense, learned. The disinterestedness, however, of that admiration which has gathered about Dr Parr is not so genuine as it may appear. His biographers (be it recollected) are bigots, who serve their superstition in varnishing their idol: they are Whigs, who miss no opportunity of undervaluing Tories and their cause: they are Dissenters, who value their theme quite as much for the collateral purpose which it favours of attacking the Church of England, as for its direct and avowed one of lauding Dr Parr. Moreover, in the letters (which, in the undigested chaos of Dr Johnstone's collection, form three volumes out of eight) Dr Parr himself obtains a mischievous power, which, in a more regular form of composition, he would not have possessed, and which, as an honest man, we must presume that he would not have desired. Letters addressed to private correspondents, and only by accident reaching the press, have all the license of private conversation. Most of us, perhaps, send a little treason or so at odd times through the post-office; and as to scand. magn., especially at those unhappy (luckily rare) periods when Whigs are in power, if all letters are like our own, the Attorney-General would find practice for a century in each separate day's correspondence. In all this there is no blame. Hanc veniam petimusque damusque vicissim. But publication is another thing. Rash insinuations, judgments of ultra violence, injurious anecdotes of loose or no authority, and paradoxes sportively maintained in the certainty of a benignant construction on the part of the individual correspondent—all these, when printed, become armed, according to circumstances of time and person, with the power of extensive mischief. It is undeniable, that through Dr Parr's published letters are scattered some scores of passages, which, had he been alive, or had they been brought forward in a direct and formal address to the public, would have called forth indignant replies of vehement expostulation or blank contradiction. And many even of his more general comments on political affairs, or on the events and characters of his times, would have been overlooked only upon the consideration that the place which he occupied, in life or in literature, was not such as to aid him in giving effect to his opinions.

In many of these cases, as we have said already, the writer had a title to allowance, which those who publish his letters have not. But there are other cases which call for as little indulgence to him as to them. In some of his political intemperances, he may be considered as under a twofold privilege: first, of place—since, as a private letter-writer, he must be held as within the protection and the license of his own fireside; secondly, of time—since, on a general rule of construction, it may be assumed that such communications are not deliberate, but thrown off on the spur of the occasion; that they express, therefore, not a man's settled and abiding convictions, but the first momentary impulses of his passion or his humour. But in many of his malicious sarcasms, and disphing judgements, upon contemporaries who might be regarded, in some measure, as competitors with himself, either for the prizes of clerical life, or for public estimation, Dr Parr could take no benefit by this liberal construction. The sentiments he avowed in various cases of this description were not in any respect hasty or unconsidered ebullitions of momentary feeling. They grew out of no sudden occasions; they were not the product of accident. This is evident; because uniformly, and as often almost as he either spoke or wrote upon the persons in question, he gave vent to the same bilious jealousy in sneers or libels of one uniform character; and, if he forbore to do this in his open and avowed publications, the fair inference is, that his fears or his interest restrained him; since it is notorious, from the general evidence of his letters and his conversation, that none of those whom he viewed with these jealous feelings could believe that they owed any thing to his courtesy or his moderation.

For example, and just to illustrate our meaning, in what terms did he speak and write of the very eminent Dean of Carlisle, and head of Queen's College, Cambridge—the late Dr Isaac Milner? How did he treat Bishop Herbert Marsh? How, again, the illustrious Bishop Horsley? All of them, we answer, with unprovoked and slanderous scurrility; not one had offered him any slight or offence,—all were persons of gentlemanly bearing, though the last (it is true) had shown some rough play to one of Parr's pet heresiarchs,—all of them were entitled to his respect by attainments greatly superior to his own,—and all of them were more favourably known to the world than himself, by useful contributions to science, or theologic learning. Dean Milner had ruined his own activities by eating opium; and he is known, we believe, by little more than his continuation of the Ecclesiastical History, originally undertaken by his brother Joseph, and the papers which he contributed to the London Philosophical Transactions. But his researches and his accomplishments were of wonderful extent; and his conversation is still remembered by multitudes for its remarkable compass, and its almost Burckian* quality of elastic accommodation to the fluctuating trusting accidents of the occasion. The Dean was not much in the world's eye : at intervals he was to be found at the tables of the great ; more often he sought his ease and consolations in his honourable academic retreat. There he was the object of dislike to a particular intriguing clique that had the ear of Dr Parr. He was also obnoxious to the great majority of mere worldlings, as one of those zealous Christians who are usually denominated evangelical, and by scoffers are called the saints ; that is to say, in common with the Wilberforces, Thorntons, Hoares, Elliots, Babingtons, Gisbornes, &c., and many thousands of less distinguished persons in and out of Parliament,—Dean Milner assigned a peculiar emphasis, and a more significant interpretation, to those doctrines of original sin, the terms upon which redemption is offered—regeneration, sanctification, &c., which have the appearance of being the characteristic and peculiar parts in the Christian economy. Whether otherwise wrong or right in these views, it strikes us poor lay critics (who pretend to no authoritative knowledge on these great mysteries), that those, who adopt them, have, at all events, a prima facie title to be considered less worldly, and more spiritual-minded, than the mass of mankind ; and such a frame of mind is at least an argument of fitness for religious contemplations, in so far as temper is concerned, be the doctrinal (or merely intellectual) errors what they may. Consequently, for our own parts, humbly sensible as we are of our deficiencies in this great science of Christian philosophy, we could never at any time join in the unthinking ridicule which is scattered by the brilliant and the dull upon these peculiarities. Wheresoever, and whenever, we must freely avow, that evidences of real non-conformity to the spirit of this impure earth of ours, command our unfeigned respect. But that was a thing which the worthy Dr Parr could not abide. He loved no high or aerial standards in morals or in religion. Visionaries, who encouraged such notions, he viewed (to express it by a learned word) as ἀποκατάσταται, and as fit subjects for the chastisement of the secular arm. In fact, he would have persecuted a little upon such a provocation. On Mr Pitt and the rest who joined in suspending the Habeas Corpus Act, Dr Parr was wont to ejaculate his pastoral benediction in the following after-dinner toast—" Qui suspenderunt, suspendantur." And afterwards, upon occasion of the six bills provoked by the tumults at Manchester, Glasgow, &c., his fatherly blessing was daily uttered in this little fondling sentiment,—“ Bills for the throats of those who framed the bills.” On the same principle, he would have prayed fervently—had any Isaac Mimer infested his parish—" Let those, who would exalt our ideals of Christianity, be speedily themselves exalted." And, therefore, if any man enquires upon what grounds it was that Dr Parr hated with an intolerant hatred—scorned—and sharpened his gift of sneer upon—the late Dean of Carlisle—we have here told him “ the reason why ;” and reason enough, we think, in all conscience. For be it known, that, over and above other weighty and obvious arguments for such views, Dr Parr had a standing personal irritation connected with this subject—a continual “ thorn in the flesh”—in the relations subsisting between him and his principal, the incumbent of his own favourite and adopted parish. As the position of the parties was amusing to those who were in possession of the key to the right understanding of it, viz. a knowledge of their several views and opinions, we shall pause a mo-

the various qualities of conversation, may remark one peculiar feature in Edmund Burke's style of talking, which contra-distinguished it from Dr Johnson's. It grew—one sentence was the rebound of another,—one thought rose upon the suggestion of something which went before. Burke's motion, therefore, was all a going forward. Johnson's, on the other hand, was purely regressive and analytic. That thought which he began with, contained, by involuntism, the whole of what he brought forth. The two styles of conversation corresponded to the two theories of generation,—one (Johnson's) to the theory of Paqformation (or Evolution).—the other (Burke's) to the theory of Epigenesis.

Dr Parr, it is well known, spent a long period of his latter life at Hatton, a village in Warwickshire. The living of Hatton belonged to Dr Bridges, who, many a long year ago, was well known in Oxford as one of the fellows in the magnificently-endowed college of Magdalen; that is to say, Dr Bridges was the incumbent at the time when some accident of church preferment brought Dr Parr into that neighbourhood. By an arrangement which we do not exactly understand, the two doctors, for their mutual convenience, exchanged parishes. We find it asserted by Dr Johnstone, that on Dr Parr's side the exchange originated in a spirit of obliging accommodation. It may be so. However, one pointed reservation was made by Dr Bridges (whether in obedience to church discipline or to his private scruples of conscience—we cannot say) viz.—that, once in every year, (according to our remembrance, for a series of six consecutive Sundays,) he should undertake the pulpit duties of the church. On this scheme the two learned clerks built their alterni federa regni; and, like two buckets, the Drs Bridges and Parr went up and down reciprocally for a long succession of years. The waters, however, which they brought up to the lips of their parishioners, were drawn from two different wells; for Dr Bridges shared in the heresy of the Dean of Carlisle. Hence a system of energetic (on Dr Parr's side, we may say—of fierce) mutual counteraction. Each, during his own reign, laboured to efface all impressions of his rival. On Dr Bridges's part, this was probably, in some measure, a necessity of conscience; for he looked upon his flock as ruined in spiritual health by the neglect and ignorance of their pastor. On Dr Parr's it was the mere bigotry of hatred, such as all schemes of teaching are fitted to provoke which appeal to a standard of ultra perfection, or exact any peculiar sanctity of life. Were Bridges right, in that case, it was clear that Parr was wrong by miserable defect. But, on the other hand, were Parr right, then Bridges was wrong only by superfluity and redundancy. Such was the position, such the mutual aspects, of the two doctors. Parr's wrath waxed hotter and hotter. Had Dr Bridges happened to be a vulgar sectarian, of narrow education, of low breeding, and without distinguished connexions,—those etesian gales or annual monsoons, which brought in his periodical scourge, would have been hailed by Parr as the harbingers of a triumph in reversion. Yielding the pulpit to his rival for a few Sundays, he would have relied upon the taste of his parishioners for making the proper distinctions. He would have said,—“You have all eyes and ears—you all know that fellow; you all know me: I need say no more. Pray, don't kick him when he comes again.” But this sort of contempt was out of the question, and that kindled his rage the more. Dr Bridges was a man of fortune; travelled and accomplished; familiar with courts and the manners of courts. Even that intercourse with people of rank and fashion, which Parr so much cultivated in his latter years, and which, to his own conceit, placed him so much in advance of his own order, gave him no advantage over Dr Bridges. True, the worthy fanatic (as some people called him) had planted himself in a house at Clifton near Bristol, and spent all his days in running up and down the lanes and alleys of that great city, carrying Christian instruction to the dens of squalid poverty, and raising the torch of spiritual light upon the lairs of dissolute wretchedness. But, in other respects, he was a man comme il faut. However his mornings might be spent, his soirées were elegant; and it was not a very unusual event to meet a prince or an ambassador at his parties. Hence, it became impossible to treat him as altogether abject, and a person of no social consideration. In that view, he was the better man of the two. And Parr's revenge, year after year, was balked of its food. In this dilemma of impotent rage, what he could—he did!—And the scene was truly whimsical. Regularly as Dr Bridges approached, Dr Parr fled the country. As the wheels of Dr Bridges were heard muttering in advance, Dr Parr's wheels were heard groaning in retreat. And when the season of this annual affliction drew to a close, when the wrath of Providence was spent, and the church of Hatton passed from under the shadows of eclipse into renovated light, then did Dr Parr—cautiously putting out his feelers to make sure that the enemy was gone—resume the spiritual sceptre. He congratulated his parish of Hatton that their trials were over; he performed classical lustrations, and Pagan rites of expiation; he circled the churchyard nine times withershins (or inverting the course of the sun); he fumigated the whole precincts of Hatton church with shag tobacco; and left no stone unturned to cleanse his little Warwickshire fold from its peculiar pollution.

This anecdote illustrates Dr Parr's temper. Mark, reader, his self-contradiction. He hated what he often called "rampant orthodoxy," and was never weary of running down those churchmen who thought it their duty to strengthen the gates of the English church against Popish superstitions and Popish corruptions on the one hand, or Socinianism on the other. Yet, let any thing start up in the shape of zealous and fervid devotion—right or wrong—and let it threaten to displace his own lifeless scheme of ethics, or to give a shock of galvanism to his weekly paralytic exhortations "not upon any account or consideration whatsoever to act improperly or in opposition to the dictates of reason, decorum, and prudence;" let but a scintillation appear of opposition in that shape, and who so ready to persecute as Dr Parr? Fanaticism, he would tell us, was what he could not bear; fanaticism must be put down: the rights of the church must be supported with rigour; if needful, even with severity. He was also a great patron of the church—as against laymen; of the parson as against the churchwarden; of the rector's right to graze his horse upon the graves; of the awful obligation upon his conscience to allow of no disrespectful, darned, or ill-washed surplice; of the solemn responsibility which he had undertaken in the face of his country to suffer no bell-ringing except in canonical hours; to enforce the decalogue, and also the rubric; to obey his ecclesiastical superiors within the hours of divine service; and finally, to read all proclamations or other state documents sent to him by authority, with the most dutiful submission, simply reserving to himself the right of making them as ridiculous as possible by his emphasis and cadence.* In this fashion Dr Parr manifested his reverence for the church establishment; and for these great objects it seemed to him lawful to persecute. But as to purity of doctrine, zeal, primitive devotion, the ancient faith as we received it from our fathers, or any service pretending to be more than lip service, for all such questionable matters it was incumbent upon us to shew the utmost liberality of indifference on the most modern and showy pattern, and, except for popery, to rely upon Bishop Hoadly. This explanation was necessary to make the anecdote of Dr Bridges fully intelligible; and that anecdote was necessary to explain the many scornful allusions to that reverend gentleman, which the reader will find in Dr Johnstone's collection of letters; but above all, it was necessary for the purpose of putting him in possession of Dr Parr's character and position as a member of the Church of England.

To return from this digression into the track of our speculations, Dean Milner and Dr Bridges stood upon the same ground in Dr Parr's displeasure. Their offence was the same: their criminality perhaps equal: and it was obviously of a kind that, for example's sake, ought not to be overlooked. But Herbert

* Dr Parr's casuistry for regulating his practice in the case of his being called upon to read occasional forms of prayer, proclamations, &c., which he did not approve as a politician (and observe, he never did approve them) was this. read he must, was his doctrine; thus far he was bound to dutiful submission. Passer obedience was an unconditional duty, but not active. Now it would be an active obedience to read with proper emphasis and decorum. Therefore every body sees the logical necessity of reading it into a face, making grimaces, "inflicting one's eye," and in all ways keeping up the jest with the congregation. Was not this the boy for Ignatius Loyola?

Marsh was not implicated in their atrocities. No charge of that nature was ever preferred against him. His merits were of a different order; and, confining our remarks to his original merit, and that which perhaps exclusively drew upon him the notice of Mr Pitt's government, not so strictly clerical. His earliest public service was, his elaborate statement of the regal conferences at Pilnitz, and his consequent justification of this country in the eyes of Europe, on the question then pending between her and the French Republic, with which party lay the onus of first virtual aggression, and with which therefore by implication, the awful responsibility, for that deluge of blood and carnage which followed. This service Herbert Marsh performed in a manner to efface the remembrance of all former attempts. His next service was more in the character of his profession—he introduced his country to the very original labours in Theology of the learned Michaelis, and he expanded the compass and value of those labours by his own exertions. Patriots, men even with the feeblest sense of patriotism, have felt grateful to Dr Marsh for having exonerated England from the infinite guilt of creating a state of war lightly—upon a weak motive—upon an unconsidered motive—or indeed upon any motive or reason whatsoever; for a reason supposes choice and election of the judgment, and choice there can be none without an acknowledged alternative. Now it was the triumphant result of Dr Marsh's labours, that alternative there was practically none, under the actual circumstances, for Great Britain; and that war was the mere injunction of a flagrant necessity, coupling the insults and the menaces of France with what are now known to have been the designs, and indeed the momentary interests, of the predominant factions at that epoch. Herbert Marsh has satisfied every body almost but the bigots, (if any now survive,) of Jacobinism as it raged in 1792 and 1793, when it held its horrid Sabbaths over the altar and the throne, and deluged the scaffolds with innocent blood. All but those he has satisfied. Has he satisfied Dr Parr? No. Yet the Doctor was in an absolute frenzy of horror, grief, and indignation, when Louis XVI. was murdered. And, therefore, if the shedding of what he allowed to be most innocent blood could justify a war, and the refusal of all intercourse but the intercourse of vengeance with those who, at that period, ruled the scaffold, then in that one act (had there even been wanting that world of weightier and prospective matter, which did in fact impel the belligerents) Dr Parr ought in reason to have found a sufficient justification of war. And so perhaps he would. But Dis aliter visum est; and his Di and De majorum gentium—paramount to reason, conscience, or even to discretion, unless such as was merely selfish, were the Parliamentary leaders from whom he expected a bishopric (and would very possibly have got it had some of them lived a little longer in the first decade of this century, or he himself lived to the end of this present decade.") Hence it does not much surprise us, that, in spite of his natural and creditable horror, on hearing of the fate of the French king, he relapsed into Jacobinism so fierce, that two years after a friend, by way of agreeable flattery, compliments him as being only "half a sansculotte;" a compliment, however, which he doubtless founded more upon his confidence in Dr Parr's original goodness of heart, and the almost inevitable contagion of English society, than on any warrant which the Doctor had yet given him by words or by acts, or any presumption even which he was able to specify, for so advantageous an opinion. Well, therefore, might Herbert Marsh displease Dr Parr. He was a Tory, and the open antagonist of those by whom only the fortunes of sansculottes, thoroughbred or half-bred, had any chance of thriving; and he had exposed the hollowness of that cause to which the Doctor was in a measure sold.

As to Horsley, his whole life, as a man of letters and a politician, must have won him the tribute of Dr Parr's fear and hatred; a tribute which he paid as duly as his assessed taxes. Publicly, indeed, he durst not touch him; for the horrid scourge which Horsley had wielded at one time, in questions of scholarship and orthodoxy, still resounded in his ears. But in his letters and conversation, Dr Parr fretted for ever at his eminence, and eyed him grudgingly and malignly; and those among his correspondents, who were not too generous and noble-minded to pay their court through his weaknesses, evidently were aware that a sneer at Bishop Horsley was as welcome as a basket of game. Sneers, indeed, were not the worst: there are to be found in Dr Parr's correspondence some dark insinuations, apparently pointed at Horsley, which involve a sort of charges that should never be thrown out against any man without the accompaniment of positive attestations. What may have been the terror of that bishop's life and conversation, we do not take upon us to say. It is little probable, at this time of day, under the censorious vigilance of so many unfriendly eyes, and in a nation where even the persons upon the judicial bench exhibit in their private lives almost a sanctity of deportment, that a dignitary of the English church will err by any scandalous immorality. Be that however as it may, and confining our view to Horsley in his literary character, we must say, that he is far beyond the reach of Dr Parr's hostility. His writings are generally excellent: as a polemic and a champion of his own church, he is above the competition of any modern divine. As a theologian, he reconciles the nearly contradictory merits of novelty and originality with well-meditated orthodoxy; and we may venture to assert, that his Sermons produced the greatest impression, and what the newspapers call "sensation," of any English book of pure divinity, for the last century. In saying this we do not speak of the sale; what that might be, we know not; we speak of the strength of the impression diffused through the upper circles, as apparent in the reverential terms, which, after the appearance of that work, universally marked the sense of cultivated men in speaking of Bishop Horsley—even of those who had previously viewed him with some dislike in his character of controversialist. Let the two men be compared; not the veriest bigot amongst the Dissenters, however much he would naturally prefer as a companion, or as a subject for eulogy, that man who betrayed* the interests of his own church to him who was its column of support and ornament, could have the hardihood to insinuate that Dr Horsley was properly, or becomingly, a mark for the scurrilities of Dr Parr. In what falls within the peculiar province of a schoolmaster, we think it probable (to make every allowance which candour and the simplicity of truth demand) that Dr Parr had that superior accuracy which is maintained by the practice of teaching. In general reach and compass of intellect, in theology, in those mixed branches of speculative research which belong equally to divinity and to metaphysics, (as in the Platonic philosophy, and all which bears upon the profound doctrine of the Trinity,) or (to express the matter by a single word) in philosophic scholarship, and generally in vigour of style and thought, we suppose Horsley to have had, in the eyes of the public, no less than in the reality of the case, so prodigiously the advantage, that none but a sycophant, or a false friend, would think of suggesting seriously a comparison to disadvantageous to Dr Parr. But at all events, let the relations of merit be what they

* Had Mr Fox lived a little longer, the current belief is, that he would have raised Dr Parr to the mitre; and had the Doctor himself survived to November of this present year, Lord Grey would perhaps have tried his earliest functions in that line upon him.

* We shall have an opportunity farther on of shewing what was Parr's conduct to the church of which he professed himself a member, and in what sense he could be said to have betrayed it. At present we shall protect ourselves from misconstruction, by saying that his want of fidelity to the rights and interests of the church was not deliberate or systematic; in this as in other things, he acted from passion—often from caprice. He would allow only this or that doctrine of the church to be defended; he would ruinously limit the grounds of defence: and on these great questions, he gave way to the same rank personal partialities, which, in the management of a school, had attracted the notice, and challenged the disrespect, of boys.

may in Horsley, certainly his absolute merit is unquestionable; and the continued insults of Dr Parr are insufferable.

Upon these flagrant justifications, individual attacks past counting, besides a general system of disparagement and contumely towards the most distinguished pretensions in church and state, unless ranged on the side of the Whigs, or even if presuming to pause upon those extremities which produced a schism in the Whig club itself, we stand for a sufficient apology in pressing the matter strongly against Dr Parr. A rejoinder on our side has in it something of vindictive justice. Tories, and not Tories only, but all who resist anarchists, (for that Dr Parr did not blazon himself in that character, was due to the lucky accident which saved him from any distressing opportunities of attung upon his crazy speculations,) have an interest in depressing to their proper level those who make a handle of literature for insidious party purposes, polluting its amenities with the angry passions proper to our civil dissensions, and abusing the good-nature with which we Tories are always ready to welcome literary merit, without consideration of politics, and to smile upon talent though in the ranks of our antagonists. The Whigs are once more becoming powerful, and we must now look more jealously to our liberties. Whigs are not the kind of people to be trusted with improper concessions: Whigs "rampant," (to use Dr Parr's word,) still less. Had Dr Parr been alive at this hour, he would have stood fair for the first archbishopric vacant: for we take it for granted that the Duke of Wellington, according to his peculiar system of tactics, would long ere now have made him a bishop. Let us therefore appraise Dr Parr; and to do this satisfactorily, let us pursue him through his three characters, the triple role which he supported in life—of Whig politician; secondly, of scholar, (or, expressing our meaning in its widest extent, of literary man); and finally of theologian.

These questions we shall discuss in a separate paper; and, from the many personal notices which such a discussion will involve, and the great range of literary topics which it will oblige us to traverse, we may hope to make it not unamusing to our readers. There are, in every populous community, many different strata of society, that lie in darkness, as it were, to each other, from mere defect of mutual intercourse; and in the literary world there are many chambers that have absolutely no communication. Afterwards, when twenty—thirty—sixty years have passed away—by means of posthumous memoirs, letters, anecdotes, and other literary records—they are all brought in a manner face to face; and we, their posterity, first see them as making up a whole, of which they themselves were imperfectly conscious. Every year makes further disclosures; and thus a paradox is realized—that the more we are removed from personal connexion with a past age of literature, the better we know it. Making Dr Parr for the moment a central figure to our groups, we shall have it in our power to bring upon the stage many of the persons who figured in that age as statesmen, or leaders in political warfare; and most of those who played a part, prominent or subordinate, in literature; or who conspicuously filled a place amongst the civil and ecclesiastical dignitaries of the state.

Meantime, as an appropriate close to this preliminary paper, we shall put a question—and, in a cursory way, we shall discuss the proper answer to it—upon Dr Parr as a man of the world, and ambitious candidate for worldly distinctions; in short, as the architect of his fortunes. Was he, in this light, an able and successful man? Or, separating the two parts of that question which do not always proceed concurrently, if he were not successful in a degree corresponding to his own wishes and the expectations of his friends, if it is notorious that he missed of attaining those prizes which he never hesitated to avow as the objects that stimulated his ambition, in what degree are we to ascribe his failure to want of talent, to misdirection of his talent, to a scrupulous and fastidious integrity, to the injustice of his superiors, or, finally, to mere accidents of ill luck? One man in each ten thousand comes into this world, according to the homely saying, "with a silver spoon in his mouth;" but most of us have a fortune to make—a station to create. And the most general expression, by far the most absolute and final test, of the degrees in which men differ as to energy and ability, is to be found in the large varieties of success which they exhibit in executing this universal object. Taking life as a whole, luck has but little sway in controlling its arrangements. Good sense and perseverance, prudence and energy, these are the fatal deities that domineer over the stars and their aspects. And when a man's coffin knocks at the gates of the tomb, it is a question not unimportant, among other and greater questions, What was he on beginning life, what is he now? Though in this, as in other things, it is possible to proceed in a spirit of excess, still, within proper restrictions, it is one even of a man's moral obligations, to contend strenuously for his own advancement in life; and, as it furnishes, at the same time, a criterion as little ambiguous as any for his intellectual merits, few single questions can be proposed so interesting to a man's reputation, as that which demands the amount of his success in playing for the great stakes of his profession or his trade. What, then, was the success of Dr Parr?

The prizes which the Doctor set before his eyes from his earliest days, were not very lofty, but they were laudable; and he avowed them with a naïveté that was amusing, and a frankness that availed at least to acquit him of hypocrisy. They were two—a mitre and a coach-and-four. "I am not accustomed," says he, (writing to an Irish bishop,) "to dissemble the wishes I once had" [this was in 1807, and he then had them more than ever] "of arriving at the profits and splendour of the prelacy, or the claims to them which I believe myself to possess." The bishopric he did not get; there he failed. For the coach-and-four, he was more fortunate. At the very latest period of his life, when the shades of death were fast gathering about him, he found himself able to indulge in this luxury—and, as his time was obviously short, he wisely resolved to make the most of it; and upon any or no excuse, the Doctor was to be seen fixing over the land at full gallop, and scouring town and country with four clerical-looking long-tailed horses. We believe he even meditated a medal, commemorating his first ovation by a faithful portrait of the coach and his own episcopal wig in their meridian pomp; he was to have been represented in the act of looking out of the window, and "inflicting his eye" upon some hostile parson picking his way through the mud on foot. On the whole, we really rejoice that the Doctor got his coach and his four resounding couriers. The occasional crack of the whip must have sounded pleasantly in his ears at a period when he himself had ceased to operate with that weapon—when he was no more than an emeritus professor and paragon no longer. So far was well; but still, we ask, how came it that his coach panels wanted their appropriate heraldic decoration? How was it that he missed the mitre?—Late in life, we find him characterising himself as an "unpreferred, calumniated, half-starving country parson;" no part of which, indeed, was true; but yet, we demand,—How was it that any colourable plea existed, at that time of his career, to give one moment's plausibility to such an exaggeration? Let us consider.

Dr Parr was the son of a country practitioner in the humbler departments of medicine. Parr, senior, practised as a surgeon, apothecary, and accoucheur. From him, therefore, his son could expect little assistance in his views of personal aggrandizement. But that was not necessary. An excellent Latin scholar, and a man who brought the rare sanction (sanctification—we were going to say) of clerical co-operation and countenance to so graceless and reprobate a party as the Whigs, who had scarcely a professional friend to say grace at their symposia, must, with any reasonable discretion in the conduct of his life, have been by much too valuable an article on the Whig establishment to run any risk of neglect. The single clerk, the one sole reverend man of letters, who was borne upon their books, must have had a priceless value in the eyes of that faction—when "taking stock," and estimating their alliances. To them he must have been what the

Emperor of Morocco is to the collector of butterflies. To have lost this value, to have forfeited his hold upon their gratitude, and actually to have depreciated as he grew older, and better known to the world—implies too significantly some gross misconduct, or some rueful indiscretions. The truth is this; and for Parr's own honour, lest worse things should be thought of him than the case really warrants, his friends ought to make it known—though a man of integrity, he could not be relied upon: in a muster of forces, he was one of the few that never could be absolutely reckoned and made sure of. Neither did his scruples obey any known law: he could swallow a camel, and strain at a gnat, and his caprice was of the most dangerous kind; not a woman's caprice, which is the mere mantling of levity, and readily enough obeys any fresh impulse, which it is easy to apply in an opposite direction. Dr Parr's caprices grew upon another stock; they were the fitful outbreaks of steady, mulish wrong-headedness. This was a constitutional taint, for which he was indebted to the accoucheur. Had the father's infirmity reached Dr Parr in his worldly career, merely in that blank neutral character, and affected his fortunes through that pure negative position of confessed incapacity to help him, which is the whole extent of disastrous influence that the biographical records ascribe to him—all would have been well. But the old mule over-ruled his son to the end of his long life, and controlled his reiterated opportunities of a certain and brilliant success, by the hereditary taint in the blood which he transmitted to him, in more perhaps than its original strength. The true name for this infirmity is, in the vulgar dialect, pig-headedness. Stupid imperturbable adherence, deaf and blind, to some perverse view that abruptly thwarted and counteracted his party, making his friends stare, and his opponents laugh; in short, as we have said, pure pig-headedness,—that was the key to Dr Parr's lingering preferment: and, we believe, upon a considerate view of his whole course, that he threw away ten times the amount of fortune, rank, splendour, and influence that he ever obtained; and with no countervailing indemnity from any moral reputation, such as would attend all consistent sacrifices to high-minded principle. No! on the contrary, with harsh opposition and irritating expressions of powerful disgust from friends in every quarter—all conscious that, in such instances of singularity, Dr Parr was merely obeying a demon, that now and then mastered him, of wayward—restive—moody self-conceit, and the blind spirit of contradiction. Most of us know a little of such men, and occasionally suffer by such men in the private affairs of life—men that are unusually jealous of slights, or insufficient acknowledgments of their personal claims and consequence: they require to be courted, petted, caressed: they refuse to be compromised or committed by the general acts of their party: no, they must be specially consulted; else they read a lesson to the whole party on their error, by some shocking and revolting act of sudden desertion, which, from a person of different character, would have been considered perfidy. Dr Johnstone himself admits, that Parr was “jealous of attention, and indignant at neglect;” and on one occasion endeavours to explain a transaction of his life, by supposing that he may have been “hurried away by one of those torrents of passion, of which there are too many instances in his life.”*—Of the father, Parr obstetrical, the same indulgent biographer remarks, (p. 10,) that he was “distinguished by the rectitude of his principles;” and, in another place, (p. 21,) he pronounces him, in summing up his character, to have been “an honest, well-meaning

* Page 307, vol i.—The Doctor adds—“As in the lives of us all.” But, besides that this addition defeats the whole meaning of his own emphasis on the word his, it is not true that men generally yield to passion in their political or public lives. Having adopted a party, they adhere to it; generally for good and for ever. And the passions, which occasionally govern them, are the passions of their party—not their own separate impulses as individuals.

Tory;" but, at the same time, confesses him to have been "the petty tyrant of his fireside,"—an amiable little feature of character, that would go far to convince his own family, that, "rectitude of principles" was not altogether incompatible with the practice of a ruffian.

Tory, however, Parr, senior, was not: he was a Jacobite, probably for the gratification of his spleen, and upon a conceit that this arrayed him in a distinct personal contest with the House of Hanover; whereas, once confounded amongst the prevailing party of friends to that interest, as a man-midwife, he could hardly hope to win the notice of his Britannic Majesty. His faction, however, being beaten to their heart's content, and his own fortune all going overboard in the storm, he suddenly made a bolt to the very opposite party: he rattled to the red-hot Whigs: and the circumstances of the case, which are as we have here stated them, hardly warrant us in putting a very favourable construction upon his motives. As was the father, so was the son: the same right of rebellion reserved to himself, whether otherwise professing himself Jacobite or Whig; the same peremptory duty of passive obedience for those of his household: the same hot intemperances in politics: the same disdain of accountableness to his party leaders; and, finally, the same "petty tyranny of the fire-side." This last is a point on which all the biographers are agreed: they all record the uncontrollable ill temper and hasty violence of Dr Parr within his domestic circle. And one anecdote, illustrating his intemperance, we can add ourselves. On one occasion, rising up from table, in the middle of a fierce discussion with Mrs Parr, he took a carving knife, and applying it to a portrait of that lady hanging upon the wall, he drew it sharply across the jugular, and cut the throat of the picture from ear to ear, thus murdering her in effigy.

* This view of Parr's intractable temper is necessary to understand his life, and in some measure to justify his friends. Though not (as he chose himself to express it, under a momentary sense of his slow progress in life, and the reluctant blossoming of his preferment) "a half-starved parson," yet most unquestionably he reaped nothing at all from his long attachment to Whiggery, by comparison with what he would have reaped had that attachment been more cordial and unbroken, and had he, in other respects, borne himself with more discretion; and above all, had he abstained from offensive personalities. This was a rock on which Parr often wrecked himself. Things, and principles, and existing establishments, might all have been attacked with even more virulence than he exhibited, had his furious passions allowed him to keep his hands off the persons of individuals. Here lay one class of the causes which retarded his promotion. Another was his unbecoming warfare upon his own church. "I am sorry," said one of his earliest, latest, and wisest friends, (Bishop Bennet,)—"I am sorry you attack the church, for fear of consequences to your own advancement." This was said in 1792. Six years after, the writer, who had a confidential post in the Irish government, and saw the dreadful crisis to which things were hurrying, found it necessary to break off all intercourse with Dr Parr: so shocking to a man of principle was the careless levity with which this minister of peace, and his immediate associates, themselves in the bosom of security, amongst the woods of Warwickshire, scattered their firebrands of inflammatory language through the public, at a period of so much awful irritation. Afterwards, it is true, that when the Irish crisis had passed, and the rebellion was suppressed, his respect for Parr as a scholar led him to resume his correspondence. But he never altered his opinion of Parr as a politician: he viewed him as a man profoundly ignorant in politics; a mere Parson Adams in the knowledge of affairs, and the real springs of political action, or political influence; but unfortunately with all the bigotry and violent irritability that belong to the most excited and interested partisan; having the passions of the world united with the ignorance of the desert; coupling the simplicity of the dove with the fierce instincts of the serpent.

The events of his life moved under this unhappy influence. Leaving college prematurely upon the misfortune* of his father's death, he became an assistant at Harrow under the learned Dr Sumner. About five years after, on Dr Sumner's death, though manifestly too young for the situation, he entered into a warm contest for the vacant place of headmaster. Notwithstanding the support of Lord Dartmouth and others, he lost it; and unfortunately for his peace of mind, though, as usual, he imagined all sorts of intrigues against himself, yet the pretensions of his competitor, Benjamin Heath, were such as to disabuse all the world of any delusive conceit, that justice had not been done. Parr, it must be remembered, then only twenty-five years old, had, in no single instance, distinguished himself; nor had he even fifty years after—no, nor at the day of his death—given any evidences to the world that he was comparable to Heath as a Grecian. The probable ground of Heath's success was a character better fitted to preside over a great school, (for even the too friendly biographers of Parr admit that he did not command the respect of the boys,) and his better established learning. Naturally enough, Parr was unwilling to admit these causes, so advantageous to his rival, as the true ones. What, then, is his account of the matter? He says, that he lost the election by a vote which he had given to John Wilkes, in his contest for Middlesex. To John Wilkes—mark that, reader! Thus early had this "gowned student" engaged his passions and his services in the interest of brawling, intriguing faction.

This plan failing, he set up a rival establishment in the neighbourhood of Harrow, at Stanmore; and never certainly did so young a man, with so few of the ordinary guarantees to offer—that is to say, either property, experience, or connexions—meet with such generous assistance. One friend lent him two thousand pounds at two per cent, though his security must obviously have been merely personal. Another lent him two hundred pounds without any interest at all. And many persons of station and influence, amongst whom was Lord Dartmouth, gave him a sort of countenance equally useful to his interests, by placing their sons under his care. All came to nothing however; the establishment was knocked up, and clearly from gross defects of management. And, had his principal creditor pressed for repayment, or had he shewn less than the most generous forbearance, which he continued through a space of 21 years, (in fact, until the repayment was accomplished without distress,) Parr must have been ruined; for in those days there was no merciful indulgence of the laws to hopeless insolvents; unless by the favour of their creditors, they were doomed to rot in prison. Now, in this one story we have two facts illustrated, bearing upon our present enquiry—first, the extraordinary good luck of Parr; secondly, his extraordinary skill in neutralizing or abusing it.

What young man, that happens to be penniless at the age of twenty-five, untried in the management of money, untried even as the presiding master in a school, would be likely to find a friend willing to intrust him, on his personal responsibility, (and with no prospect for the recovery of his money, except through the tardy and uncertain accumulation of profits upon an opposition school,) with so large a sum as two thousand pounds? Who, in an ordinary way, could count upon the support of a nobleman enjoying the ear and confidence of royalty? Lastly, who would so speedily defeat and baffle, by his own unassisted negligence and flagrant indiscretions, so much volunteer bounty? At this time of his life, it strikes us, in fact, that Dr Parr was mad. The students at Stanmore were indulged in all sorts of irregularities. That, perhaps, might arise from the unfortunate situation of the new establishment—too near to its rival; and in part, also, from the delicate position of Parr, who, in most instances, had come under an unfortunate personal obligation to the young gentlemen who followed him from Harrow. But in his habits of dress and deportment, which drew scandal upon himself, and jealousy upon his establishment, Parr owed his ill success to nobody but himself. Mr Roderick, his assistant, and a most friendly reporter, says, that at this time he “brought upon himself the ridicule of the neighbourhood and passengers by many foolish acts; such as riding in high prelatical pomp through the streets on a black saddle, bearing in his hand a long cane or wand, such as women used to have, with an ivory head like a crozier, which was probably the reason why he liked it.” We see by this he was already thinking of the bishopric. “At other times he was seen stalking through the town in a dirty striped morning-gown: Nō fuit unquam sic unpar sibi.” When we add, that Dr Parr soon disgusted and alienated his weightiest friend amongst the residents at Stanmore, Mr Smith, the accomplished rector of the place, we cannot wonder that little more than five years saw that scheme at an end.*

* Even that was possibly barbed in some of its consequences to Parr, by his own imprudence. The widow (his stepmother) is said to have injured Parr by her rapacity. But, if so, Parr had certainly himself laid the foundation of an early hatred between them, by refusing to lay aside his mourning for his own mother, on the marriage day of this second Mrs Parr with his father. We do not much quarrel with his conduct on that occasion, considering his age (sixteen) and the relation of her for whom he mourned. But still the act was characteristic of the man, and led to its natural results.

The school at Stanmore he could not be said to leave; it left him: such was his management, that no fresh pupils succeeded to those whom the progress of years carried off to the universities. When this wavering rushlight had at length finally expired, it became necessary to think of other plans, and in the spring of 1777 he accepted the mastership of Colchester school. Even there, brief as his connexion was with that establishment, he found time to fasten a quarrel upon the trustees of the school in reference to a lease; and upon this quarrel he printed (though he did not publish) a pamphlet. Sir William Jones, his old schoolfellow, to whom, as a lawyer, this pamphlet was submitted, found continual occasion to mark upon the margin such criticisms as these, “too violent—too strong.” The contest was apparently de lana caprina: so at least Sir William thought. †

But, luckily, he was soon called away from these miserable feuds to a more creditable sort of activity. In the summer of 1778, the mastership of the public grammar-school at Norwich became vacant; in the autumn, Parr was elected: and in the beginning of 1779, he commenced his residence in that city. Thus we see that he was unusually befriended in all his undertakings. As a private speculator at Stanmore, as a candi-

* Laying together all the incidents of that time, it is scarcely possible to doubt that Parr conducted himself with great impropriety. Benjamin Heath neither answered the letter in which Parr attempted to clear himself from the charge of exciting the boys of Harrow to insurrection against Heath's authority, nor did he so much as leave his card at Stanmore, in acknowledgment of Parr's call upon him. As to Mr Smith, the rector, celebrated for his wit and ability, the early associate of Johnson and Garrick, from being “the warmest of Parr's friends,” such is Mr Roderick's language, he soon became cool, and finally ceased to speak. Mr Roderick does not acquit his friend of the chief blame in this rupture.

† Dr Johnson, however, speaking of the pamphlet as a composition, discovers in “the peculiarities of Parr's style—it's vigour, its vehemence, its clearness,” its

the shield of the law, the sword of indignation, and the helmet of intrepidity. When I first entered the lists against these hardy combatants, I determined to throw away the scabbard,” and so forth. The sword of indignation! Birch-red he surely means. However, we must think, that the bombs of contempt, and the mortars of criticism, ought to open upon any person above the age of eight years who could write such stilted fustian.

date for Colchester, as a candidate for Norwich, he was uniformly successful as far as it is possible that encouragement the most liberal, on the part of others, can overrule a man's own imprudence. The mastership of Norwich has certainly been considered a valuable prize by others. How it happened that Parr found it otherwise, or whether mere restlessness and love of change were his governing motives, does not appear; but it is certain, that in August 1785, he sent in his resignation; and at Easter 1786, he went to reside at the parsonage house of Hatton, in the county of Warwick, where he opened a private academy. And though, as old age advanced, he resigned his pupils, Hatton continued to be his place of residence.

This, then, was the haven, the perpetual curacy of Hatton, into which Dr Parr steered his little boat, when he had already passed the meridian* of his life. And (except upon a visit) he never again left it for any more elevated abode. For a philosopher, we grant that a much happier situation cannot be imagined than that of an English rural parson, rich enough to maintain a good library. Dr Parr was exactly in those circumstances: but Dr Parr was no philosopher. And assuredly this was not the vision which floated before his eyes at Stanmore, when he was riding on his "black saddle," in prelatical pomp, with his ivory crossier in his fist. The coach-and-four and mired panels, must then have flourished in the foreground of the picture. But at that time he was between 25 and 30: now he was turned 40—an age when, if a man should not have made his fortune, at least he ought to see clearly before him the road by which it is to be made. Now what was Parr's condition at this time, in respect to that supreme object of his exertions?—We have no letter on that point in this year, 1786: but we have one in 1782, when it does not appear (and indeed can hardly be supposed possible) that his situation was materially different. Writing to a man* whom he valued, but then under a cloud of distress, and perhaps wishing to excuse himself for not sending him money, he thus states the result of his labours up to that date:—"You desire my confidence; and I therefore add, that the little progress I have made in worldly matters, the heavy loss I have sustained by the war, the inconsiderable advantages I have gained by a laborious and irksome employment, and the mortifying discouragements I have met with in my clerical profession, have all conspired to depress my spirits, and undermine my constitution. I was content to give up ecclesiastical preferment, while I had a prospect of making some comfortable provision for my old age in my business as a teacher: but the best of my years have now elapsed; and I am, through a most vexatious and trying series of events, not a shilling richer than when I went to Stanmore. I have this very week closed an account, on which I stood indebted near £2000, which I was obliged to borrow when I launched into active life. My house at Stanmore, I sold literally for less money than I expended on the repairs only. To this loss of more than a thousand pounds, I am to add near £700, which I may lose entirely, and must lose in a great measure, by the reduction of St Vincent and St Kitt's. My patience, so far as religion prescribes it, is sufficient to support me under this severity of moral trial. But the hour is past in which I might hope to secure a comfortable independency; and I am now labouring under the gloomy prospect of toiling, with exhausted strength, for a scanty subsistence to myself and my family. It is but eighteen months that I could pronounce a shilling my own. Now, indeed, meo sum pauper in are—but my integrity I have ever held fast."

Possibly; but integrity might also have been held fast in a deanery; and certainly Dr Parr will not pretend to hoax us with such a story, as, that "integrity" was all that he contemplated from his black saddle in Stanmore. Undoubtedly, he

* By meridian, we here mean the month which exactly bisected his life. Dr Parr lived about eleven months less than eighty years; and he was about twenty-four when he came to live at Hatton.

framed to himself some other good things, so fortunately arranged, that they could be held in commendam with integrity. Such, however, was the naked fact, and we are sorry for it, at the time when Dr Parr drew near to his fortieth year—at which age, as all the world knows, a man must be a fool if he is not a physician. Pass on, reader, for the term of almost another generation; suppose Dr Parr to be turned of sixty, and the first light snows of early old age to be just beginning to descend upon him, and his best wig to be turning grey;—were matters, we ask, improved at that time? Not much. Twenty years from that Easter on which he had entered the gates of Hatton, had brought him within hail of a bishopric; for his party were just then in power. Already he could descry his sleeves and his rochet; already he could count the pinnacles of his cathedral;—when suddenly Mr Fox died, and his hopes evanesced in spiral wreaths of fuming Orinoco. Unfortunate Dr Parr! Once before he had conceived himself within an inch of the mitre; that was in the king's first illness, when the regency intrigue gave hopes, at one time, that Mr Pitt would be displaced. Dr Parr had then been summoned up to London; and he had gone so far as to lay down rules for his episcopal behaviour. But the king suddenly recovered; many a grasping palm was then relaxed abruptly; and, alas! for Dr Parr, whether people died or recovered, the event was equally unfortunate. Writing, on August 25, 1807, to the Bishop of Down, he says,—“If Mr Fox had lived and continued in power, he certainly would have made me a bishop.” Now, if Dr Parr meant to say that he had a distinct promise to that effect, that certainly is above guessing; else we should almost presume to guess, that Mr Fox neither would, nor possibly could, have made Dr Parr a bishop. It is true, that Mr Fox meant to have promoted the Bishop of Llandaff of that day, who might seem to stand in the same circumstances as a literary supporter; at least Lord Holland said to a friend of ours,—“Had our party remained in office, we should have raised the Bishop of Llandaff to the Archbishopric of York.” But then why? Lord Holland's reason was this,—“For he” (meaning Dr Watson) “behaved very well, I can assure you, to us,” (meaning by us the whole coalition probably of Grenvilles and Foxes.) Now, this reason (we fear) did not apply, in Mr Fox's mind, to Dr Parr; he had behaved violently, indiscreetly, foolishly, on several occasions; he had thoroughly disgusted all other parties; he had not satisfied his own. And once, when, for a very frivolous reason, he gave a vote for Mr Pitt at the Cambridge election, we are satisfied ourselves that he meditated the notable policy of rattling; conceiving, perhaps, that it was a romantic and ideal punctilio of honour to adhere to a doomed party; and the letter of Lord John Townshend, on that occasion, convinces us, that the Whigs viewed this very suspicious act in that light. Even Dr Johnstone, we observe, doubts whether Mr Fox would have raised Dr Parr to the mitre. And, as to everybody else, they shuddered at his very name. The Chancellor, Lord Thurlow, gave him a hearty curse, mon suo, instead of a prebend; and Lord Grenville assigned, as a reason against making him a bishop, his extreme unpopularity* with his own order. As one proof of that, even the slight distinction of preaching a visitation sermon had never once been offered to Dr Parr, as he himself tells us, in 1816, when he had completed his seventieth year, notwithstanding he had held preferment in five different counties. Nor was it, in fact, offered for six years more; and then, being a hopeful young gentleman of seventy-six, he thought proper to decline the invitation.

Next, for the emoluments of his profession,—Was he better off, as regards them? Else, whence came the coach-and-four? We answer, that, by mere accidents of good luck, and the falling-in of some extraordinary canal profits, Dr Parr's prebend in the cathedral of St Paul's, given to him by Bishop Lowth upon the interest of Lord Dartmouth, in his last year or two, produced him an unusually large sum; so that he had about three thousand a-year; and we are glad of it. He had also an annuity of three hundred a-year, granted by the Dukes of Norfolk and Bedford in consideration of a subscription made for Dr Parr by his political friends. But this was a kind of charity which would not have been offered, had it not been felt that, in the regular path of his profession, he had not drawn, nor was likely to draw, any conspicuous prizes. In fact, but for the two accidents we have mentioned, his whole regular income from the church, up to a period of advanced age, when Sir Francis Burdett presented him to a living of about £200 per annum, was £93 on account of his living—and £17 on account of his prebend.

* Parr's extreme and well-merited unpopularity with an order whom he had, through life, sneered at and misrepresented, is a little disguised to common readers by the fact, that he corresponds with more than one bishop on terms of friendship and confidence. But this arose, generally speaking, in latter life, when early school-fellows and pupils of his own, in several instances, were raised to the mitre.

Such were the ecclesiastical honours, and such the regular ecclesiastical emoluments of Samuel Parr. We do not grudge him the addition, as regards the latter, which, in his closing years, he drew from the liberality of his friends and the accidents of luck. On the contrary, we rejoice that his last days passed in luxury and pomp; that he sent up daily clouds of undulating incense to the skies; and that he celebrated his birthday with ducal game and venison from the parks of princes; finally, we rejoice that he galloped about in his coach-and-four, and are not angry that, on one occasion, he nearly galloped over ourselves.

Still, we rejoice that all these luxuries came to him irregularly, and not at all, or indirectly, and by accident, through the church. As regards that, and looking not to the individual, but entirely to the example, we rejoice that, both for her honours and emoluments, Dr Parr missed them altogether. Such be the fate, we pray heartily, of all unfaithful servants, in whatsoever profession, calling, or office of trust! So may those be still baffled and confounded, who pass their lives in disparaging and traducing their own honourable brethren; and who labour (whether consciously and from treachery, or half-consciously and from malice and vanity) for the subversion of institutions which they are sworn and paid to defend!

Our conclusion, therefore, the epimythion of our review, is this—that, considered as a man of the world, keenly engaged in the chase after rank and riches, Dr Parr must be pronounced to have failed; that his rare and late successes were casual and indirect; whilst his capital failures were due exclusively to himself. His two early bosom-friends and schoolfellows, Dr Bennet and Sir W. Jones, he saw raised to the rank of a bishop and a judge—whilst he was himself still plodding as a schoolmaster. And this mortifying distinction in their lots was too obviously imputable, not to any more scrupulous integrity in him, flattering and soothing as that hypothesis was to his irritated vanity, but solely to his own hot-headed defect of self-control—baffling the efforts of his friends, and neutralizing the finest opportunities. Both of those eminent persons, the bishop, as well as the judge, deeply disapproved of his conduct; though they agreed in candour, and in the most favourable construction of his meaning; and though they allowed him the largest latitude for his politics—one of them being a liberal Tory, and the other an ardent Whig. And yet, with the full benefit of this large privilege, he could not win their toleration to his indiscretions. So that, purely by his own folly, and in headstrong opposition to the concurring tendencies of his opportunities and his aids, Samuel Parr failed utterly as a man of the world. It remains to enquire—how much better he succeeded in establishing his character as a politician, a scholar, and a divine.

shew himself, the police-officer, on the pretence of preventing tumult, can prohibit the people from holding the public converse and discussion, and exercising other rights, which, on such an occasion, are of high importance. In case of illegal and arbitrary conduct in the government, he can prevent that communication amidst the people which is essential for enabling them to do their duty to themselves. He, therefore, is armed with despotic power against the preparatory and accompanying matters which are of the first consequence for giving to elections, public meetings, &c., their proper character.

He farther possesses the power of dragging any person he may meet before a magistrate on charges of his own invention, and sustained only by his own evidence. It is sufficiently known how shamefully this shameful power has been abused; but we may mention, that instances have occurred in which men of respectability have been tried for high crimes solely on his evidence. His powers virtually make the liberty of the subject little better than a name.

These powers enable him to be a general robber. Almost any man, however innocent he may be, will rather pay a sum of money than incur the loss of time, and shame of being carried before a magistrate, particularly if he can produce no witness of his innocence. The officer, therefore, has only to provoke a few angry words, magnify any trifle into a charge, or utter a causeless threat, and it will be pretty sure to extort for him the bribe. There is every reason to believe that this system prevails to a large extent.

He is surrounded with every thing that can destroy his morals. He no longer belongs to, or can mix with, society. His regular pay is scarcely sufficient for his subsistence; and he is instructed to look on reward and extortion as the only means of adding to it: it is made his interest to provoke offences, increase guilt, invent charges against the innocent, and commit general plunder through false accusation and perjury. All other things operate with interest to stimulate him to do this; opportunities continually force themselves on him; he has brethren to give him counsel and assistance in it as a calling: the arts and stratagems imposed on him by duty, habituate him to disregard of truth; he is brought into contact with the vile, and communication with iniquity of every description; through the night he is exposed to the society and bribes of prostitutes. It is notorious that in general the old police-officers were men of most depraved character, who prowled about in all quarters to get up litigation and charges in utter disregard of truth, and solely for their own pecuniary benefit; yet their incitements and means were nothing, compared with those of the new officers.

The only effectual restraint on him against abuse of power and villainy, must be found in the discontent and animosity of the people. In proportion as the latter are submissive, he must, in the nature of things, tyrannize over the exercise of popular right, and coin the liberty, property, and fame of the subject into criminal profit for himself. Thus he must always be a source of either disaffection, or tyranny and robbery.

If the spirit of the people be broken into passive submission to his monstrous power, it must be broken not only into utter incompetency for the exercise of popular rights and the defence of national freedom, but also into all the profligacy requisite for enabling the Executive to make the people instruments in their own wrong and oppression.

When the system reaches completion, the Executive will have a regular standing army, consisting of perhaps twenty or thirty thousand of these disguised soldiers—these mercenaries, who must be, in many respects, infinitely worse than soldiers—distributed through, and doing duty day and night in, those places in which alone public spirit and privilege can operate with any material effect against it. This army it can afterwards double in number, without the consent of parliament; and it can tax the community for its maintenance without such consent. This immense army, when generally established, will be, in both numbers and taxation for its support, above the regular and effective control of parliament; it will be employed in watching the political, as well as other conduct of the community; and it will really form, so far as re-guards domestic uses, an addition to the undisguised soldiers.

Let the system of stipendiary magistrates be carried to perfection, and the case will stand thus. The blue army, almost unlimited in numbers and powers, will be the servile instruments of the Executive; it will continually increase its encroachments on popular rights and the liberty of the subject; if it be unable to trample on the people to the desired extent, or if it by instruction goad them into resistance for the sake of pretext, the red army will always be in readiness to assist it. The stipendiary magistrates will readily combine the regular army with the police, and make both the instruments of the Executive. To the latter they will practically destroy the prohibition which has hitherto prevented it from employing the military against the people, and give it despotic control over both the police and the army.

It must be observed that the military force of the empire cannot be reduced by the creation and multiplication of the police; the latter, therefore, forms a means of increasing the standing army to an unlimited extent. It is idle to speak of the responsibility of the Executive in the absence of restriction and the teeth of law: such responsibility in these days is only a mockery and delusion. In addition to its usual command over the Legislature, the Executive is to possess legal means of filling the land with any number of its mercenaries, overawing and corrupting the people to any extent, and having at its nod the whole military and civil force of the empire. Where, then, are we to find its responsibility?

Let all this be contrasted with what it has replaced. In the first place, there were the beadies and street-keepers—a few straggling individuals employed by the people, and having no power to act save in manifest violations of law, or from the request of competent witnesses. Then there were the regular constables—men employed by, and selected from, the people, who only held their office for a short period, and who, while holding it, never acted save when called on by proper evidence, but followed their regular trades and occupations. Then there were the special constables taken from the people, and employed only for the moment, under independent magistrates, to keep the peace on particular occasions. Then there were the watchmen, taken from and employed by the people, having nightly duty alone, following during the day their respective callings, and armed only with legal powers against direct outrage. And then there were a few police-officers attached to the different offices; they were little more than the servants of the magistrates; their duty was in a great measure confined to the discovery of offenders, and in other respects they were bound from pernicious interference with public rights and liberties.

The civil force was thus not only carefully kept from the control of the Executive, but duly restricted in its powers, and as far as possible both prevented from making its offices a source of corrupt trade, and protected in its morals. Then the army, except in special cases, could not be employed against the people, save with the consent, and under the direction, of really independent magistrates; in consequence, it was properly preserved from the control of the Executive.

It will be seen that the new measures completely reverse English institutions in principle, spirit, and operation. They actually or practically throw aside sheriffs, mayors, and other independent magistrates, constables, &c., and give to the Crown despotic command over the whole military and civil force of the State. They in effect annihilate the civil force, and replace it with the menials of the Executive, and a force which is much worse than military. They take from the people almost wholly the constitutional power of governing themselves; although they spare the elective franchise, they expose the exercise of it to so much intimidation, corruption, and profligacy, that they make it little better than a name. When they reach maturity, any Ministry may, through them, make the King absolute.

The constitution and laws of our country—the maxims and injunctions of our fathers, insist that the Executive cannot be trusted; and, sanctioned by them, we protest against being thus placed at its mercy. The doctrine of such persons as Mr Hume and Sir Robert Wilson, that it ought to be armed with despotic power, because the people in these times will prevent the abuse of such power, is worthy of its parents, and of the contempt merited by every thing they teach. The turbulent, disaffected spirit of the people has, in the last fifteen years, been so far from forming a protection to public liberties, that it has produced a regular succession of legal inroads on them; and it has supplied the pretext for these despotic measures. The people's conduct and objects are at this moment exactly calculated to destroy their independence and morals, sink them into the lowest degradation, cause the better classes to support any thing for enslaving them, render necessary the preliminaries of arbitrary government, and furnish a Ministry with reasons for establishing such government. In all countries and ages, the leaders of the populace have been the men, first to delude the people into the conduct for making tyranny necessary, and then to assist in placing them under it.

Having stated our constitutional reasons, we must now offer some of a different description against the New Police. It is infinitely more expensive than the old one, and operates as a grievous new tax. In its leading objects—the prevention of crime and protection of property—it is not more efficient than the old one; on the contrary, it is alleged to be less so. By the exasperation it causes, it operates as a source of disorder. There are misdemeanours, crimes, tumults, and riots, because there is a Police.

And now, what overpowering state necessity, or even plausible plea of expediency, can be urged to justify these detestable changes? "Property must be protected!" replies the sagacious Mr Hume. We say the same; but then we are compelled to ask, Was not property protected before the New Police was established? The inhabitants of the metropolis respond, That, while the change has not increased their protection against thieves, it has reduced it against law; and that, in consequence of it, their property has lost no small portion of protection.

Speaking of the metropolis during the day, we maintain, from personal observation, that no alteration was called for; we have never met with one intelligent individual who on this point has differed from us. The populace was far more peaceable and good-humoured than that of provincial towns; and as to thefts and burglaries, they need not be named; the exceptions to this were confined to well-known parts, and principally to those inhabited by the Irish. The street-keepers, &c. were in general amply sufficient for the preservation of order; if they were not so in a very few great thoroughfares, or riotous streets, they could easily have been duly strengthened. If unexpected tumult took place, both the police-officers and the military could be at once obtained. On particular occasions, the special and other constables were abundantly adequate for preserving the peace without exciting animosity. With regard to the suburbs of the metropolis, where a day police was necessary, and had not temptations and means for abusing its powers, the efficiency of the patrol excluded all pretext for change.

Touching day duty, therefore, the New Police causes enormous expense, and grievously offends national feeling, without yielding any benefit worthy of notice; it is almost useless. Yet the idle officers swam in every street throughout the day, as though the population consisted only of thieves and rebels; an Englishman of the old school can scarcely look out of his dwelling, without being led by their presence to imagine he is living under martial law, amidst a people without morals. They are ostentatiously obtruded into the last of all places where we might expect to find them. If we walk across Hyde Park, from Cumberland Gate to where Achilles stands, and cast his fearful frown over the metropolis, as though he were drawing his weapon to place it for ever under military bondage, we meet two or three of them loitering about; and as to use, it is sufficient to say, the Park is more infested with sturdy insolent beggars than it was before their introduction.

Proceeding to the night, the alleged incompetency and misconduct of watchmen formed the great pretext for establishing the Police. Admitting their incompetency and misconduct, we must still say, the watchmen were, on ordinary occasions, about as efficient in keeping order on the streets as their successors are. They were more easily found, and they were less seen conversing with prostitutes. It must be remembered, that their instructions and powers were more limited than those are of the Police. In regard to robberies, it is asserted, that the latter has not reduced their numbers; at any rate, it has produced no perceptible improvement.

The defects of the watching system could have been easily remedied. The age and pay of watchmen might have been made matter of legal regulation; government might have been safely intrusted with a limited negative on the appointment of each; and the power to dismiss them on proper grounds, in case of refusal in the parish to do so. This would have been sufficient for compelling the parish to employ none but fit men.

The great defect was, the watchmen were not under due inspection and control. They had in the night-constables confederates, and they dragged their prey to the watch-house, confident of finding there only accomplices in extortion and perjury; they therefore made an infamous trade of imprisoning the innocent for the benefit of their own pockets. That is a most hateful power, which authorizes an ignorant peace-officer to put people in prison for the night, on his own testimony, and often for alleged wrong done to himself; saying nothing of other things, it is hateful, as a sure means of destroying his morals, and making him a villain; and, at the least, it ought only to be exercised under every possible restriction.

If a number of the most respectable housekeepers of a parish had snugly, in rotation, attended nightly at the watch-house, from eleven until two or three o'clock, for the purpose of being present when each prisoner was brought in, dismissing petty offenders, preventing combination and fraud amidst the watchmen, inspecting their general conduct, hearing complaints against them, &c., this might have proved a remedy. The duty would have come seldom, and it would not have kept them later from their beds than pleasure often does. Or a magistrate, or respectable agent appointed by government, might have attended nightly for the same purpose.

But what remedy to this is supplied by the New Police? None. The officers drag their victims to the station, and there is no proper person at it to keep them from extortion and conspiracy. With wider powers, they are on duty as free from effectual inspection and check as the watchmen were.

With regard to negligence in protecting property, &c., the watchmen might, with the greatest ease, have been placed under all the inspection and stimulants which operate on the Police. In truth, for all proper purposes, they might have been, without difficulty, made infinitely more efficient than this Police is; for, notwithstanding its expensive character, it is about as destitute as it could well be of effective inspection in the discharge of its more important duties.

Before we speak farther of the pretexts for creating it, let us look at the reasons for giving England hired magistrates. The system is extending, and the wish prevails in many quarters to make it general. It is easy to see, that, if it be not checked, most populous places will soon be placed wholly, or in a large degree, under such magistrates. Let the latter be done, and it will be a matter of minor moment if country parts retain their unpaid magistracy. If the Executive get large cities and towns under the yoke of its hired magistrates and police, it need not desire to extend this yoke farther, whatever arbitrary projects it may entertain.

In duty, a magistrate differs altogether from a judge. To enable him to dispense cheap law and justice, to prevent litigation, and give it the right character, he must be invested with very large discretionary powers. In most of the cases which come before him, he must decide according to equity and circumstances, rather than law and evidence; in many, he must disregard the latter, to redress or prevent wrong. It is, therefore, essential for him to possess a benevolent, manly heart; and to be, from experience, intimately acquainted with real life and business,—with the habits, feelings, maxims, interests, and relations of society; these form the equity-principles and precedents which ought to govern his decisions. He needs little knowledge of law, and he has the attorney, who acts as clerk to him, and his brethren, to aid him.

In reason, therefore, the man who has been extensively engaged in business, and compelled to mix largely with general society, makes the best magistrate; and this is confirmed by all experience. No better magistrates exist than the mayors and aldermen of corporations; if they do not know much of law, they know much of right and justice. The case is the same with those invaluable magistrates, the country gentlemen.

Legal education forms a great argument with the advocates of stipendiary magistrates. To give it validity, they ought to prove that the magistrate can only acquire a proper knowledge of law through such education; but no such proof can be discovered. The general knowledge of law he requires is easily gained; he has no intricate legal cases to decide; if he live in a town, he has an attorney and barrister constantly at his elbow; if he dwell in the country, he refers serious cases to the meeting of the magistrates, at which he has an attorney to advise with; and the party who applies to him frequently does it through an attorney, and can always consult one if he think justice is refused him. Speaking generally, the whole stream of evidence furnished by the most ample experiment proves these matters—1. The unpaid magistrates possess a sufficient knowledge of law. 2. Their decisions are governed by it to the utmost extent called for by right and justice. 3. They are surrounded with adequate restrictions for preventing in them pernicious violation of, and departure from, it.

Every Englishman who can speak from personal observation will join us in asserting, that frequently barristers, retired attorneys, and even clergymen, make the worst magistrates.

They follow law the most servilely, and in consequence their decisions are the most harsh, unjust, and unsatisfactory; they are the most disliked and avoided.

A stipendiary magistrate of legal education must, in general, be a man who knows nothing besides law—may be destitute of acquaintance with men and things, and moreover, little gifted with capacity. There is not in nature a more silly, mischievous animal than such a man. Even eminent lawyers, on the whole, have been always remarkable for ignorance of general life, and inability to judge of it correctly—narrow views and mistaken conclusions; and in legal matters they have afforded abundant proof that law, without sagacity and knowledge of the world to guide its application, may easily be made an engine of wrong and oppression. Such a magistrate must be destitute of most of the essentials demanded by his office; and his legal education will make him measure every thing by the severe, strained, and often perverted letter of the law, to the destruction of right and denial of justice. The unpaid magistrates now act under the direction of men of legal education as far as the good of society requires: but their benevolence and sense of equity soften and correct their legal instruction; if men of such education only are magistrates, all must be ignorant, blind, violent, unfeeling law, with nothing to temper and restrain it.

In our judgment, it would be quite as wise to insist that none but men of legal education ought to serve on juries, as that none but such men ought to act as magistrates. The magistrate has to act as juror, as well as judge; and in very many cases he is really an arbitrator, to settle them according to custom and equity, without being bound by law: yet we are gravely assured that he alone is qualified to be one, whose life has been spent in schools and law-courts, and who is acquainted with nothing else, saving perhaps a newspaper-office. It will have small weight with those who think with the constitution, that even an experienced, able, upright judge ought, in the trial of causes, only to be intrusted with the power to state law and sum up evidence, and that their merits ought to be de-

Farther, divers of the magistrate's duties have nothing to do with law, and his discharge of them must be governed by his discretion. He has the power to prevent the holding of public meetings—in case of apprehended or actual disturbance, he has under his command both the civil power and the military; therefore, he possesses the means of suppressing all manifestation of popular feeling—the exercise of popular rights is, to a large extent, under his control—he reports on the state of public feeling to government—and in several cases he forms a court of appeal against the agents of the Executive. Without mentioning other matters, it is very evident that other essentials ought to be found in him than legal education; that the latter must tend to lead him into abuse and error in the exercise of his discretionary powers; and that a briefless barrister or unsuccessful attorney is about the very last person who ought to be made a magistrate.

The unpaid magistrates are so numerous, that every village has one in or near it; their time is so little occupied, that they can mix largely with society, and in emergencies they act in bodies, which has the best effects in regard to both counsel and influence. Stipendiary magistrates would be far less numerous, because the country could not afford to have men to do nothing the greater part of their time. These would be some of the consequences—most parts of the country would be many miles distant from a magistrate—the benefits drawn from law and order would be greatly reduced—the magistrate would be constantly confined to his office, and have no leisure for acquiring the information and spirit called for by many of his duties, and in emergencies he would have to act almost alone on his own judgment and without moral weight.

The unpaid magistrates are men of great political influence; they have a deep stake in the public weal and the preservation of popular liberties; they are divided into opposite political parties; and they expect to draw no promotion from their office. All this, combined with their numbers and connexion, places them rather above, than under the Executive. While it is their personal interest to exercise their discretionary powers in the best manner, it is hopeless for the Executive to attempt to intimidate or corrupt them in it. But stipendiary magistrates would have no stake in the country, and every thing in interest and circumstance would combine to make them the tools of the Ministry; they would servilely follow the commands of the latter in all things relating to national liberties and privileges. The unpaid ones, in habits, feelings, intercourse, and interest, really form part of the people; but stipendiary ones would be an essential part of the Executive, as opposed to the people. The latter is now restrained and influenced by the magistrates; but the stipendiary system would make it a despot over them.

Unprejudiced people will find in all this abundant cause for believing the outcry to be ludicrously preposterous, that penurious, place-hunting, mercenary, ignorant, and shallow lawyers, are the only persons who ought to be magistrates; the more especially when they know, that it is chiefly raised by the lawyers themselves. The world proclaims custom to be second nature; a man's heart and principles must take their character in a large degree from his daily occupation. The lawyers' trade is, for hire, to support law and wrong against justice and right, to argue on the false and oppressive side, to quirk, misrepresent, intrigue, overreach, and take unjust advantage, to maintain falsehood and fraud against truth and honesty. All history and experience assert the principle—Keep political trust and power from lawyers.

But it is urged, that there is a growing reluctance in country gentlemen to enter the magistracy, and that in some places men cannot be found to act as unpaid magistrates. The country gentlemen, in plain terms, entertain this reluctance from sheer cowardice, flowing from the war waged against them in certain newspapers by barristers and attorneys, Scotch, Irish, and English. In it, they are making a dastardly surrender to the lawyers, not only of their own interests, but of those of the community, of the constitution in both principle and institution. This forms but a miserable pretext for the stipendiary system.

The alleged inability to find men willing to act as unpaid magistrates, is confined to populous places. If these had each a corporation, they would always have excellent unpaid magistrates; and what is there to prevent it?

A corporation often has privileges which are injurious to the public, but these have so little to do with its welfare, that they are generally useless to it. Considered apart from them, it is of the highest value as a local and subsidiary government. It gives to the inhabitants of a place the selection of their magistrates; it secures to them an abundance of magistrates who are men of business, perfectly independent, identified with them in feeling and interest, and possessed of the greatest moral influence in character, fortune, and connexions. They draw from it general guardians, and promoters of every thing that can benefit them. It is of the greatest national value, in causing the people to confide in, and combining them with, the magistracy. Some idea of the advantages it yields may be gained by contrasting the government of the city of London with that of Westminster.

It could not be a difficult matter to found corporations, free from the defects and errors of the old ones, in the populous places which are now nearly destitute of local government. If the name be obnoxious, such government might be established under a new one, and limited in its objects to the creation of a proper magistracy, ready and cheap law, and efficient guardians of the peace. If this were done, it would not only remove all necessity for stipendiary magistrates, by providing different ones of far better character, but yield other great advantages.

The very heavy expense which stipendiary magistrates would impose on the community, not only in salary, but also in increase of litigation, is a matter not to be overlooked.

These hateful changes are defended on the ground, that the fearful extension of vice, crime, turbulence, and disorder amidst the people, makes them necessary. It is one of the worst signs of the times, that while the conduct of the people is exactly calculated to supply bad rulers with pretexts for establishing arbitrary government, nothing but such government is thought of as a means of correcting it. The two evils have continually enlarged each other—popular misconduct has been met with despotic law, and despotic law has increased popular misconduct, until it has become a question, whether the freedom of the empire can be longer preserved. Before the last plunge into tyranny is taken, it may be as well to suspend this savage cry for coercion and punishment; and enquire whether better means of ruling cannot be employed than the iron arm of the law and the brute force of hired mercenaries.

Self-government in the people—meaning by the latter term not the lower orders only, but the population at large—forms the end and essence of national freedom. The great fathers of English liberty had too much knowledge and wisdom to content themselves with merely establishing a representative form of government; independently of this, they secured to the people the right to govern themselves to the farthest point, without the use of delegated authority; and then to do it by means of functionaries of their own selecting, armed only with powers of their own defining. They studiously laboured to make the people, and not only the Legislature, but also the general Executive, one in feeling, interest, and even person—to connect the whole in both deliberation and action—to incorporate the Executive with the people in every thing. The English monarchy, in its best days, was, much more than many republics ever were—a popular government.

Without this, there can be no national freedom, either really or nominally. If the people be thrown out of the government, despotism—no matter what forms of freedom may be retained—is practically established; and they must be thrown out of it, if they be not combined with the Executive as well as the Legislature. Separate the two from the former in sentiment and functionary, and they will be arrayed against it as an eneing; nothing but brute force, or their proper spiritual and bodily incorporation with it, can keep them from waging against it regular warfare. Such warfare must fill them with the worst feelings, and make the command of the Legislature a matter of eternal contention between them and the Executive. They will use the elective franchise to return unprincipled demagogues, merely on the ground of their being enemies to the latter, and then it will buy up the demagogues, who are always the most easy of purchase, or adopt their destructive doctrines. The Legislature must either, in corrupt alliance with the Executive, forcibly oppose national feeling, or, in destructive obedience to such feeling, incapacitate the Executive for the discharge of its duties. A wicked, imbecile, revolutionary, denationalized, anti-popular Legislature—one, in respect of honour and patriotism, drawn from the scum of society—must inevitably flow from the warfare we have named: and whether it support the people or the Executive, it must, combined with such warfare, insure arbitrary government.

It has been the system in late years to throw the general population out of the government. Public meetings and petitions have been wholly disregarded, and they have nearly fallen into disuse. A greater mockery could hardly be conceived than to call that a popular government, the functionalities of which, without distinction or discrimination, treat with contempt the sentiments and feelings of the body of the people. While the Executive has thus been separated from the people in opinion and spirit, it has been continually engrossing their right of self-rule in regard to person; and thus the separation has been extended to every thing. The consequences are before the eyes of all.

By the laws of nature, therefore, tranquillity and freedom cannot exist if the people at large and the Executive be not combined as we have stated; and, in order to produce and maintain the combination in its proper character, it is essential to keep the people under the influence of right principles and feelings. To keep them thus, it is evidently essential:—1. To promote morals to the utmost; 2. To preserve the sources of public opinion free from error and impurity; and, 3. To make local government as perfect and as independent of the Executive as possible. These three matters form the root of free government; they must give to a representative system its value, and prevent it from being a plague.

It is of the first importance that these matters should be especially attended to in the metropolis. While it is peculiarly exposed to every thing which can operate against them, it exercises overpowering influence over the country at large, and the government. There is, perhaps, no other place in which they are so much neglected.

With regard to morals, they are pre-eminently bad in the metropolis. In looking first at the great source—violation of the Sabbath—we will observe, that, putting a future state wholly out of the question, there is nothing in the social system of more value to the body of the people, than a due observance of this day. Neither body nor mind can bear continual toil, and both require a seventh day of rest to keep them in health and vigour: the abolition of it would considerably reduce the demand for labour, and a vast portion of the working classes would have to labour seven days instead of six for the wages they now receive: to this must be added, the loss these classes would sustain, in respect of cleanliness, intercourse with friends, and the means of instruction. Looking beyond its religious objects, the Sabbath may be regarded as a merciful concession to human nature, an invaluable boon to the poor—a divine interposition to give that protection to the health, comforts, and privileges of the mass of mankind, which, perhaps, nothing else could bestow. The workman who establishes the precedent for making it a day of labour, attacks the best temporal interests of himself and his brethren.

The violation of the Sabbath begins with the great. Giving to Royalty its due precedence, it, in times much too recent, has given its magnificent Sunday dinners. Ministers have given theirs, and besides, have had their Sunday Cabinet meetings—and to these must be added, the Sunday entertainments of the nobility in general. This in rulers—in the official guardians of religion and morals—in those who stand at the head of society as models of conduct, is bad enough in the way of example, but this is not the whole of its evil operation. If the King give a grand Sunday dinner, it may only cause him and his guests to feast, but it compels his domestics and tradesmen to toil. Thus these Sunday entertainments of the great, collectively, bind a vast portion of the trading and labouring orders to regular Sunday trade and labour.

Much is justly said in favour of giving religious instruction to the young. Let the children, who at charity schools receive it, and are taught to keep the Sabbath sacred, enter the service of the great, or their tradesmen, and what follows? It is made their duty to disregard what they have been taught; they are in a large degree prohibited from attending divine worship, and compelled to make the Sunday as much a day of labour as the rest of the week; thus their religious instruction is rendered useless. We need not say how this must operate when they become heads of families.

Independently of this great cause, the labouring classes of the metropolis violate the Sabbath in the most appalling manner. The lower of them, who cannot follow their respective callings on it, spend it in drunkenness, which they commence before, or immediately after, breakfast. A man cannot go to divine service in the morning, without seeing numbers of them reeling about the streets in the different stages of intoxication. Mechanics and artisans work as regularly at their respective trades, on at least great part of the Sunday, as they do on any other day; their masters' shops are closed, but they do it at their lodgings. Their wives are of course made to share the guilt, and their children are reared in it.

Let this be looked at also, with reference to the religious instruction of youth. If the children of these classes be put to charitable schools, what they see, hear, and are made to do at home, renders the instruction they receive almost ineffectual. If they be put to labour in the lower callings, as apprentices, or otherwise, they are incited to abandon their religious principles. Young men just out of their apprenticeship, labourers, &c., whose morals in the country have been well protected, continually pour into London in search of employment; and as soon as they enter it, they are not only led by example, but almost compelled by their brother workmen, to make the Sabbath a day of vice or labour. Thus the religious instruction of youth is in general deprived of value by the irreligion of adults.

Speaking merely as men of the world, and as infidels would speak, what flows from this conduct in the labouring classes? Those who spend the Sabbath in drinking, spend it in qualifying both themselves and their families for every kind of vice and crime; they make themselves brutal husbands, unnatural fathers, rioters, and robbers; they starve their wives into prostitution, and their children into begging and stealing. Those who spend it in labour do the same, more effectually. Nature, as we have said, requires a seventh day of rest, and because they work on Sunday, they do nothing on Monday. The latter is their day of drunkenness, when there is no religious restraint, and when the stimulants to general profligacy are the most numerous and powerful. Because these classes, as a whole, do not employ the Sabbath in acquiring moral principles and habits, they employ it in acquiring the contrary; to the use they make of it, may be clearly traced their general bad morals; and the latter form the great cause of their hatred of the better part of society, hostility to public institutions, love of demagogues, insubordination and disaffection.

With regard to remedy, the great, at any rate, are not above the reach of reproof. If one prelate be insufficient for giving it, let all unite; and if this will not do, let the parochial clergy combine with them. Every prelate has a deep interest in supporting the morals of London. If a strong remonstrance, signed by every prelate, and the whole London clergy, were presented, not generally, but to every offender, without sparing the Legislature, the Cabinet, or the Throne, it would have the best effects. The great, both in authority and out of it, have now melancholy proof before them, that none have so deep a stake in the preservation of morals, as themselves.

No valid reason can be urged why gin and beer-shops should be open on the Sunday before one o'clock. If they were closed until this hour, it would narrow Sunday drunkenness greatly. At present, they are compelled to close at eleven, and during divine service; and in consequence, the better part of society, in proceeding to the latter, has its religious feelings shocked at every step, by the sight of individuals and groups half drunk, or wholly so, just turned out of them. If, in addition, these places were prohibited from selling any liquor on the Sunday, to be drank in them, it would operate mightily against drunkenness, without encroaching on the just needs of society. Exceptions might be made on proper grounds.

The custom of making Monday a holyday, is the great cause of voluntary Sunday labour amidst mechanics and artisans. It not only gives them the bodily rest, which otherwise they would be compelled to take on the Sunday; but it necessitates them to make the latter a day of toil, by expense and loss of wages. And it is a prolific source of general profligacy. A greater benefit could hardly be conferred on the working orders, than the suppression of this idle, vicious, and destructive custom. Very much might be done by masters, who are great sufferers from it, if they would, as far as possible, employ none but workmen willing to labour regularly on the Monday.

A powerful cause of Sabbath-breaking, and general immorality amidst the lower orders of the metropolis, is to be found in their separation from not only the church and the clergy, but also the chapel and the dissenting minister. We have heretofore adverted to this, and we will do it again and again, until we see something attempted in the way of remedy. If a mechanic or labourer never enter the church, or see a clergyman, save in the streets, he naturally thinks he has nothing to do with either. This is the case with the mass of the lower orders in question; they are practically as much divided and estranged from both as the inhabitants of the other hemisphere; and in consequence they are ready to believe every thing they hear against them. The political evil of this, great as it is, is not the worst. Man has been truly called a religious animal, and the Englishman is peculiarly one; the latter has not the mercurial spirits of the Frenchman, or the crazy resolution of the Irishman, or the unconquerable self-approbation of the Scotchman, to sustain him in his guilt; but remorse tortures him at every step, and he is enabled to persevere, mainly because the voice of religion cannot reach him. Let the most depraved of men attend divine worship regularly, or be acted upon in any other way by spiritual admonition; and in most cases they will soon be reclaimed. In general, perseverance in vice, guilt, irreligion, and infidelity, is only made practicable by voluntary or compulsory separation from both the sight and hearing of religion.

Boys, on being put to many trades—young men on the expiration of their apprenticeship—servants of both sexes to a large extent—young men from the country—both sexes in humble life on marrying—have no place of worship to go to. They may individually gain occasional admission into one or another; but they have none they can go to regularly. In consequence, the mass of them absent themselves wholly from divine service, and awful are both the political and the moral fruits.

New churches are built, but they are in a great measure monopolized by the wealthy; the free seats in them are totally inadequate for the accommodation of the lower orders. There is another great defect in them—not only free seats, but cheap ones, and particularly cheap pews, are wanted; there are none.

• Build, in proper situations, plain, neat chapels, and place in them pious and reasonably eloquent clergymen. In each, confine the pews for the rich, and even the free seats, to a small number; devote the principal part to pews capable of holding three adults, or a man, his wife, and two children; and do not let the yearly rent of each pew rise above from twenty shillings to forty: to a certain extent, let them in single sittings, at from two to four shillings per quarter each. An organ probably cannot be afforded; therefore, instead, let a certain number of singers be hired amidst the lower orders; plenty could be found who would attend for a trifle. Our conviction is, that every pew would be constantly let. Many mechanics, labourers, domestic servants, &c., would much rather pay for pews or sittings which they could call their own and constantly occupy, than use the free seats. To make people regular church-goers, it is essential for them to know they have seats of their own to go to.

The chapels, in our judgment, would pay all their expenses, including the support of their ministers; we speak less from conjecture than from what we have seen of actual trial in country places, where the preposterous rule is unknown of compelling people to choose between free seats, and such exorbitant pew rents as only the wealthy can pay. But where is the money to be found for erecting them? Could the Church do nothing? We are speaking only of the metropolis, therefore could no contribution be gained from St Paul's and Westminster Abbey? If the comparatively poor Dissenters can rear such superb chapels as they do, it cannot be impossible for opulent churchmen to imitate them. Suppose the King, and also the Queen—for the matter concerns the fair sex as well as the other—were to nobly subscribe £10,000 each, to be paid in five or ten annual portions—the Cabinet Ministers, prelates, and beneficed clergy, were to subscribe in proportion—and the appeal were thus made to the nobility and opulent classes generally—there would be no lack of money for supplying the poor with places of worship.

But in regard to religion and morals, as well as other things, much depends on keeping on the right side the guides of public opinion. These in the main are the press—the legislature—and, in respect of example, the court and aristocracy. The first governs the others in these times, although it is largely influenced by them. Including in the term both newspapers and periodicals, the press is decidedly vicious in its construction, and its bonds and temptations are almost all on the side of evil. A publication is carried on solely or chiefly for the sake of pecuniary profit; and it must depend for this on either the bribes of party or sale. If it accept the former, it of course sacrifices public to party interests; if it have only the latter to look to, it takes the side which will bring the most, without regard to merits. The gigantic revolution, from which in late years scarcely any thing has escaped, has had extraordinary effects on the mechanism of the London press.

Previously, it was the policy of every Ministry to have its newspapers—to correct the press by means of the press. Such a statesman as Mr Pitt would almost as soon have thought of carrying on the government without a majority in Parliament, as without the aid of this mighty engine. The connexion of the Ministry with its newspapers was known, therefore it made itself responsible for their general contents, and it bound them to the advocacy of loyalty and order. Their exclusive information, their talent, and the party spirit of the Ministry's supporters, gave them very large circulation and influence.

It necessarily followed that the Opposition also had its newspapers, which, by their connexion with it, were at least bound from revolutionary doctrines. They, also, possessed the means of securing great circulation and influence.

These two descriptions of newspapers naturally bore down all competitors; others could gain no weight with the respectable part of society, and, in general, could scarcely keep themselves in being. The "reading public," then, had little to do with the lower orders, and this operated greatly both to give them the lead, and to keep them from improper conduct.

The Liverpool Ministry, by its intestine divisions and contempt of literary talent, almost destroyed the Treasury press, and then, as its only means of retaining place, it apostatized to the Opposition. In late years, the Ministry has had no press under its control; instead of commanding, it has been the slave of its newspapers; its wretched system has been to bribe and supplicate the Opposition ones to support it personally, and yet give them liberty to write down its policy and principles. Thus we have seen the depraved sycophant laud the Duke of Wellington as a god, and attack the aristocracy, church, corn law, and all besides on which the Wellington Ministry could stand, in the same article. It has followed, that the Opposition has, in a great measure, ceased to control its newspapers; all have been voluntarily fighting its battles.

The immense increase of readers amidst the lower orders has operated largely both to emancipate the press from the control of public men, and to range it on the wrong side. The patronage of gin, beer, and coffee-shops, and eating-houses, is now more safe and lucrative than that of the Ministry or Opposition; if a publication enjoy the latter, it must labour to gain the former also as far as possible; if the Ministry and Opposition will have nothing to do with it, the patronage of gin-shops, &c., is almost essential for keeping it in being. The doctrine that the press is the source of public opinion contains more error than truth. The press, amidst the intelligent classes, has great effect in guiding opinion; but amidst the lower ones, it must follow them in opinion to be read; it may in many things even give them new opinion, but this it must borrow from their interests and prejudices.

Thus in losing, or casting off the control of the two great constitutional parties of the state, the London press placed itself under the control of the populace. The sale to the private dwelling and the counting-house was comparatively nothing without that to the liquor shop and eating-house. If we grant that it did this honestly, it is of small moment, because, with an exception or two, the journals which did not do it could not be kept in being. But the honesty of the matter is very questionable. Any man who has noticed the conduct of those daily papers which have the largest circulation, must have seen that on every subject they have consulted nothing, saving the dictates of their own rivalry and the bribes of parties, but the passions and prejudices of the multitude. The proprietors of certain of them have gone almost from door to door, amidst the gin and coffee-shops, to solicit orders; of course, they have done this with the knowledge that only opinions of a particular kind would be vendible in such places. One of the reviews has used even lower arts than the lowest newspaper ever stooped to, in order to force itself into the gin and coffee-shops, and pick up filthy pence at the cost of truth and independence. Various papers which have been commenced in late years on right principles, have glided into mob politics, as the only means of escaping ruin, or at least of making profit. The two or three which have not espoused the popular cause have little sale in London, save to the aristocracy.

Unhappily, therefore, the case now stands thus. Newspapers cannot gain a living circulation, or any influence of moment, amidst the inhabitants of London, unless they take the popular side; therefore, they are necessarily about all on this side. In supporting it, they must be the most abject slaves that ever wore the chains of slavery. Driven along like brutes in harness, the least act of disobedience to their mob drivers receives a flogging in the shape of loss of circulation quite intolerable; bound to the loathsome toil of pandering to the interests and passions of the multitude, their competition cannot go beyond efforts to outstrip each other in dishonest subservience to them. What could be more impossible than for the popular London newspapers and periodicals to discuss great national questions—reform, the corn laws, taxes and retrenchment, with truth and impartiality, when they dare not, under penalty of heavy fine and ruin, say any thing that may displease the populace?

Various matters conspire to give these the worst operation. The doctrines which suit the palate of the populace are also relished by that of the middle classes. The press is chiefly in the hands of Scotchmen and Irishmen, whose feelings of nationality are hostile to England, and cause them to regard her as little better than a victim for barbarous experiments. The population of the metropolis consists, to a vast extent, of Scotchmen and Irishmen, and to these must be added a very large number of foreigners.

Liberal opinions, as they are called, confessedly strike at the obligations of religion and morals; and the press must necessarily sink in immorality with the populace. A few years since, it was the fashion to give a religious tone to popular literature, and, looking no farther, this had excellent effect in keeping the press from irreligion. This fashion has been reversed; the literary mechanics, who at present carry on the low and depraved trade of criticism, declare religion shall have no place in such literature; and every writer to whom character is dear, must now, when he touches on morals, carefully protest against being thought "a saint" or "straitlaced;" and also interlard his composition with the expletives of the coalheaver. It is extraordinary that, after the vulgar and odious vice of swearing had been banished from every grade of society save the lowest, it is adopted by gifted writers; and genius in cool blood makes its elaborate displays of "What the d—!"—"By G—d!"—"D—n!" &c. We feel assured that the genius which does this, never in conversation heard a swearer without disgust, even when his oaths had the best elocution, and the warmth of passion, to soften their repulsive character. Will taste, keeping better things from the critical seat, slumber for ever?

In late years the London press has, with little exception, opposed itself to religion and morals. A part of it openly teaches infidelity, but it is the least mischievous one. Another influential part, under the pretence of attacking what it calls evangelism and puritanism, furiously writes down religious feeling and practice. A third part, under the name of sporting papers, teaches gaming, drunkenness, and every kind of depravity. These papers, in a great measure, form the Sunday reading of the godless lower orders; they are almost the only ones which find their way on the Sabbath into the lower eating-houses and liquor-shops. It is a melancholy singularity that many of the London Sunday papers are, in one way or another, far more hostile to religion and morals than the daily ones. Then the general press opposes religious societies, and throws its shield over every source of immorality.

The London press, no matter what may govern it, must always, to a vast extent, govern the Legislature; and, in its influential part, it must be ruled by, or rule the Executive. Its "independence" makes it the tyrant over both, and in late years it has ranged both on the side of irreligion and immorality. It generates in them evil feelings and conduct, and then this stimulates it to farther profligacy.

We who write have always belonged to the Church of England, and in communion with her we hope to die; but we have never spared the transgressions of her clergy, or been tardy in defending the Dissenters. In that spirit of impartial justice which has ever animated us, we must say, that in latter times the Dissenters have had a gigantic share in placing both the press and the Legislature on the side of irreligion and immorality, and that in this their ministers have taken the lead. To which political party do the Protestant Dissenters attach themselves? That which not only comprehends the avowed infidel and profligate, but boasts of its godless character, and makes a virtue of defending licentiousness. What newspapers do these Dissenters support? Those which teach Sabbath-breaking, and attack every source of morals. Whom do these Dissenters vote for as members of the Legislature? Freethinkers, gamblers, men stained with every vice, and whose creed strikes at the foundations of religion. The Dissenting ministers of the metropolis must have a university, not only destitute of religion, but supported and governed by its avowed enemies; rather than one tainted with the heresies of the Church. The Dissenters of Southwark, Leeds, and other places, must be represented in Parliament by any mountebank who will spread infidelity and vice by law, rather than by the conscientious friend of the national religion. The preaching minister and the scoffing Atheist, the praying convert and the swearing drunkard, draw side by side, in brotherly affection, to array both the press and the Legislature against religion and morals. It is a most deplorable fact, that in late years the portion of the House of Commons which has been the most irreligious in private life, and the most bold and active on the side of infidelity and vice, has owed its election chiefly to the preaching and praying Protestant Dissenters.

Farther, the latter have done prodigious injury to religion, by connecting it with politics. In regard to the slavery question,* their ministers enter the political arena to utter the most gross untruths, and advocate the most unjust spoliation: it is no defence to say they do this from ignorance, for they, of all men, should not speak without knowledge. What follows from their guilty labours to place their fanaticism above both the Scriptures and the laws of the realm, and to usurp the functions of Government? A vast portion of the population is led to regard religion as an enemy of law, right, and property; and to seek its practical suppression as a matter of personal and national safety.

The Dissenters have long rendered the greatest service to religion and morals amidst the lower orders; but this, in the last few years, has been more than counterbalanced by the injury they have inflicted on them in regard to the press and the Legislature. They have done more than any other men in the empire to secure their overthrow. Those who think that religion is on the point of being extinguished for a season, may see abundant cause for holding their opinion; and they may also see that her peril has been mainly created by her misguided professors. To the bigoted, fanatical part of the Dissenters, we speak not; but to the very many excellent and sensible people numbered among them, we say, What have you to gain from this conduct? Granting that times have been when it was necessary for you to place politics above religion, have they undergone no change? What have you now in honesty to hope, or to fear, from the Church and Government? You have zealously assisted in producing the fearful dangers you are at this moment calling on Heaven in your chapels to remove,—you confess they threaten you as much as the national religion,—you see that with the latter you must fall, and yet from hostility to it, alike unprovoked and wicked, you combat for the Liberals, to whom it is less an object of contempt and enmity than your own. You are practically using your tremendous power for the overthrow of all religion; and if you proceed a little farther, dreadful will be the penalty exacted from you for the heinous iniquity.

The Court and Aristocracy have much in habit, and more in circumstance, to tempt them to immorality; and at all times it depends largely on the press, whether they are to be licentious, or the contrary.

But in other matters, as well as religion and morals, the press to a great extent governs the Legislature and the upper classes, as guides of public opinion; and if it be not kept from error and impurity, they cannot.

At present, then, the London press is perfectly despotic over the Legislature, the Executive, and every thing besides; we do not speak too strongly, when we say, they dare not oppose or disobey it. In matters of foreign and domestic policy, its mandates alone must be listened to; at its nod, the empire must have its interest sacrificed both at home and abroad; the voice of the people at large must be treated with scorn, and all the realities of national freedom must be in effect annihilated. If this despotism were truly independent and upright, it would still be flatly opposed to liberty and the spirit of the constitution, which inslet that there shall be no despotism of any kind—that every thing in the social system shall be duly balanced and restricted. But it is the reverse. The tyrant over the authorities of the realm, it is virtually the slave of the liquor-shops and dining-rooms, or, at the best, of these combined with the general shops and counting-houses: it avows itself to be devoted to the popular cause; thus it confesses itself to be the menial of a party, and of that which generally wars against the best interests of the community. It has long been endeavouring to give this party, to wit, the populace, arbitrary control over the rest of the population. The different publications vary in character; but nearly all are on the same side: the moderate must assist the profligate ones, or be silent. Thus effective discussion is suppressed;—the Legislature is stripped of its deliberative functions, and the Executive of its powers, to be made the instruments of remorseless tyranny.

* We appeal to every friend of freedom and right, whether societies ought to be tolerated by law, which, by addressing inflammatory falsehood to the religious feelings of the ignorant, and other equally infamous means, attempt to form the community into an organized conspiracy, for the purpose of forcing Government to make great changes of law, which vitally affect the property and subsistence of large masses of his Majesty's subjects, as well as the best interests of the empire. We say this with reference to the Anti-Slavery Society. If any member of this pestilential nest of lawyers and religion-destroyers form part of the Ministry, either in the Cabinet or out of it, the matter ought at once to be taken up in Parliament. It seems as though the new Ministry would have difficulty in preserving itself from being assassinated by its legal members.

No honest man will say that this state of things ought to continue; and no intelligent one will say that it can continue, without soon producing the overthrow of the empire, and the dissolution of society. The main argument in defence of the liberty of the press, even with the Whigs, has always been that the press could be made to correct its own errors,—to balance and restrain itself; but it is at present worthless. Whatever may be the case, touching mere personal and local matters, the press now cannot be made to do this in regard to interest and class, principles and systems, of national policy.

What, then, ought to be done? Our reply is, legal measures would be useless; they could supply no remedy without destroying the freedom of the press. In a free, great, and reading nation like this, we hold it to be a matter of imperious state necessity for the Ministry to have its own newspapers, controlled in their general contents by itself, and compelled to uphold public institutions, and the interests of the upper as well as the lower classes. This will cause, which we hold to be equally necessary, the Opposition to have its papers governed in a similar manner. Farther, the aristocracy and clergy, as one of the conditions of their support, ought to bind the Ministry and Opposition to keep their papers rigidly attached to right principles. These newspapers would have great and influential circulation, and, to a certain extent, they would lead the lower orders to hear both sides. As to the popular cause, it would still have its full share of the press; saying nothing of the Opposition prints, the golden patronage of gin, beer, dinner, and coffee-shops, would have no lack of newspaper candidates.

Our decided conviction is, that nothing but this can create a divided, balanced, self-correcting press. Some years since, the Quarterly and Edinburgh Reviews led public opinion and the newspapers; but the latter, and the Magazines, now equal, and often surpass them in talent; and they have lost their ascendancy. The newspapers at present, in influence, form the press; and they must be divided by some such means as we have described, or be combined and omnipotent. As to their independence, it is out of the question; they cannot live if they do not accommodate their opinions to their party; and it is impossible, in the nature of things, for them to be independent. The choice lies between a united press, independent of the two great constitutional parties of the State, but the slave of the liquor and other shops, and the lower orders of London: and a divided one, governed partly by the latter, and partly by the two parties;—between a press representing the diversities of public opinion, and one representing only the opinion of the shops and lower orders we have named;—between a constitutional press, defending all interests and classes, and promoting due discussion in and out of the Legislature, and a revolutionary one, warring against the aristocracy, church, and public institutions in general, and prohibiting such discussion.

As matters are, no Ministry or Parliament can exercise its discretion, and do its duty; none has been able to do it for years. It signifies not what changes of men there may be in either; there must be no change of principles and measures, because the supreme, despotic, irresponsible Ministry and Parliament are not changed. Let it ever be remembered, that the tyranny which makes puppets of them both, also makes puppets of the newspapers; it consists of the gin and other shops, and the motley anti-English and foreign multitude of the metropolis. These really form the source of that irresistible public opinion, of which the press is falsely called the parent; and they are the primary rulers of the British empire.

One of the many destructive consequences which flow from the present state of things, is this: The Ministry and Opposition are too happy if they can prevail on the press to puff them personally, and their measures, without suffering them to interfere with it farther; if it concede so much to them, it still must take general opinion from the multitude. It follows, that the worst doctrines are, in the public eye, circulated under their authority; the ministerial papers are also the revolutionary ones. If the prints of the Wellington Ministry attack the corn law, revile the aristocracy, and slander the throne; or if those of the Grey Ministry teach the absurdities of the economists, rail against the church, defame the magistracy, and feed the frenzy of the poor against the rich: it must have the worst effects on the general feelings of the country, and not only disable the Ministry for exercising its functions, but create the means of its certain destruction. The Wellington Ministry was, in a large degree, ruined by its newspapers; and if the Grey one do not take care, it will meet the same fate.

When all admit the stupendous power of the newspapers, and deplore the manner in which it is exercised,—when the weathercock guilt of some of them is a by-word with every party, it is astonishing that the establishing and governing of them is left solely to men,* who do it on principles of private trade, and who cannot afford to do it on any other. The morning ones rule London; and the commencing of one on the anti-popular side, would dissipate a large fortune before it could gain a living circulation; therefore, in private individuals, it is out of the question. If the newspapers possess the power ascribed to them, nothing could be more clear than that the rulers and upper classes of the empire ought to endeavour to employ a due portion of it on the right side of things. It is obviously as essential for the opinion and reasoning of the Executive and higher ranks, to have full circulation, as it is for those of the multitude to have it; consequently, our conviction is, that in every free state, which must depend for freedom and prosperity on the due publicity and collision of opinion and reasoning, it is essential for the Executive to have its own avowed newspapers.†

If, however, nothing be done, it is demonstrable that the great sources and guides of public opinion must be restricted to the most fatal error and impurity. The press must be the slave of the multitude; and the Executive, Legislature, and Aristocracy, must be the slaves of the press.

Let us now speak of the local government of the metropolis.

It most fortunately happened, that in former times, the metropolis was divided into three great divisions, and these were subdivided into parishes, &c. Had not this been done, we are pretty sure, that at this moment it would have been regarded as one vast undivided whole, and governed, as immense undivided masses

* The public language of newspapers forms a most amusing contrast to the private language of their proprietors. The former, of course, is all public spirit, independence, and patriotism; the latter is, of necessity, all private profit and subervieny. We must take up the cause of these interests, because it will gain us their patronage. These principles will not do, because we have no sale. We must oppose this question, and support that, or be ruined. These are clever articles, and quite true; but we dare not publish them, because it would injure our circulation. In mere trading proprietors, this is perhaps venial; in the nature of things the case must be so, for private individuals cannot be expected to ruin themselves for public good; but, however, let us hear no more of newspaper disinterestedness and independence.

† If any morning paper, for instance the Morning Chronicle, were known to be in general principles, and, to a certain extent, in composition, the organ of the Ministry; and if the Morning Post, or any other, were known to be in the same respects the organ of the Opposition; this alone would give these papers very great circulation and weight in the metropolis, even amidst the lower orders.

Castig from us the wild and destructive generalities of the age, which are as fashionable here as in all other matters, we will look at details. In proportion as the inhabitants of the metropolis are virtuous and well affected, laws, police, and restraints on the rights and liberties of the subject must be unnecessary: to prevent crime, disaffection, and tumult, vice and immorality must be prevented. Of course, it ought to be a leading object of local government to root up the things which corrupt innocence, and supply guilt with means.

Here the metropolis exhibits the most extraordinary deficiencies. It is notorious, that all parts of it abound with houses which are kept solely for the accommodation of women of the town, and the men they pick up; and also for that of men and the young females, wives, &c., they seduce. It is a modern refinement, that servant girls and wives have now the means at hand for regularly making their secret visits to a brothel. The lower, and, of course, the chief part of these houses, are known by all to be dens of robbery, and almost every kind of crime. Their real character admits of no doubt—every respectable inhabitant of the streets in which they are situated would gladly give evidence against them: they could in every case be easily proved to be what they are, by infinitely more conclusive legal testimony than is often required for taking away life; yet they are rarely molested. Independently of the guilt they generate, these houses cause serious annoyance to the respectable part of their neighbours, and are highly injurious to the property, which surrounds them.

The defective state of the law is perhaps a great cause why they flourish with impunity. Their character is in general too notorious to admit of mistake; suppose, therefore, that the magistrate had summary power to convict each, without other evidence than the depositions of a certain number of respectable housekeepers declaring it, to the best of their knowledge and belief, to be what we have described. In regard to punishment, it ought to be the great object to reach the owner; therefore, suppose a fine were levied on the house, amounting to a year's rent, and also sufficient sureties were required that for some years to come it should be let to none but people of character;—some such plan would be effectual for putting down the worst of these houses, without invading in the least the rights of property. When we daily see men convicted in courts of justice of high crimes on slender and disputed circumstantial evidence, it is too much to tell us that the guilt of houses, which is ten thousand times more baleful to society than that of any robber, and which is known to all, cannot be reached by law.

Then there are many low public and other houses which are places of resort for thieves and gamblers. The character of these is notorious amidst their neighbours, and they could easily be put down in the same manner.

In the next place, there are the low lodging houses for beggars and the destitute. These are really public places, and none call more for proper surveillance than they do. Competent parish, or magisterial authorities, ought very frequently to inspect them throughout, rigorously examine their lodgers, and insist on due cleanliness, separation of sexes, &c. By this means many bad characters might be banished, and distressed ones assisted.

There are various streets, the inhabitants of which are of the most barbarous and riotous description. Husbands, wives, and neighbours, continually brawl and fight; and frequently a whole street engages in conflict. The men drink most of their wages, the women drink likewise all they can procure; and the children, half-naked, beg and steal, and are reared in all kinds of iniquity. These streets are well-known to all. Let a sufficiency of peace officers be constantly stationed in them, not only to preserve order, but to ascertain the character, and employment, and wages, of every inhabitant. We will never admit, that the law ought to suffer a father to starve, and make criminals of his children, by his own drunkenness; therefore, let the children be well looked after; if they, as is now the case, ragged and barefooted, spend their time in running about town, let the parish officers be authorized to give them proper clothing and put them to school, and then to receive of their father's employer a part of his weekly wages in payment, taking care that the sum be no more than a fair proportion of his earnings. This would benefit the parents as much as the children.

We would confine this to the streets in question, and subject them in every point to the most rigorous government, in respect of both owners of the houses and occupiers. We would punish disorders and tumults with unsparring severity; and, to a large extent, make the owner responsible for the conduct of his tenants. The fact is, when these barbarians enter a street, they drive all other people out of it; the peaceable and well-disposed have no recourse but flight; they thus congregate to stimulate each other in profligacy, with nothing to instruct and restrain them save coercion. If they were compelled by such government to disperse, and seek lodgings singly in better streets, they would then be under the example and restraint of orderly neighbours and housekeepers. Every thing ought to be done to promote their dispersion, even for their own benefit.

These are the streets which supply the worst of the mobs—provide the mobs with blackguards and ruffians, and fill the metropolis with boys and girls, young men and women, of the most infamous character.

Sunday labour ought, to the farthest point, to be vigilantly prevented by law. We have already recommended that liquor-shops should not be opened before one o'clock on the Sunday, and that they should not be suffered to sell any thing on the same day to be consumed in them, save in special cases.

Our general objects in all this are—1. The suppression of the houses which form the schools and bulwarks of vice and crime. 2. The severe, incessant watching of the barbarous, demoralized houses and streets, for the purpose of improving the character of, and duly dispersing, their inhabitants. And, 3. The prohibition of drinking and working on the Sabbath, as a great means, amidst other things, of promoting religion, morals, and order. What is the existing system? An unconstitutional, despotic police, which endangers public freedom, and invades the rights and liberties of the subject, overruns the metropolis; and yet the great sources of guilt, barbarism, and tumult, are not reached by it. While it spares, it is to a large degree in league with, and protects, much more than injures, them,—it places the moral and peaceable under detestable espionage, insult, and oppression.

In recommending proper laws, let us say a word touching enforcing them. The clergyman is the especial guardian of religion and morals in his parish; and he is the most fitting man to keep it free from brothels, gaming-houses, and profanation of the Sabbath. If the duty were specially imposed on him by law—it is already imposed on him by a much higher authority—of watching it carefully on these matters; and if, on his information, the magistrate were required to collect evidence, and put the law in operation, this would be highly effectual. The London clergy are in general excellent men, and yet we never hear of them taking a single step against the sinks of debauchery and licentiousness which flourish in their parishes. This cannot at any rate flow from conscience.

The religious people of the metropolis—Churchmen and Dissenters—are extremely active and liberal. Let them form themselves into a society, subdivided into branch parochial ones, for putting down the receptacles of iniquity, and preserving the Sabbath from violation. Let their appeals to law be cautious and sparing; and their great means be, friendly expostulation and assistance. Let them go from house to house amidst the lower orders, to reclaim the drunkard, reform the Sunday-labourer, and civilize the barbarous family. Let them freely give charitable aid when necessary, and strain every nerve, both by providing seats, and all other means, to induce the lower classes to attend divine worship. We tell them, the aspect of the times demands that they should provide, not only schools for children, but churches and chapels for adults—not only distribute Bibles, but cause them to be read—think less of the ignorant heathen abroad, and more of the debauched heathen at home—labour less to convert foreigners, and more to civilize their own countrymen.

There is a matter which we would strongly press on the attention of the exalted and opulent part of our lovely countrywomen. Very many servant girls are annually driven to prostitution in the metropolis by want. They lose their places, perhaps, from no fault of their own—they are often refused characters, when those who ought to give them are more blameable than themselves—they have no friends—they go into lodgings, pawn their clothes, get into debt, and are then forced on the town. We speak of that which is not rare, but which occurs continually. It is useless to say they have parishes, because they will not, and often cannot, go to them. If the ladies, to whom we speak, would form an establishment for providing female servants out of place with board, lodging, and needlework, on their producing reasonable evidence of their virtue and honesty, we are sure it would be highly beneficial to society. It would be the more beneficial, if open to all young females of such character in want of employment.

To a large extent, marriage is now dispensed with among the lower orders of the metropolis. The mechanic must have his mistress as well as the gentleman; and great numbers live together as man and wife without being married. We mention the evil, and leave it to others to provide a remedy.

With regard to the attendance of these orders at divine service, much might be done by the following means:—1. Masters might stipulate for it with their workmen; a man thinks it necessary to send his domestic servants regularly to Church, although their general conduct is always under his eye; but he makes no effort whatever to send his workmen and their families thither, although a large part of their conduct is free from his inspection. This gross inconsistency ought to be abandoned.

2. Benevolent assistance to individuals and families, might be given on the express condition, that those receiving it, should regularly attend some place of worship.

3. Regular attendance at divine service, might most properly be required of all persons receiving parish relief. This would be highly instrumental in making such attendance habitual among the lower orders.

If ladies of rank and opulence were to form themselves into societies, for the purpose of distributing twice, or only once, in the year, articles of clothing to the wives and children of the more needy labourers, it would be highly beneficial. They might restrict their bounty to women of good morals, and regular attendants at a place of worship. Such ladies are extremely charitable, but they do not use their gifts as a means of promoting morals. To a large extent, the wives of the labouring classes in the metropolis are about as partial to liquor, and as irreligious, as their husbands. When this is looked at, with reference to the charge which rests on them in regard to their children, every one will admit that it calls loudly for remedy. Who is so fitting to administer such remedy as the more exalted part of their own sex?

In all this, do not look at the metropolis as a huge undivided whole. If the magistrates of Westminster be in many respects grossly inefficient, why not give it a corporation, on a proper model, for the purpose of supplying it with competent ones? It need be, why not do the same in Southwark? After giving to each grand division a local government, strong in both physical and moral power, give one to each parish; and where the parishes are too large, divide them into districts, and give one to each of the latter.

Nothing is of greater importance to society than good parish government, and few things are more neglected. Select vestries have been in many matters beneficial, but they have become such a source of division and contention, that they perhaps now produce more evil than good. A few active executory officers, invested with proper powers, seem preferable to a parochial parliament. The great deficiency of parish government at present is, it pays scarcely any attention to morals. If each church had a certain number of surrounding streets assigned it as a district, and it were made the duty of the clergyman, and a few individuals appointed to act with him, to keep the district free from low brothels, &c.—enforce proper conduct in places of public resort—watch the morals of the barbarous streets—repress drunkenness and Sunday labour—cause the lower orders to attend divine worship, &c. &c., this would yield the greatest advantages. The latter would be largely increased, if the wealthy inhabitants of the district would combine for the purposes we have described. By thus breaking the population into small parts, it might, as a whole, be kept in the best state of moral and political feeling, and also in the best circumstances.

This would be highly serviceable in procuring the requisite knowledge of applicants for parish relief, although the large parishes should not be thus divided in respect of the Poor-rates: it would give to every parish full knowledge of the character and circumstances of its poorer inhabitants individually, and thereby prevent much imposition and abuse. Our conviction is, that it would diminish the Poor-rates materially.

In thus giving to the clergyman powers and duties in all things relating to religion and morals, it would be better to separate him from other parts of parish government.

What we have said touching the metropolis, is equally applicable to all large places. Great manufacturing and trading towns have sprung up in all directions since the founding of corporations ceased; and they have nothing worthy of being called local government. On the one hand, there are vast combined masses of the working classes in a great measure independent of their employers; and, on the other, a high constable or bailiff, a few magistrates, perhaps hired ones, and a police, destitute of moral weight, and ruling only by coercion; religion and morals are disregarded—the mass of the poor cannot enter a church—private charity is little attended to—revolutionary newspapers are about the only sources of political instruction—Sunday labour is made almost necessary by hunger—the lower orders are separated and estranged from the better ones—and peace, saying nothing of order, is only maintained by brute force. This is a local tyranny; its fruits are vice, demoralization, turbulence, barbarism, dissipation, and every thing that can produce a general tyranny.

With regard to country places, we will only say a word. In the North of England the unmarried servants board and lodge, and the married ones board, in the house of the farmer. This is invaluable, in the first place, for giving them instruction; in the second, for placing their moral and general conduct under proper control; and, in the third, for uniting them with their betters. What flows from it? A virtuous, peaceable, well-affected, and, to a very large extent, religious peasantry. In the South of England, the servants, single and married, do not board and lodge with the farmer; they never enter his house to gain knowledge, and they are, saving what relates to their labour, independent of him in conduct. What is the fruit? A vicious, barbarous, disloyal, and criminal peasantry. We need not dwell on the lesson this supplies; but we will say, it proves abundantly, that if there be not moral, there must be tyrannical, government.

The country is now called on to decide between popular government and the contrary—between self-government, and a virtually independent Executive—between the government of opinion, feeling, habit, and influence, and that of flinty law and hired mercenaries. Let it be assured, that if it select the new system, the local tyranny will very speedily create a general despotism. The trusting of every thing to restrictive law and police, must, in the nature of things, separate the lower classes still more from their superiors, and sink them deeper in irreligion and barbarism. Bad as the present generation of them has become, it was reared in better times, and it received instruction and feelings which it cannot wholly get rid of; but what is to be expected from the next? The question, what kind of men and women will the children of these classes be? ought to make every friend of the empire tremble.

Let us, then, like our fathers, live without this disguised martial law, these spies, informers, and sub-tyrants. Like them, let us be ruled by morals and feelings, by the virtues of all classes, and by keeping the poor in friendly communication and union with their superiors.

But where is the ground for hope? Previously to late years, when the government was really a popular one, a new law was at once repealed, if it were injurious or distasteful to public feeling; in proof, we may point to a new marriage law, and to many others. But the laws fabricated in these days, are declared to be, like those of the Medes and Persians, unalterable. A new system or statute operates destructively, and is condemned by the mass of the population; but no matter, Parliament has adopted it, therefore it must be preserved. The main defence of all pernicious legislation now is, Parliament voted certain resolutions in one year, and sanctioned certain principles in another; the public interests and feelings must be disregarded. Public men and Parliaments are now in their own eyes infallible; and one of them must not, if even the salvation of the empire depends on it, undo what another has done. This is one of the most despotic and detested violations of the spirit of the constitution which modern times have seen; and it is absurd to say, that where it prevails, there is popular government. Of course, the establishment of the New Police will, we imagine, be pronounced a sufficient reason for retaining it.

Yet, if the Whig doctrines touching a standing army—the employment of the military—public opinion—popular rights, privileges, and government—and the power of the Crown, be not wholly false;—if the Whigs have not abandoned the essence of Whiggism for the reverse; the Whig Ministry is bound to suppress the New Police and stipendiary magistrates, and to restore to England her popular government.

But who can trust a Whig Ministry?

It is not from hostility to the present Cabinet, that we put the question. We, at least, think it the best ~~and~~ the bad, and more trustworthy than any other party. Far be from us the folly of believing that public distress flows from a deficiency of the precious metals, when the country has for years had an unexampled excess of them; and far be from us the greater folly of believing that the corn law is an evil, and that the taxes form the only obstacle to a free trade in corn; and far be from us the worse than folly of leaping, in the course of a few months, from one set of opinions to another. Judging from the debate on Lord Wynford's motion for enquiry, the present Ministry is now the only party of character willing to save what is left of property and subsistence.

We say, who can trust a Whig Ministry? because the past affords no ground for trust—because the Whigs have a bad character to get rid of, and a good one to establish. We tell the new Ministers that they are not trusted; and yet, that all men are anxious to trust them, provided they will prove by their conduct that they deserve it. In this anxiety we share, and grieved shall we be, if they give us cause to oppose them. But to gain that confidence which the community at large wishes to bestow on them, they must look at something more than abstract doctrine. Instead of floundering about in vague generalities touching the precious metals, bank-notes, and machinery, they must go to work like men of business; they must ask the farmer separately what he finds in his market to prevent his getting proper prices, not only for his corn, but also for his cattle, wool, tallow, and other produce; in like manner, they must ask of every producer separately, what he finds in his market to cripple his trade, and grind down his prices. By this they will soon discover causes and remedies.

As friends, we tell these Ministers further, that names are now nothing—that it will do no longer to plead principles and systems, the work of predecessors, and their own past sanction—and that they must remove loss and suffering, or lose office to themselves, and the monarchy to the country. The times are perilous infinitely beyond what the Legislature seems to dream of; and, alas for all! if remedy be again refused until extorted by insurrection.

PASSAGES FROM THE DIARY OF A LATE PHYSICIAN.

CHAP. VI.

The Turned Head—The Wife.

THE TURNED HEAD.

HYPOCHONDRIASIS,* Janus-like, has two faces—a melancholy and a laughable one. The former, though oftener seen in actual life, does not present itself so frequently to the notice of the medical practitioner as the latter; though, in point of fact, one as imperatively calls for his interference as the other. It may be safely asserted, that a permanently morbid mood of mind invariably indicates a disordered state of some part or other of the physical system; and which of the two forms of hypochondria will manifest itself in a particular case, depends altogether upon the mental idiosyncrasy of the patient. Those of a dull, phlegmatic temperament, unstirred by intermixture and collision with the bustling activities of life, addicted to sombrous trains of reflection, and, by a kind of sympathy, always looking on the gloomy side of things, generally sink, at some period or other of their lives, into the "slough of despond"—as old Bunyan significantly terms it—from whence they are seldom altogether extricated. Religious enthusiasts constitute by far the largest portion of those afflicted with this species of hypochondria—instance the wretched Cowper; and such I have never known entirely disabused of these dreadful fantasies. Those, again, of a gay and lively fancy, ardent temperament, and droll, grotesque appetencies, exhibit the laughable aspect of hypochondriasis. In such, you may expect conceits of the most astounding absurdity that could possibly take possession of the topsyturried intellects of a confirmed lunatic; and persisted in with a pertinacity—a dogged defiance of evidence to the contrary—which is itself as exquisitely ludicrous, as distressing and provoking. There is generally preserved an amazing consistency in the delusion, in spite of the incipient rebuttals of sensation. In short, when once a crotchet, of such a sort as that hereafter mentioned, is fairly entertained in the fancy, the patient will not let it go! It is cases of this kind which baffle the adrotest medical tactician. For my own part, I have had to deal with several during the course of my practice, which, if described coolly and faithfully on paper, would appear preposterously incredible to a non-professional reader. Such may possibly be the fate of the following. I have given it with a minuteness of detail, in several parts, which I think is warranted, by the interesting nature of the case, by the rarity of such narratives,—and, above all, by the peculiar character and talents of the well-known individual who is the patient; and I am convinced that no one would laugh more heartily over it than he himself—had he not long lain quiet in his grave!

You could scarcely look on N— without laughing. There was a sorry sort of humorous expression in his odd and ugly features, which suggested to you the idea that he was always struggling to repel some joyous emotion or other, with painful effort. There was the rich light of intellect in his eye, which was dark and full—you felt when its glance was settled upon you;—and there it remained concentrated, at the expense of all the other features;—in the clumsy osseous ridge of eye-bone impending sullenly over his eyes—the Pitt-like nose, looking like a finger and thumb full of dough drawn out from the plastic mass, with two ill-formed holes inserted in the bulbous extremity—and his large liquorish, shapeless lips—looked altogether anything but refined or intellectual. He was a man of fortune—an obstinate bachelor—and was educated at Cambridge, where he attained considerable dis-

tion; and at the period of his introduction to the reader, was in his thirty-eighth or fortieth year. If I were to mention his name, it would recall to the literary reader many excellent, and some admirable portions of literature, for the perusal of which he has to thank N—. The prevailing complexion of his mind was sombre—but played on, occasionally, by an arch-humorous fancy, flinging its rays of fun and drollery over the dark surface, like moon-beams on midnight waters. I do believe he considered it sinful to smile! There was a puckering up of the corner of the mouth, and a forced corrugation of the eyebrows—the expression of which was set at nought by the conviviality—the solemn drollery of the eyes. You saw Momus leering out of every glance of them! He said many very witty things in conversation, and had a knack of uttering the quaintest conceits with something like a whine of compunction in his tone, which ensured him roars of laughter. As for his own laugh—when he did laugh—there is no describing it—short, sudden, unexpected was it, like a flash of powder in the dark. Not a trace of real merriment lingered on his features an instant after the noise had ceased. You began to doubt whether he had laughed at all, and to look about to see where the explosion came from. Except on such rare occasions of forgetfulness on his part, his demeanour was very calm and quiet. He loved to get a man who would come and sit with him all the evening, smoking, and sipping wine in cloudy silence. He could not endure bustle or obstreperousness; and when he did unfortunately fall foul of a son of noise, as soon as he had had “a sample of his quality,” he would abruptly rise and take his leave, saying, in a querulous tone, like that of a sick child, “I’ll go!” [probably these two words will at once recall him to the memory of more than one of my readers]—and he was as good as his word; for all his acquaintances—and I among the number—knew his eccentricities, and excused them.

Such was the man—at least as to the more prominent points of his character—whose chattering black servant, presented himself hastily to me one morning, as I was standing on my door-steps, pondering the probabilities of wet or fine for the day. He spoke in such a spluttering tone of trepidation, that it was some time before I could conjecture what was the matter. At length I distinguished something like the words, “Oh, Docta, Docta, com-a, and see-a a Massa! Com-a! Him so gashly—him so ill—ver dam bad—him say so—Oh lorra-lorra-lorra! Com see-a a Massa—him ver orrid!”

“Why, what on earth is the matter with you, you sable, eh?—Why can’t you speak slower, and tell me plainly what’s the matter?” said I, impatiently, for he seemed inclined to gabble on in that strain for some minutes longer. “What’s the matter with your master, sirrah, eh?” I enquired, jerking his striped morning jacket.

“Oh, Docta! Docta! Com-a—Massa d—n bad! Him say so!—Him head turned! Him head turned!”

“Him what, sirrah?” said I, in amazement.

“Him head turned, Docta—him head turned,” replied the man, slipping his fingers against his forehead.

“Oh, I see how it is, I see; ah, yes,” I replied, pointing to my forehead in turn, wishing him to see that I understood him to say his master had been seized with a fit of insanity.

“Iss, iss, Docta—him Massa head turned—him head turned!—d—n bad!”

“Where is Mr N—, Nambo, eh?”

“Him lying all ’long in him bed, Massa—him d—n bad. But him ’tickler quiet—him head turned!”

“Why, Nambo, what makes you say your master’s head’s turned, eh? What d’ye mean?”

“Him, Massa, self say so—him did—him head turned—d—n.” I felt as much at a loss as ever; it was so odd for a gentleman to acknowledge to his negro-servant that his head was turned.

“Ah, he’s gone mad, you mean, eh—is that it? Hem! Mad—is it so?” said I, pointing, with a wink, to my forehead. “No, no, doctor—him head turned!—him head,” replied Nambo; and raising both his hands to his head, he seemed trying to twist it round! I could make nothing of his gesticulations, so I dismissed him, telling him to take word, that I should make his master's my first call. I may as well say, that I was on terms of friendly familiarity with Mr N——, and puzzled myself all the way I went, with attempting to conjecture what new crotchet he had taken into his odd—and, latterly, I began to suspect, half-added—head. He had never disclosed symptoms of what is generally understood by the word hypochondriasis; but I often thought there was not a likelier subject in the world for it. At length I found myself knocking at my friend's door, fully prepared for some specimen of amusing eccentricity—for the thought now crossed my mind, that he might be really ill. Nambo instantly answered my summons, and, in a twinkling, conducted me to his master's bed-room. It was partially darkened, but there was light enough for me to discern, that there was nothing unusual in his appearance. The bed was much tossed, to be sure, as if with the restlessness of the recumbent, who lay on his back, with his head turned on one side, and buried deep in the pillow, and his arms folded together outside the counterpane. His features certainly wore an air of exhaustion and dejection, and his eye settled on me with an alarmed expression from the moment that he perceived my entrance.

"Oh, dear doctor!—Isn't this frightful!—Isn't it a dreadful piece of business?"

"Frightful!—dreadful business!" I repeated, with much surprise. "What is frightful? Are you ill—have you had an accident, eh?"

"Ah—ah!—you may well ask that!" he replied; adding, after a pause, "it took place this morning about two hours ago!"

"You speak in parables, Mr N——! Why, what in the world is the matter with you?"

"About two hours ago—yes," he muttered, as if he had not heard me. "Doctor, do tell me truly now, for the curiosity of the thing, what did you think of me on first entering the room?—Eh?—Feel inclined to laugh, or be shocked—which?"

"Mr N——, I really have no time for trifling, as I am particularly busy to-day. So, I beg, be a little more explicit! Why have you sent for me?—What is the matter with you?"

"Why, God bless me, doctor!" he replied, with an air of angry surprise in his manner which I never saw before, "I think, indeed, it's you who are trifling! Have you lost your eye-sight this morning? Do you pretend to say you do not see I have undergone one of the most extraordinary alterations in appearance, that the body of man is capable of—such as never was heard or read of before?"

"Once more, Mr N——," I repeated, in a tone of calm astonishment, "be so good as to be explicit. What are you raving about?"

"Raving!—Egad, I think it's you who are raving, doctor!" he answered; "or you must wish to insult me! Do you pretend to tell me you do not see that my head is turned?"—and he looked me in the face steadily and sternly.

"Ha—ha—ha!—Upon my honour, N——, I've been suspecting as much for this last five or ten minutes! I don't think a patient ever described his disease more accurately before!"

"Don't mock me, Doctor ——," replied N——, sternly. "By G——, I can't bear it! It's enough for me to endure the horrid sensations I do!"

"Mr N——, what do you" ——

"Why, d——n, Doctor ——! you'll drive me mad!—Can't you see that the back of my head is in front, and my face looking backwards? Horrible!" I burst into loud laughter.

"Doctor ——, it's time for you and me to part—high time," said he, turning his face away from me. "I'll let you know that I'll stand your nonsense no longer! I called you in to give me your advice, not to sit grinning like a baboon by my bedside! Once more,—finally: Doctor ——, are you disposed to be serious and rational? If you are not, my man shall shew you to the door the moment you please." He said this in such a sober earnest tone of indignation, that I saw he was fully prepared to carry his threat into execution. I determined, therefore, to humour him a little, shrewdly suspecting some temporary suspension of his sanity—not exactly madness—but at least some extraordinary hallucination. To adopt an expression which I have several times heard him use—"I saw what o'clock it was, and set my watch to the time."

"Oh—well!—I see now how matters stand!—The fact is, I did observe the extraordinary posture of affairs you complain of—immediately I entered the room—but supposed you were joking with me, and twisting your head round in that odd way for the purpose of hoaxing me; so I resolved to wait and see which of us could play our parts in the farce longest!—Why, good God! how's all this, Mr N—?—Is it then really the case?—Are you—in—in earnest—in having your head turned?"—"In earnest, doctor!" replied Mr N—, in amazement. "Why, do you suppose this happened by my own will and agency?—Absurd!"—"Oh, no, no—most assuredly not—it is a phenomenon—hem! hem!—a phenomenon—not unfrequently attending on the nightmare," I answered, with as good a grace as possible.

"Pho, pho, doctor!—Nonsense!—You must really think me a child, to try to mislead me with such stuff as that! I tell you again, I am in as sober possession of my senses as ever I was in my life; and, once more, I assure you, that, in truth and reality, my head is turned—literally so."

"Well, well!—So I see!—It is, indeed, a very extraordinary case—a very unusual one; but I don't, by any means, despair of bringing all things round again!—Pray tell me how this singular and afflicting accident happened to you?"

"Certainly," said he, despondingly. "Last night, or rather this morning, I dreamed that I had got to the West Indies—to Barbadoes, an island where I have, as you know, a little estate left me by my uncle, C—; and that, a few moments after I had entered the plantation, for the purpose of seeing the slaves at work, there came a sudden hurricane, a more tremendous one than ever was known in those parts;—trees—canes—huts—all were swept before it! Even the very ground on which we stood seemed whirled away beneath us! I turned my head a moment to look at the direction in which things were going, when, in the very act of turning, the blast suddenly caught my head, and—oh, my God!—blew it completely round on my shoulders, till my face looked quite—directly behind me—over my back! In vain did I almost wrench my head off my shoulders, in attempting to twist it round again; and what with horror, and—and—altogether—in short, I awoke—and found the frightful reality of my situation!—Oh, gracious Heaven!" continued Mr N—, clasping his hands, and looking upwards, "what have I done to deserve such a horrible visitation as this?"

Humph! it is quite clear what is the matter here, thought I; so assuming an air of becoming professional gravity, I felt his pulse, begged him to let me see his tongue, made many enquiries about his general health, and then proceeded to subject all parts of his neck to a most rigorous examination; before, behind, on each side, over every natural elevation and depression, if such the usual varieties of surface may be termed, did my fingers pass; he, all the while sighing, and cursing his evil stars, and wondering how it was that he had not been killed by the "dislocation!" This little farce over, I continued silent for some moments, scarcely able, the while, to control my inclination to burst into fits of laughter, as if pondering the possibility of being able to devise some means of cure.

"Ah,—thank God!—I have it—I have it!"

"What!—what—eh?—what is it?"

"I've thought of a remedy, which, if—if—if any thing in the world can bring it about, will set matters right again—will bring back your head to its former position."

"Oh, God be praised!—Dear—dear doctor!—if you do but succeed, I shall consider a thousand pounds but the earnest of what I will do to evince my gratitude!" he exclaimed, squeezing my hand fervently. "But I am not absolutely certain that we shall succeed," said I cautiously. "We will, however, give the medicine a twenty-four hours' trial; during all which time you must be in perfect repose, and consent to lie in utter darkness. Will you abide by my directions?"

"Oh, yes—yes—yes!—dear doctor!—What is the inestimable remedy? Tell me—tell me the name of my ransom. I'll never divulge it—never!"

"That is not consistent with my plans at present, Mr N——," I replied, seriously; "but, if successful—of which I own I have very sanguine expectations—I pledge my honour to reveal the secret to you." "Well—but—at least you'll explain the nature of its operation—eh? Is it internal—external—what?" The remedy, I told him, would be of both forms; the latter, however, the more immediate agent of his recovery; the former, preparatory—predisposing. I may tell the reader simply what my physic was to be: three bread-pills (the ordinary placebo in such cases) every hour; a strong laudanum draught in the evening; and a huge bread-and-water poultice for his neck, with which it was to be environed till the parts were sufficiently mollified to admit of the neck's being twisted back again into its former position; and, when that was the case—why—to ensure its permanency, he was to wear a broad band of strengthening plaster for a week!! This was the bright device, struck out by me—all at a heat; and, explained to the poor victim with the utmost solemnity and deliberation of manner—all the wise winks and knowing nods, and hesitating "hems" and "has" of professional usage—sufficed to inspire him with some confidence as to the results. I confess I shared the most confident expectations of success. A sound night's rest—hourly pill-taking—and the clammy saturating sensation round about his neck, I fully believed would bring him round:—and, in the full anticipation of seeing him disabused of the ridiculous notion he had taken into his head, I promised to see him the first thing in the morning, and took my departure. After quitting the house, I could not help laughing immoderately at the recollection of the scene I had just witnessed; and Mrs M——, who happened to be passing on the other side of the street, and observed my involuntary risibility, took occasion to spread an ill-natured rumour, that I was in the habit of "making myself merry at the expense of my patients!"—I foresaw, that should this "crick in the neck" prove permanent, I stood a chance of listening to innumerable conceits of the most whimsical and paradoxical kind imaginable—for I knew N——'s natural turn to humour. It was inconceivable to me how such an extraordinary delusion could bear the blush of daylight, resist the evidence of his senses, and the unanimous simultaneous assurances of all who beheld him. Though it is little credit to me, and tells but small things for my self-control—I cannot help acknowledging, that at the bedside of my next patient, who was within two or three hours of her end, the surpassing absurdity of the "turned head" notions glared in such ludicrous extremes before me, that I was nearly bursting a blood-vessel with endeavours to suppress a perfect peal of laughter!

About eleven o'clock the next morning, I paid N—— a second visit. The door was opened as usual by his black servant, Nambo; by whose demeanour I saw that something or other extraordinary awaited me. His sable swollen features, and dancing white eye-balls, shewed that he was nearly bursting with laughter. "He—he—he!" he chuckled, in a sort of sotto voce, "him massa head turned!—him back in front! him waddle!—he—he—he!"—and he twitched his clothes—jerking his jacket, and pointing to his breeches, in a way that I did not understand. On entering the room where N——, with one of his favourite silent smoking friends, (M——, the late well-known counsel,) were sitting at breakfast, I encountered a spectacle which nearly made me expire with laughter. It is almost useless to attempt describing it on paper—yet I will try. Two gentlemen sat opposite each other at the breakfast table, by the fire: the one with his face to me was Mr M——; and N—— sat with his back towards the door by which I entered. A glance at the former sufficed to shew me, that he was sitting in tortures of suppressed risibility. He was quite red in the face—his features were swelled and puffy—and his eyes fixed strainingly on the fire, as though in fear of encountering the ludicrous figure of his friend. They were averted from the fire, for a moment, to welcome my entrance—and then re-directed thither with such a painful effort—such a comical air of compulsory seriousness—as, added to the preposterous fashion after which poor N—— had chosen to dress himself—completely over-cause me. The thing was irresistible; and my utterance of that peculiar choking sound, which indicates the most strenuous efforts to suppress one's risible emotions, was the unwitting signal for each of us bursting into a long and loud shout of laughter. It was in vain that I bit my under lip almost till it brought blood, and that my eyes strained till the sparks flashed from them, in the vain attempt to cease laughing; in full before me sat the exciting cause of it, in the shape of N——, his head supported by the palm of his left hand, with his elbow propped against the side of the arm-chair. The knot of his neck-kerchief was tied, with its customary formal precision, back at the nape of his neck; his coat and waistcoat were buttoned down his back;—and his trousers, moreover, to match the novel fashion, buttoned behind, and, of course, the hinder parts of them bulged out ridiculously in front!—Only to look at the coat-collar fitting under the chin, like a stiff military stock—the four tail buttons of brass glistening conspicuously before, and the front parts of the coat buttoned carefully over his back—the compulsory handiwork of poor Nambo!

N——, perfectly astounded at our successive shouts of laughter—for we found it impossible to stop—suddenly rose up in his chair, and, almost inarticulate with fury, demanded what we meant by such extraordinary behaviour. This fury, however, was all lost on me; I could only point, in an ecstasy of laughter, almost bordering on frenzy, to his novel mode of dress—as my apology. He stamped his foot, uttered volleys of imprecations against us, and then ringing his bell, ordered the servant to shew us both to the door. The most violent emotions, however, must in time expend their violence, though in the presence of the same exciting cause; and so it was with Mr M—— and myself. On seeing how suddenly affronted N—— was, we sat out down, and I entered into conversation, my whole frame aching with the prolonged convulsive fits of irrepressible laughter.

sations in which I ever bore part. N——'s temper was thoroughly soured for some time. He declared that my physic was all a humbug, and a piece of quackery; and the “d-d peddling round his neck,” the absurdest farce he ever heard of; he had a great mind to make Nambo eat it, for the pains he had taken in making it, and fastening it on—poor fellow!

Presently he lapsed into a melancholy reflective mood. He protested that the laws of locomotion were utterly inexplicable to him—a practical paradox; that his volitions as to progressive and retrogressive motion neutralized each other; and the necessary result was, a cursed circungyratory motion—for all the world like that of a hen that had lost one of its wings! That henceforward he should be compelled to crawl, crab-like, through life, all ways at once, and none in particular. He could not conceive, he said, which was the nearest way from one given point to another; in short, that all his sensations and perceptions were disordered and confounded. His situation, he said, was an admirable commentary on the words of St Paul—“But I see another law in my members warring against the law of my mind.” He could not conceive how the arteries and veins of the neck could carry and return the blood, after being so shockingly twisted—or “how the wind-pipe went in,” affording a free course to the air through its distorted passage. In short, he said, he was a walking lie! Curious to ascertain the consistency of this anomalous state of feeling, I endeavoured once more to bring his delusion to the test of simple sensation, by placing one hand on his nose, and the other on his breast, and asking him which was which, and whether both did not lie in the same direction; he wished to know why I persisted in making myself merry at his expense. I repeated the question, still keeping my hands in the same position; but he suddenly pushed them off, and asked me, with indignation, if I was not ashamed to keep his head looking over his shoulder in that way—accompanying the words with a shake of the head, and a sigh of exhaustion, as if it had really been twisted round into the wrong direction. "Ah!" he exclaimed, after a pause, "if this unnatural state of affairs should prove permanent—hem!—I'll put an end to the chapter! He—he—he! He—he—he!" he continued, bursting suddenly into one of those short abrupt laughs, which I have before attempted to describe. "He—he—he! how d—d odd!" We both asked him, in surprise, what he meant, for his eyes were fixed on the fire in apparently a melancholy mood.

"He—he—he! exquisitely odd, by G—! He—he—he!" After repeated inquiries, he disclosed the occasion of his unusual exclamations.

"I've just been thinking," said he, "suppose—He, he, he!—suppose it was to come to pass that I should be hanged—he, he, he! God forbid, by the way; but, suppose I should, how old Ketch would be puzzled!—my face looking one way, and my tied hands and arms pointing another! How the crowd would stare! He, he, he! And suppose," pursuing the train of thought, "I were to be publicly whipped—how I could superintend operations! And how the devil am I to ride on horseback, eh? with my face to the tail, or — to the mane? In short, what is to become of me? I am, in effect, shut out from society!"

"You have only to walk circumspectly," said M——; "and as for back-biters—hem."

"That's odd—very—but impertinent," replied the hypochondriac, with a mingled expression of chagrin and humour.

"Come, come, N——, don't look so steadily on the dark side of things," said I.

"The dark side of things?" he enquired—"I think it is the back-side of things I am compelled to look at!"

"Look forward to better days," said I.

"Look forward, again! What nonsense!" he replied, interrupting me; "impossible! How can I look forward? My life will henceforth be spent in wretched retrospectives!" and he could not help smiling at the conceit. Having occasion during the conversation to use his pocket-handkerchief, he suddenly reached his hand behind as usual, and was a little confused to find that the usual position of his coat-pocket required that he should take it from before! This I should have conceived enough to put an end to his delusion, but I was mistaken.

"Ah! it will take some time to reconcile me to this new order of things—but practice—practice, you know?" It was amazing to me, that his sensations, so contradictory to the absurd crotchet he had taken into his head, did not convince him of his error, especially when so frequently compelled to act in obedience to long accustomed impulses. As, for instance, on my rising to go, he suddenly started from his chair, shook my hands, and accompanied me to the door, as if nothing had been the matter.

"Well now! What do you think of that?" said I, triumphantly.

"Ah—ah!" said he, after a puzzled pause, "but you little know the effort it cost me!"

* * * * *

He did not persevere long in the absurd way of putting on his clothes which I have just described; but even after he had discontinued it, he alleged his opinion to be, that the front of his clothes ought to be with his face! I might relate many similar fooleries springing from this notion of his turned head, but sufficient has been said already to give the reader a clear idea of the general character of such delusions. My subsequent interviews with him, while under this unprecedented hallucination, were similar to the two which I have attempted to describe. The fit lasted near a month. I happened luckily to recollect a device successfully resorted to by a sagacious old English physician, in the case of a royal hypochondriac abroad, who fancied that his nose had swelled into greater dimensions than those of his whole body beside; and forthwith resolved to adopt a similar method of cure with N——. Electricity was to be the wonder-working talisman! I lectured him out of all opposition, silenced his scruples, and got him to fix an evening for the exorcisation of the evil spirit—as it might well be called—which had taken possession of him. Let the reader fancy, then, N—— sitting-room, about seven o'clock in the evening, illuminated with a cheerful fire, and four mould candles;—the awful electrifying machine duly disposed for action; Mr S—— of —— Hospital, Dr ——, and myself, all standing round it, adjusting the jars, chains, &c.; and Nambo busily engaged in laying bare his master's neck, N—— all the while cyeing our motions with excessive trepidation. I had infinite difficulty in getting his consent to one preliminary—the bandaging of his eyes. I succeeded, however, at last, in persuading him to undergo the operation blindfolded, in assuring him that it was essential to success; for that if he was allowed to see the application of the conductor to the precise spot requisite, he might start, and occasion its apposition to a wrong place! The real reason will be seen presently; the great manœuvre could not have been practised but on such terms; for how could I give his head a sudden twist round at the instant of his receiving the shock, if he saw what I was about? I ought to have mentioned that we also prevailed upon him to sit with his arms pinioned, so that he was completely at our mercy. None of us could refrain from an occasional titter at the absurdity of the solemn farce we were playing—fortunately, however, unheard by N——. At length, Nambo being turned out, and the doors locked, lest, seeing the trick, he might disclose it subsequently to his master, we commenced operations. S—— worked the machine—round, and round, and round, whizzing—sparkling—crackling—till the jar was moderately charged: it was then conveyed to N——'s neck, Dr —— using the conductor. N——, on receiving a tolerably smart shock, started out of his chair, and I had not time to give him the twist I had intended. After a few moments, however, he protested that he felt “something loosened” about his neck, and was easily induced to submit to another shock considerably stronger than the former. The instant the rod was applied to his neck, I gave the head a sudden excruciating wrench towards the left shoulder, S—— striking him, at the same moment, a smart blow on the crown. Poor N——!—“Thank God!” we all exclaimed, as if panting for breath.

“I—!—is it all over?” stammered N—— faintly—quite confounded with the effects of the three-fold remedy we had adopted.

“Yes—thank God, we have at last brought your head round again, and your face looks forward now as heretofore!” said I.

“O, remove the bandage—remove it! Let my own eyesight behold it!—Bring me a glass!”

“As soon as the proper bandages have been applied to your neck, Mr N——.”

“What, eh—a second pudding, eh?”

“No, merely a broad band of dyachlym plaster, to prevent—hem—the contraction of the skin,” said I. As soon as that was done, we removed the handkerchiefs from his eyes and arms.

“Oh, my God, how delightful!” he exclaimed, rising and walking up to the mirror over the mantel-piece. “Ecstasy! All really right again!”

“My dear N——, do not, I beg, do not work your neck about in that way, or the most serious disarrangement of the—the parts,” said I—

“Oh, it's so, is it? Then I'd better get into bed at once, I think, and you'll call in the morning.”

I did, and found him in bed. “Well, how does all go on this morning?” I enquired.

“Pretty well—middling,” he replied, with some embarrassment of manner. “Do you know, Doctor, I've been thinking about it all night long—and I strongly suspect”—His serious air alarmed me—I began to fear that he had discovered the trick. “I strongly suspect—hem—hem”—he continued.

“What?” I enquired, rather sheepishly.

“Why, that it was my brains only that were turned—and—that—that—most ridiculous piece of business”——

“Why, to be sure, Mr N——” * * * and he was so ashamed about it, that he set off for the country immediately, and among the glens and mountains of Scotland, endeavoured to forget that ever he dreamed that his head was turned.

THE WIFE.

Monday Evening, 25th July, 18—. —Well! the poor martyr has at last been released from her sufferings, and her wasted remains now lie hid in the kindly gloom of the grave. Yes, sweet, abused, forgiving Mrs T——! I this morning attended your funeral, and let fall a tear of unavailing regret! Shall I tell your sad story all in one word or two? The blow that broke your heart, was struck by YOUR HUSBAND!

Heaven grant me calmness in recording your wrongs! Let not the feelings of outraged humanity prompt me to "set down aught in malice;" may I be dispassionately enough disposed to say but the half, nay even the hundredth part only, of what I know, and my conscience will stand acquitted! Let not him who shall read these pages anticipate any thing of romance, of high-flown rhodomontade, in what follows. It is all about a poor, ill-used, heart-broken WIFE: and such a one is, alas! too often met with in all classes of society, to attract, in an ordinary case, any thing of public notice. The ensuing narration will not, however, be found an ordinary case. It is fraught with circumstances of such peculiar aggravation, and exhibits such a moving picture of the tenderness and unrepining fortitude of woman, that I am tempted to give it at some length. Its general accuracy may be relied upon, for I succeeded in wringing it from the reluctant lips of the poor sufferer herself. I must, however, be allowed to give it in my own way; though at the risk of its being thereby divested of much of that sorrowful simplicity and energy—that touching naïveté, which characterised its utterance. I shall conclude with extracting some portions of my notes of visita made in a professional capacity.

Miss Jane C—— had as numerous a retinue of suitors as a pretty person, well-known sweetness of disposition, considerable accomplishments, and £10,000 in the funds, could not fail of procuring to the possessor of so many charms. She was an orphan, and was left absolute mistress of her property on attaining her twenty-first year. All the members of her own family most strenuously backed the pretensions of the Curate of the parish—a young man of ascertained respectability of character and family, with a snug stipend, and fair prospects of preferment. His person and manners were agreeable and engaging; and he could not conceal his inclination to fling them both at Miss C——'s feet. All who knew the parties, said it would be an excellent match in all respects, and a happy couple they would make. Miss C—— herself could not look at the Curate with indifference—at least if any inference might be drawn from an occasional flushing of her features at church, whenever the eyes of the clergyman happened to glance at her—which was much oftener than his duty required. In short, the motherly gossips of the place all looked upon it as a settled thing, and had pitched upon an admirable house for the future couple. They owned unanimously that "the girl might have gone further and fared worse," and so forth; which is a great deal for such people to say about such matters.

There happened, however, to be given a great ball, by the lady of the Ex-Mayor, where Miss C—— was one of the stars of the evening; and at this party there chanced to be a young Londoner, who had just come down on a three-weeks' holiday. He was training for the law, in a solicitor's office, and was within six or seven months of the expiration of his articles. He was a personable sort of fellow to look at—a spice of a dandy—and had that kind of air about him which tells of town—if not of the blandness, ease, and elegance of the West, still—of town—which contrasted favourably with the comparative ungainliness of provincials. He was, in a word, a sort of small star; a triton among the minnows; and whatever he said or did took infallibly. Apprised by some judicious relations of the united charms of Miss C——'s purse and person, he took care to pay her the most conspicuous attentions. Alas! the quiet claims of the Curate were soon silenced by his bustling rival. This young spark chattered Miss C—— out of her calm senses. Wherever she went, he followed; whatever she said or did, he applauded. He put into requisition all his small acquirements—he sung a little, danced more, and talked an infinity. To be brief, he determined on carrying the fort with a coup de main ; and he succeeded. The poor Curate was forgotten for ever ! Before the enterprising young lawyer left —, he was an accepted suitor of Miss C——'s. The coldness of all her friends and acquaintances signified nothing to her ; her lover had, by some means or other, obtained so powerful a hold of her affections, that sneers, reproaches, remonstrances, threats on the part of all who had previously betrothed her to the Curate, “passed by her as the idle wind, which she regarded not.” She promised to become his wife as soon as his articles should have expired, and to live in London.

In due time, as matters approached a crisis, friends called in to talk over preliminaries. Mr T—— proved to be comparatively penniless ; but what was that ? Miss C—— acted with very unusual generosity. She insisted on settling only half her fortune—and left the other half entirely at his disposal. On receiving this intelligence from her own lips, the young man uttered the most frantic expressions of gratitude—promised her eternal love and faithfulness—protested that he idolized her—and took her at her word. It was in vain that cautious relations stepped in to tender their remonstrances to Miss C—— on the imprudent extent to which she was placing her fortune beyond her own control. Opposition only consolidated the resolutions of a woman whose mind is once made up. The generous creature believed implicitly every word that her lover poured into her delighted ear ; and was not startled into any thing like distrust, even when she found that her young husband had expended, at one fell swoop, nearly £3000 of the £5000 she had so imprudently placed at his disposal, in “establishing themselves in London,” as he termed it. He commenced a rate of living which it required an income of at least £1000 a-year to support ; and when an uncle of his wife's took upon him to represent to Mr T—— the ruinous extravagance—the profligate expenditure of his wife's funds—which all their mutual friends were lamenting and reprobating, he was treated with an impudence which for ever put an end to his interference, and effectually prevented that of any other party.

right, had Mr T—— paid but a moderate attention to business ; for his father had the command of an excellent town connexion, which soon put enough into his son's hands to keep two clerks in regular employment. His wife was soon shocked by hearing her husband make incessant complaints of the drudgery of the office, though he did not devote, on an average, more than two or three hours a-day to it. He was always proposing some new party, some delightful drive, some enchanting excursion, to her, and she dared not refuse, for he had, already, once disclosed symptoms of a most imperious temper whenever his will was interfered with. She began to grow very uneasy, as she saw him drawing cheque after cheque on the banker, without once replacing a single sum ! Good God, what was to become of them ? He complained of the tardy return of business ; and yet he left it altogether to the management of two hired clerks ! He was beginning also to grow irregular in his hours ; reiteratedly kept her waiting hours expecting his return to dinner in vain ; filled his table with frequent drafts from the gayest and most dissipated of his professional acquaintance, whose uproar, night after night, alarmed every one in the house, and disturbed the neighbours. Then he took to billiard-playing, and its invariable concomitants—drinking and late hours ;—the theatres, frequented alone, for the purpose—alas ! too notorious to escape even the chaste ears of his unfortunate and insulted wife—of mingling with the low wretches—the harpies—who frequent the slips and saloons ;—then “drinking-bouts” at taverns—and midnight “larks”—in company with a set of vulgar, ignorant young fellows, who always left him to settle the reckoning. He sent one of the clerks to his banker's, with a cheque for £10 one morning ; which proved to be the exact amount by which he had “overdrawn” his account—and worse—returned without the usual accommodation afforded. He was a little dismayed at finding such to be the state of things, and went up stairs to his wife to tell her, with a curse, of the “meanness”—the “d—d stinginess,” of Messrs —.

“What ! Is it all spent, George ?”

she enquired, in a gentle and very faint tone of voice.

"Every rap—d—ee, Jane!" was the reply. She turned pale, and trembled, while her husband, putting his hands in his pockets, walked suddenly to and fro about the parlour. With trembling hesitation, Mrs T— alluded to the near approach of her confinement, and asked, almost inaudible with agitation, and the fear of offending him, whether he had made any provision for the necessary expenses attending it—had laid up any thing. He replied in the negative, in a very petulant tone. She could not refrain from shedding tears.

"Your crying can't mend matters," said he rudely, walking to the window, and humming the words of some popular air.

"Dear, dear George, have you seen any thing in my conduct to displease you?" she enquired, wiping her eyes.

"Why do you ask me that, Mrs T—?" said he, walking slowly towards her, and eyeing her very sternly. She trembled, and had scarcely breath enough to answer, that she had feared such might have been the case, because he had become rather cool towards her of late.

"D'ye mean to say, ma'am, that I have used you ill, eh? Because if you do, it's a d—"

"Oh, no, no, George, I did not mean any thing of the kind; but—but—kiss me, and say you have forgiven me—do!" and she rose and stepped towards him with a forced smile. He gave her his cheek with an air of sullen indifference, and said, "It's no use blubbering about misfortunes, and all that sort of thing. The fact is, something must be done, or, d—ee! I'm done!—Look, here I am! Bring your chair here, do!—What do you say to these?" He pulled out of his pocket a crumpled mass of papers—bills which had been sent in during the week,—some of them of several months' standing. L.70 were due for wine and spirits; L.90 for articles of his dress; L.25 for the use of a horse and tilbury; L.10 for cigars and snuffs; and, in short, the above are a sample of the items which swelled into the gross amount of nearly L.300—all due—all from creditors who refused him longer credit, and all for articles which had ministered nothing to his poor wife's comforts or necessities. She burst into tears, as she looked over the bills scattered on the table, and flinging her arms round her husband's neck, implored him to pay more attention to business.

"I tell you I do," he replied, impatiently, suffering, not returning, her affectionate embrace.

"Well, dearest George! I don't mean to blame you!"

"You had better not, indeed!" he replied coldly; "but what's to be done, eh?—That's what we ought to be considering. Do you think—hem!—I am—Could you, do you think—" He paused, and seemed embarrassed.

"Could I what, dear George?" she enquired, squeezing his hands.

"D'ye think—D—ee!—no—I'll ask you some other day!" and he rose from his chair. What will be imagined was his request?—She learnt some days afterwards, that it was for her to use her influence with her aunt, an old widow lady, to lend him L.300!—To return, however.

He was standing opposite the fire, in moody contemplation, when a rude puppy, dressed in the extreme of the fashion, with three different-coloured waistcoats on, burst unceremoniously into the parlour, and disturbed the sorrowful tête-à-tête of T— and his wife, by rushing up to the former, shaking his hands, and exclaiming boisterously—"Ah! T—, how d'ye do, d—ee? Bill Bunce's chaffer has beat —; he has, by —! I've won L.15 on it! Oh, a thousand pardons, ma'am—I didn't see you; but there's been a great dog fight, you see, and I have been luckier than what Mr T— here has, for I've won L.15, and he has lost L.20!"

This precious puppy was one of T—'s bosom friends! Aye, incredible as it may seem, it was for such worthless fellows, such despicable blockheads as these, that Mr T— had squandered his generous wife's property, and forsaken her company! On the present occasion—a sample of what had occurred so often as to cause no surprise—nothing but a gush of bitter tears after he was gone—T— civilly bade her good morning, and departed arm-in-arm with his "friend," and did not return till past two o'clock in the morning, almost dead drunk. Had he seen how the remainder of the day was spent by his poor wife—in tears and terror—unsoothed by the thought that her husband was absent on errands of honourable employment—content with making a scanty dinner of that at which the servant "turned up her nose," as the phrase is—and sitting the rest of the evening sewing, and shedding tears by turns, till the hour of midnight warned her to retire to a sleepless bed: could he have felt the hurried beatings of the heart whenever her wakeful ear fancied she heard the sound of his approaching footsteps on the pavement beneath: could he have done this, he might not, possibly, on waking in the morning, have called her a —, NOT STRUCK HER on the mouth till her under-lip was half cut through, for presuming to rouse him before he had slept off the fumes of the brandy, and all he had drunk over night—in order that he might be in trim for a consultation appointed for eleven o'clock. He did do this; and I was the first person on earth to whom she reluctantly told it—on her deathbed!

Though her delicate and interesting situation—within a very few weeks of her accouchement—might have kindled a spark of tenderness and pride in the bosom of any husband, who had not lost all the feelings of honour and manliness, it sufficed, apparently, to inspire T— with a determination to treat her more unkindly and neglectfully than ever. She scarcely ever saw him during the day; and when he came home at night—more than once conducted by the watchman—he was almost invariably stupefied with liquor; and if he had the power of utterance, he seemed to take a demoniacal pleasure in raining upon her the foulest expressions which he could recollect to be used by the riff-raff of the tavern where he spent his time. More than once was she so horrified by what he said, that, at the peril of her life, she insisted on leaving him, and sharing the bed of the servant! Her wretched looks might have broken a heart of stone; yet it affected not that of the wretch who called her his wife!

A few days after the occurrence above related, the maid-servant put a twopenny post letter into her mistress's hands; and fortunate it was for Mrs T— that the girl happened to be in the room while she read it, awaiting orders for dinner. The note was in these words, written in a feigned, but still a lady's hand:—

"UNFORTUNATE MADAM!

"I feel it my duty to acquaint you, that your husband, Mr T—, is pursuing quite disgraceful courses all night and day, squandering away his money among sharpers and black-legs, and that he is persuaded to back one of the boxers in a great fight that is to be; and above all, and what I blush to tell you,—but it is fitting Mrs T— should know it,—in my opinion, Mr T— is notoriously keeping a woman of infamous character, with whom he is constantly seen at the theatres and most other public places, and she passes as his cousin. Hoping that you will have prudence and spirit to act in this distressing business as becomes a lady and a wife, I am,

Madam,

With the truest respect and sympathy,

"A REAL FRIEND."

Mrs T— read this cruel letter in silence—motionless—and with a face that whitened sensibly as she proceeded; till, at the disgraceful fact mentioned in the concluding part, she dropped the paper from her hands—and the servant ran to her in time to prevent her falling from her chair, for she had swooned! It was long before she came to; and, when that was the case, it was only that she might be carried to her bed—and she was confined that evening. The child was still-born! All this came on the husband like a thunder-stroke, and shocked him for a time into something like sobriety and compunction. The admirable qualities of his wife—her virtues and her meekness—shone before his startled eyes in angel hues. He forsook the scenes, a constant frequenting of which had rendered him unworthy to live under the same roof with her, and betook himself to the regular pursuits of business with great earnestness. He soon found out what arduous up-hill work it was to bring again under his control affairs which had been so long and shamefully neglected. He felt several times disposed to throw it all over in disgust; for, alas! he had lost almost every vestige of the patience and accuracy of business-habits. He succeeded, with great difficulty, in appeasing the more clamorous of his creditors, and, in a word, he once more stood a chance of clearing his way before him. His poor wife, however, was brought several times to the very verge of the grave, and was destined for months to the monotonous hours of a bed of sickness. For nearly a month, she experienced the most affectionate attentions from her husband, that were consistent with a due attention to the business of his office. She felt revived and cheered by the prospect of his renewed attachment, and trusted in its permanency. But, alas! her husband was not made of such materials as warranted her expectations; he was little else than a compound of weakness, vanity, ignorance, and ill-temper; and for such a one, the sober loveliness and attractiveness of domestic life had no charms. He had no sooner got his affairs a little into train, and succeeded in reviving the confidence of some of his principal clients, than he began to relax his efforts. One by one his old associates drew around him, and re-entangled him in the toils of dissipation. The first time that poor ill-fated Mrs T—— came down into the parlour to dinner, after a three-months' absence in her sick-chamber, she was doomed to dine alone—disappointed of the promised presence of her husband to welcome her—for the same low, contemptible coxcomb, formerly introduced to the reader as one of her husband's most intimate friends, had called in the course of the morning, and succeeded in enticing him away to a tavern-dinner with a "set of good ones," who were afterwards to adjourn to one of the minor theatres. In vain was the little fillet of veal, ordered by her husband himself, placed on the table before his deserted wife; she could not taste it, nor had strength enough to carve a piece for the nurse! Mr T—— had had the grace to send her a note of apology, alleging that his absence was occasioned by "an affair of business!" This cruel and perfidious conduct, however, met with its due punishment. One of his principal creditors—his tailor—happened to be swallowing a hasty dinner in a box adjoining the one in which T—— and his boisterous associates were dining, and accidentally cast eyes on his debtor T——. He saw and heard enough to fill him with fury; for he heard his own name mentioned by the half-inebriated debtor, as one of the "served-outsmys" whom he intended to "do"—an annunciation which was received by the gentlemanly young men who were dining with him, with cries of "Bravo, T——, do! D——ee, I—and I—and I—have done it before this!"

The next morning he was arrested for a debt of £110, at the suit of the very "snip" whom he intended, in his own witty way, to "do," and carried off to a spunging-house in Chancery Lane. There he lay for two days without his wife's knowing any thing of the true state of things. He could get no one to stand bail for him, till one of his wife's insulted friends, and his own brother-in-law, came forward reluctantly for that purpose, in order to calm her dreadful agitation, which had flung her again on a sick-bed. Her husband wrote her a most penitential letter from the spunging-house, imploring her forgiveness of his misconduct, and promising amendment. Again she believed him, and welcomed him home with enthusiastic demonstrations of fondness. He himself could not refrain from weeping; he sobbed and cried like a child; for his feelings—what with the most pungent sense of disgrace, and remorse, and conscious unworthiness of the sweet creature, whose affections no misconduct of his seemed capable of alienating—were quite overcome. Three of his largest creditors commenced actions against him, and nothing seemed capable of arresting the ruin now impending over him. Where was he to find the means of satisfying their claims? He was in despair, and had sullenly and stupidly come to a resolution to let things take their course, when, as if Providence had determined to afford him one chance more of retrieving his circumstances, the sudden death of his father put him in possession of £300 in ready cash; and this sum, added to £200 advanced him by two of his wife's friends, who could not resist her agonizing supplications, once more set matters to rights.

* * * * *

Passing over an interval of four years, spent with disgrace to himself, and anguish to his wife, similar to that described above, they must now be presented to the reader occupying, alas! a lowered station of society. They had been compelled to relinquish an airy, respectable, and commodious residence, for a small, bad house, in a worse neighbourhood. His business had dwindled down to what was insufficient to occupy the time of one solitary clerk, whom he was scarcely able to pay regularly—and the more respectable of his friends had deserted him in disgust. The most rigorous—nay almost starving—economy on the part of his wife, barely sufficed to make both ends meet. She abridged herself of almost every domestic comfort, of all those little elegancies which a well-bred woman loves to keep about her, and did so without a murmur. The little income arising from the £5000, her settlement-money, might surely of itself, with only ordinary prudence on his part, have enabled them to maintain their ground with something like respectability, especially if he had attended to what remained of his business. But, alas! alas! T—'s temper had by this time been thoroughly and permanently soured. He hated his good wife—his business—his family—himself—every thing except liquor and low company! His features bore testimony to the sort of life he led—swelled, bloated, and his eyes languid and bloodshot. Mrs T— saw less of him than ever; for not far from his house there was a small tavern, frequented by not the most respectable sort of people; and there was T— to be found, evening after evening, smoking and drinking himself into a state of stupid insensibility, till he would return home redolent of the insufferable stench and fumes of tobacco-smoke and brandy-and-water! In the daytime he was often to be found for hours together at an adjoining billiard-room, where he sometimes lost sums of money, which his poor wife was obliged to make up for by parting, one by one, with her little trinkets and jewellery! What could have infatuated him to pursue such a line of conduct? it may be asked. Why, as if of set purpose, to ruin the peace of mind of one of the fondest and most amiable wives that ever man was blessed with? A vulgar but forcible expression may explain all,—it was "the nature of the beast." He had no intellectual pleasures—no taste for the quiet enjoyments of home; and had, above all, in his wife, too sweet, confiding, and unresisting a creature! Had she proved a temptress, the aspect of things might have been very different; she might have bullied him into something like a sense of propriety. But here, however, he had it all his own way—a poor creature, who allowed him to break her heart without remonstrance or reproach; for the first she dared not—the second she could not! It would have melted a heart of stone to see her! She was wasted to a skeleton, and in such a weak, declining state of health, that she could scarcely stir out of doors. Her appetite was almost entirely gone; her spirits all fled long ago! Now, shall I tell the reader one immediate cause of such physical exhaustion? I will, and truly. Mr T— had still a tolerable share of business, but he could scarcely be brought to give more than two hours' attendance in his office a-day, and sometimes not even that. He therefore imprudently left almost every thing to the management of his clerk, a worthy young man, but wholly incompetent to such a charge. He had extorted from even his idle and unworthy master, frequent acknowledgments of his obligations for the punctuality with which he transacted all that was intrusted to him, and, in particular, for the neatness, accuracy, and celerity with which he copied drafts of pleadings, leases, agreements, &c. His master often hiccupped to him his astonishment at the rapidity with which he "turned them out of hand." Little did the unworthy fellow imagine that in saying all this, he was uttering, not his clerk's, but his wife's praises! For she it was, poor creature! who, having taken the pains to learn a lawyer's hand, engrossing, &c. from the clerk, actually sat up almost regularly till two or three o'clock in the morning, plodding occasionally through papers and parchments—making long and laborious abstracts—engrossing settlements, indentures, &c. and copying pleadings, till her wearied eyes, and her little hands, could no longer perform their office! I could at this moment lay my hands on a certain legal instrument of tiresome prolixity, which was engrossed, every word, by Mrs T——! This was the way in which his wife spent the hours of midnight, to enable him to squander away his time and money in the unworthy, the infamous manner above related!

Was it wonderful that her health and spirits were wholly borne down by the pressure of so many accumulated ills? Had not her husband's eye been dulled, and his perceptions deadened, by the perpetual stupors of intoxication, he might have discerned the hectic flush—the coming fever—the blood-spitting, which foretold—consumption! But that was too much to be expected. As for the evenings—that part of his day was invariably spent at his favourite tavern, sitting hour after hour among its lowest frequenters; and as for her night-cough and blood-spitting, he was lulled by liquor into too profound a repose to be roused by the sounds which were, in effect, his martyred wife's death-knell! If, during the daytime, he was, in a manner, forced to notice her languor—her drooping spirits—the only notice, the only sympathy it called forth on his part, was a cold and careless enquiry, why she did not call in a medical man! I shall conclude this portion of my narrative, with barely reciting four instances of that conduct on the part of Mrs T——'s husband, which at last succeeded in breaking her heart; and which, with many other similar gices, were communicated to me with tears of tortured sensibility.

I. Half-drunk, half-sober, he one evening introduced to her, at tea, a female "friend," whose questionable appearance might, at first sight, have justified his wife's refusal to receive her. Her conversation soon disclosed her real character; and the insulted wife abruptly retired from the room that was polluted by the presence of the infamous creature, whom he avowed to be his mistress! He sprung after her to the door, for the purpose of dragging her back; but her sudden paleness, and the faint tones in which she whispered—"Don't stop me—don't—or I shall die!" so shocked him, that he allowed her to retire, and immediately dismissed the wretch, whom he could have brought thither for no other purpose than to insult his wife! Poor creature! did a portion of her midnight earnings go towards the support of the wretch who was kept by her husband? Was not such a consideration sufficient to stab her to the heart?

II. Having occasion, late one evening, to rummage among her husband's office-papers, in search of something which was to be engrossed that night, her eye happened to light on a document, with a pencil superscription—"Copy, case for counsel, concerning Mrs T——'s marriage settlement." A very excusable curiosity prompted her to peruse what proved to be a series of queries submitted to counsel, on the following points, among others: What present powers he had under her marriage-settlement;—whether her own interest in it could be legally made over to another, with her consent, during her life-time, and if so, how;—whether or not he could part with the reversion, provided she did not exercise her power of willing it away elsewhere?—From all this, was it possible for her not to see how heartlessly he was calculating on the best method of obtaining possession of the remnant of her fortune?

"Oh, cruel—cruel—cruel George! So impatient!—Could you not wait a month or two? I'm sure I shall not keep you out of it long! I always intended to leave it you, and I won't let this alter my mind, though it is cruel of you!" sobbed Mrs T——, till her heart seemed breaking. At that moment she heard her husband's loud obstreperous knock at the door, and hastily crumpling up the paper into the drawer of the desk from which she had taken it, she put out the candle, and leaving her midnight labours, flew up stairs to bed—to a wretched and sleepless one!

III. Mrs T——'s child, which was about three years and a half old, was suddenly seized with convulsive fits, as she was one evening undressing it for bed. Fit after fit followed in such rapid succession, that the medical man who was summoned in, prepared her to expect the worst. The distraction of her feelings may be easier conceived than described, as she held on her knee the little creature on whose life were centred all the proud and fond feelings of a mother's love, deepened into exclusive intensity—for it seemed the only object on earth to return her love;—as she held it, I say, but with great difficulty, for its tiny limbs were struggling and plunging about in a dreadful manner. And then the frightful rolling of the eyes! They were endeavouring to pour a teaspoonful of Dalby's carminative, or some such medicine, through the closed teeth, when the room door was suddenly thrown open, and in reeled Mr T——, more than half-dead with liquor, and in a merrier mood than usual, for he had been successful at billiards! He had entered unobserved through the street-door, which had been left ajar by the distracted servant girl, and hearing a bustle in the room, he had entered, for the purpose of seeing what was the matter.

"Wh—wh—what is the matter, good fo—olks, eh?" he stammered, reeling towards where Mrs T—— was sitting, almost fainting with terror at seeing the frightful contortions of her infant's countenance. She saw him not, for her eyes were fixed in agony on the features of her suffering babe.

"What the—the—the d—l is the matter with all of you here, eh?" he enquired, chucking the servant girl under the chin, who, much agitated, and shedding tears, had approached to beg he would leave the room. He tried to kiss her, and in the presence of the medical man—who sternly rebuked him for his monstrous conduct.

"D—n you, sir—who the d—l are you?" he said, putting his arms a-kimbo—"I will know what's the matter!" He came near—he saw all!—the leaden-hand, quivering features, the limbs now rigid, and struggling violently, the starting eye-balls.

"Why, for God's sake, what's the matter, eh?" he stammered, almost inaudibly, while the colour fled from his face, and the perspiration started upon his forehead. He strove to steady himself, but that was impossible. He had drunk too deeply.

"What are you doing to the child—what—what?" he again enquired, in a feeble and faltering voice, interrupted by a hiccough. No notice whatever was taken of him by—, who did not seem to see or hear him.—"Jane, tell me," addressing his wife, "has the child had"—hiccough—"an—an—ac—ci—dent?" The infant that moment gave a sudden and final plunge; and Mrs T——'s faint shriek, and the servant girl's wringing of the hands, announced that all was over! The little thing lay dead in the arms of its mother.

"Sir, your child is dead," said the apothecary, somewhat sternly, shaking Mr T—— by the arm—for he stood gazing on the scene with a sullen, vacant stare, scarcely able to steady himself.

"Wh—wh—at! D—c—u—d!" he muttered.

"Oh, George, my darling is—! is dead!" groaned the afflicted mother, for the first time looking at and addressing her husband. The word seemed to sober him in an instant.

"What!—Dead! And I DRINK!"

The medical man, who stood by, told me he could never forget the scenes of that evening! When Mrs T—— discovered, by his manner, his disgraceful condition, she was so utterly overcome with her feelings of mingled grief, shame, and horror, that she fell into violent hysterics, which lasted almost all night long. As for T——, he seemed palsied all the next day. He sat alone during the whole of the next morning, in the room where the dead infant lay, gazing upon it with emotions which may be imagined, but not described!

IV. Almost the only piece of ornamental furniture, her last remaining means of amusement and consolation, was her piano. She played with great taste and feeling, and many a time contrived to make sweet sounds pour an oblivious charm over her sorrows and sufferings, by wandering over the airs which she had loved in happier days. Thus was she engaged one afternoon with one of Dr Arne's exquisite compositions, the air beginning, "Blow, blow, thou bitter wind." She made several attempts to accompany the music with her voice—for she had a very sweet one, and could sing—but, whenever she attempted, the words seemed to choke her. There was a sorrowful appropriateness in them, a touching echo of her own feelings, which dissolved her very spirit within her. Her only child had died, as the reader was informed, about six months before, and her husband had resumed his ill courses, becoming more and more stern and sullen in his demeanour—more unreasonable in his requirements. The words of the air, as may be easily conceived, were painfully appropriate to her situation, and she could not help shedding tears. At that moment her husband entered the room, with his hat on, and stood for some moments before the fire in silence.

"Mrs T——!" said he, as soon as she had concluded the last stanza.

"Well, George?" said she, in a mild tone.

"I—I must sell that piano, ma'am—I must!" said he.

"What!" exclaimed his wife, in a low whisper, turning round on the music-stool, and looking him in the face with an air of sorrowful surprise. "Oh, you cannot be in earnest, George!"

"Pon my life, ma'am, but I am—I can't afford you superfluities while we can hardly afford the means of keeping body and soul together."

"George—dear George—do forgive me, but I—I—I cannot part with my poor piano!" said she.

"Why not, ma'am, when I say you must?"

"Oh, because it was the gift of my poor mother!" she replied, bursting into tears.

"Can't help that, ma'am—not I. It must go. I hate to hear its cursed noise in the house—it makes me melancholy—it does, ma'am—you're always playing such gloomy music," replied her husband, in a severe and less decisive tone.

"Well, well! if that's all, I'll play any thing you like—only tell me, dear George! what shall I play for you, now?" said she, rising from the music-stool, and approaching him.

"Play a farewell to the piano, for it must go, and it shall!"

"Dear, kind George! let me keep it a little longer," said she, looking him beseechingly in the face—"a little—a little longer!"

"Well, ma'am, sit down and play away till I come in again, any thing you like."

He left the room; and in less than half an hour—oh, hardness of heart unheard of!—returned with a stranger, who proved to be a furniture broker, come to value the instrument! That evening it was sold to him for L.15; and it was carried away the first thing in the morning, before his wife came down stairs! What will be supposed the cause of this cruelty? It was to furnish Mr T—— with money to pay a bill of the infamous creature more than once alluded to, and who had obtained a complete ascendancy over him!

It was a long-continued course of such treatment as this, that called me upon the scene, in a professional capacity, merely, at first; till the mournful countenance of my patient inspired me with feelings of concern and friendly sympathy, which eventually led to an entire confidence. She came to me in the unostentatious character of a morning patient, in a hackney coach, with an elderly female friend. She looked quite the lady, though her dress was of but an ordinary quality, yet exquisitely neat and clean; and she had still a very interesting, and somewhat pretty face, though long-continued sorrow had made sad havoc with her features! These visits, at intervals of a week, she paid me, and compelled me to take my fee of one guinea, on each occasion—though I would have given two to be enabled to decline it without hurting her delicacy. Though her general health had suffered severely, still I thought that matters had not gone quite so far as to destroy all hopes of recovery, with due attention;—though her cheeks disclosed, almost every evening, the death-rose, the grave-flowers of hectic, and night-sweats, and a faint cough, were painfully regular in their recurrence, still I saw nothing, for a long time, to warrant me in warning her of serious danger. I insisted on her allowing me to visit her at her own house, and she at last permitted me, on condition that I would receive at least half-a-guinea—poor creature!—for every visit. That, however, I soon dropped; and I saw her almost every day gratuitously, whenever any temporary aggravations of her symptoms required my attendance. The first time I saw her husband, I could not help taking a prejudice against him, though she had never breathed a syllable to me of his ill conduct. He was apparently about forty years old, though his real age was not more than two or three-and-thirty. His manners and habits had left a sufficiently strong impress upon him, to enable a casual beholder to form a shrewd conjecture as to his character. His features, once rather handsome than otherwise, were now reddened and swollen with long-continued excess; and there was altogether an air of truculence—of vulgar assurance and stupid sullenness, about him, which prepossessed me strongly against him. When, long afterwards, Mrs T—— gave me that description of his appearance and manners under which he is first placed before the reader of this narrative, I could not help frequently interrupting her with expressions of incredulity, and reminding her of his present ill-favoured looks: but as she went on with her sad story, my scepticism vanished. Personal deterioration was no incredible attendant on moral declension!

March 26th, 18—.—These can be no longer any doubt as to the nature of Mrs T——'s symptoms. She is the destined victim of consumption. The oftener I go to her house, the stronger are my suspicions that she is an unhappy woman, and that her husband ill-uses her. I have many times tried to hint my suspicions to her, but she will declare nothing. She will not understand me. Her settled dependency, however, accompanied with an undue current of feverish nervous trepidation, which she cannot satisfactorily explain, convinces me something or other is wrong. I see very little of her husband, for he is scarcely ever in her company when I call. Though his business is that of an attorney, and his house and office are one, I see scarcely any indications of business stirring. I am afraid they are in shaking circumstances. I am sure that she, at least, was born and bred for a higher station than she now occupies. Her manners have that simplicity, ease, and elegance, which tell of a higher rank in society. I often detect her alone in tears, over a low fire. In a word, I am sure she is wretched, and that her husband is the cause of it. That he keeps late hours, I know—for she happened to let slip as much one day to me, when I was making enquiries about the time of her retiring to sleep. I feel a great interest in her; for, whenever I see her, her appearance reminds me of "Patience on a monument, smiling at Grief,"—

"Sorrow deck'd

In the poor faded garb of tarnish'd joy,
Ill fitting to her wasted form."

April 5th.—To day I found them both together—sitting one on each side of the fire-place, he smoking—in the parlour,—and she, with a little flowering-work in her lap. I thought he seemed somewhat embarrassed at my entrance; which probably had put an end to some scene of unpleasantness, for her face was suffused with crimson. He soon retired, however, and left the wretchedness to which I had been accustomed in her.

"So my wife's ill, sir, it seems," said Mr T——, putting his pipe on the hob, and addressing me. "I'm sorry to say she is, Mr T——," I replied, "and that she is worse to-day than she has been for some time."

Mrs T—— let fall tears.

"Sorry to hear you say so, doctor; I've just been telling her it's all owing to her own obstinacy in not calling entirely on —."

"I think you might have used a milder word, sir," said I, with involuntary sternness, at the same time directing my attention exclusively to his wife—as if for the purpose of

"What's the matter with her, sir?"

he enquired, in a more respectful tone than he had hitherto assumed.

"General debility, sir, and occasional pain," said I coldly.

"What's it owing to?"

I looked suddenly at Mrs T—; our eyes met—and hers had an expression of apprehension. I determined, however, to give a hint that I suspected all was not right, and replied—"I fear she does not take suitable nourishment—keeps irregular hours—and has something or other in her mind which harasses her." The latter words I accompanied with a steady look into his face. He seemed a little flushed.

"You're mistaken, sir," said he with a brusque air; "she may eat what she likes—that I can afford—may go to bed at what hour she likes—and it's all her own fault that she will sit moping over the fire night after night, and weak after week—waiting for my return—till two or three o'clock in the morning!"

"That is, of itself, sufficient to account for her illness," said I, pointedly. He began to lose his temper, for he saw the shameful acknowledgment he had unwittingly made. "Pray, Mrs T—," he enquired, looking angrily at his wife, who sat pale and trembling by my side,—"Have you any thing on your mind—eh?—If so—why—speak out—no sneaking?"

"No!" she stammered; "and I never said I had—I assure you. Did I ever give you even the most distant hint of the kind, doctor?" she continued, appealing to me.

"By no means, madam,—not in the slightest, on any occasion," I replied; "it was only a conjecture—a suspicion of my own." I thought he looked as if he would have made some instant reply, for his eye glared furiously on me. He bit his lips, however, and continued silent. His conscience "pricked him." I began to feel uneasy about the future quiet of Mrs T—, lest any observations of mine should have excited her husband's suspicions that she made disclosures to me of family matters.

"What would you advise for her, sir?" he asked coldly.

"Removal, for a few weeks, to the sea-side; a liberal diet, and lively society."

"Very well, sir," said he, after a puzzled pause; "very good, sir—very; it shall be attended to.—Perhaps you want to be alone—eh?—So I'll leave you!" and directing a peculiar look towards his wife, as if warning her against something or other, he left the room. She burst into tears directly he was gone.

"My dear madam, forgive me for saying that I suspect your husband's behaviour towards you is somewhat harsh, and, perhaps, unkind," said I, in as soothing a tone as I could command, and pressing her hand kindly into mine.

"Oh no, doctor,—no!" she replied, adding in an altered manner, indicating displeasure, "what makes you think so, sir?"

"Why, madam, simply because I cannot shut my eyes or my ears to what passes even while I am here—as for instance—only just now, madam—just now."

She sighed, and made me no reply. I told her I was in earnest in recommending the course I had mentioned to her husband.

"Oh dear, doctor, no, no,—we could not afford it," said she, with a sigh. At that moment her husband returned,—and resumed his former seat in sullen silence. I soon after took my departure.

April 7th.—Does not the following make one blush for one's species?—I give it merely as I received it from the lips of Mrs T—. Inestimable woman! why are you fated to endure such pangs?—

About twelve o'clock at noon, hearing her husband come in, and thinking, from his looks, of which she caught a casual and hasty glance through the window, that he was fatigued, and stood in need of some refreshment, she poured out a glass of port wine, almost the last in a solitary bottle which she had purchased, under my directions, for medicinal purposes, and, with a blurt, brought it herself down stairs—though the effort so exhausted her feeble frame, that she was obliged to sit down for several moments on the last stair to recover her breath. At last she ventured to knock at the door of the little back-office where he was sitting, holding the little waiter with the glass of wine and the biscuit in her left hand.

"Who's there?" enquired the gruff voice of T—.

"It's only I, my dear. May I come in, please?" replied the gentle voice of his wife.

"What brings you here, eh?—What the d—! do you want with me now?" said he, surlily.

"I've brought you something, my dear," she replied, and ventured to open the door. T—— was sitting before some papers or parchments, alone, and his countenance shewed that he was in a worse humour than usual. So soon as he saw her errand, he suddenly rose from his chair, and exclaiming in an angry tone—"What the — brings you here in this way, plaguing me while engaged at business, you —! Eh, woman?" Oh, my God! In a sudden fit of fury, he struck the waiter, wine, biscuit and all, out of her trembling hands to the floor, rudely pushed her out of the room, and slammed the door violently in her face. He did not re-open it, though he could not but have heard her fall upon the floor, the shock was so sudden and violent.

There, stretched across the mat, at the bottom of the staircase, lay that suffering creature, unable to rise, till her stifled sobbings brought the servant girl to her assistance.

"I can't help saying it's most abominable usage of you, ma'am; it is—and I don't care if master hears me say so neither," said the girl, herself crying; "for I'm sure he isn't worthy of the very shoes you wear—he isn't." She was endeavouring to lift her mistress, when Mrs T—— suddenly burst into a loud unnatural laugh, and went off into violent hysterics. Mr T——, hearing the noise of talking and laughing, sprung to the door, threw it open, and shouted to them to be "off with their noise—disturbing business!"—but the piteous spectacle of his prostrate wife stopped him—and, almost petrified with horror, he knelt down for the purpose of assisting her all he could. * *

About an hour after this occurrence I happened to call—and found her lying in bed, alone—her husband having left her on business. When the servant told me—and her mistress reluctantly corroborated what she said—the circumstances above related, I felt such indignation swelling my whole frame, that had he been within reach, I could not have resisted caning the scoundrel within an inch of his unworthy life! The recollection of this occurrence tortures me even now, and I can hardly believe that such brutality as T——'s could have been shown by man!—

Mrs T—— kept her room from that hour, and never left it, till she was carried out for burial!—But this is anticipating.

April 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th.—I see clearly that poor Mrs T—— will never rise from her bed again. She has drained the bitter cup of grief to the dregs!—She is one of the meekest sufferers I ever had for a patient. She says little to me, or to any one; and shews a regard—a love for her unworthy husband, which, I think, can be called by no other name than absolute infatuation. I have never yet heard her breathe a hurt to his dis-advantage. He is not much with her; and from what little I have seen, feel convinced that his eyes are opening to a sense of the flagrant iniquity of his past conduct. And what are the effects produced by his feelings of shame and remorse? He endeavours to forget all in the continual stupor induced by liquor!

April 12th.—Mrs T—— delirious. Raved while I was there about her child—convulsions—said something about "cruel of Mr T—— to be drunk while his child lay dying,"—and said many other things which shocked me unutterably, and convinced me that her primary disorder was—a broken heart. I am sure she must have endured a series of brutal usage from her husband!

—13th.—The whole house upside down—in disorder and confusion from the top to the bottom—for there is an execution in it, and the officers and an appraiser are making an inventory of the furniture;—poor—poor—poor Mrs T—— lying all the while on her death-bed!—The servant told me afterwards, that her mistress, hearing strange steps and voices, called what was the matter; and on receiving word of the real state of matters, lifted up her hands, burst into an agony of weeping, and prayed that the Almighty would be pleased to remove her from such a scene of wretchedness. T—— himself, I learnt, was sitting cowering over the kitchen fire, crying like a child!—Brute! coward! fool!—Such was the state of things at the time of my arrival. I was inconceivably shocked, and hurried to Mrs T——'s room, with unusual haste and trepidation. I found her in tears—sobbing, and exclaiming, “Why won't they let us rest a little?—why strip the house before I am gone?—can they not wait a little?—where, where is Mr T——?”

I could not for several minutes speak myself,—for tears. At length I succeeded in allaying her excitement and agitation. At her request, I sent for the appraiser into her room. He came—and seemed a respectable and feeling man.

“Were you bent upon stripping the house, sir, while this lady is lying in her present dangerous state?”

“Indeed, sir, indeed, sir,” replied the man, with considerable emotion—“I'm sorry for it—very—but it's my duty—duty—ordered—” he continued, composedly; “if I had my own way, sir”——

“But at least you need not approach this chamber, sir,” said I, rather sternly. He stammered something like the words, “obliged—sorry—court of law,” &c. &c. Mrs T—— again burst into an agony of tears.

“Retire, sir, for the present,” said I, in an authoritative tone, “and we will send for you soon.” I then entered into a conversation with my poor persecuted patient, and she told me of the £5000 settled to her separate use, and which she intended, under a power in the deed of settlement, to will to her husband. I spontaneously promised to stand security for the satisfaction of the execution, provided the creditors would defer proceedings for three months. She blessed me for it!—This, however, I afterwards learned would be illegal, at least so I was told; and I therefore wrote a cheque on my banker for the amount awarded by the court, and thus put an end to distress from that quarter. At Mrs T——'s urgent request, I returned to her bedside that evening. I found a table, with writing materials placed before a chair, in which she begged me to be seated. She then dictated to me her will—in which, after deducting the sum I had advanced in satisfaction of the execution, and leaving me, in addition, sufficient to purchase a plain mourning ring, she bequeathed the whole absolutely and unreservedly to her husband; and added, my hand shaking while I wrote it down, “hoping that he will use it prudently, and not entirely forget me when I am gone. And if he should—if he should—” her utterance was choked—“and if he should—marry again—” again she paused.

“Dear, dear madam! compose yourself! Take time! This dreadful agitation will accelerate the event we are all dreading!” said I.

“No—don't fear. I beg you will go on! If he should marry again, may he use her—use her—No, no, no!—strike all the last clause out! Give me the pen!” I did as she directed me—struck out from the words, “and if he should,” &c., and put the pen into her hand. With trembling fingers she traced the letters of her name; I witnessed it, and she said, “Now, is all right?”—“Yes, madam,” I replied. She then burst into a flood of tears, exclaiming, “Oh, George! George! this will shew you that, however tired you may have grown of me, I have loved you to the end—I have—I have!” She burst into louder weeping.

April 14th to May 6th.—Sinking rapidly. I shall be astonished if she survive a week. She is comparatively in a happy frame of mind, and has availed herself of the consolations of religion to some purpose. On this day (May 6th) I succeeded in extracting from her the facts which compose the former part of this narrative. Her gentle, palliating way of telling it, dyed the conduct of her husband of almost all blame-worthiness! She could not allow me to make a harsh or condemnatory comment all the way through! She blamed herself as she went on; accused herself of want of firmness; said she was afraid Mr T—— had been disappointed in her disposition; said that if he had done any thing wrong, it was owing to the bad companions who had enticed him from the path of duty into that of dissipation; that he had not exactly neglected her, or wilfully ill-used her; but—but—she could say nothing to extenuate his guilt, and I begged her not! I left her in tears myself.

O woman! woman! woman! "We had been brutes without you," and the mean and miserable T—— was a brute with you!

May 8th.—Mrs T—— wasted to a shadow: all the horrors of consumption! Her husband, though apparently broken-hearted, cannot, though probably no one will believe it—he cannot refrain from frequenting the—public-house! He pretends that his spirits are so low, so oppressed, that he requires the use of stimulating liquors! Mrs T—— made me promise this morning that I would see her coffin closed; and a small locket, containing a portion of her child's and husband's hair, placed next her heart. I nodded acquiescence, for my tongue refused me words!

10th.—I was summoned this evening to witness the exit from our world of one of the sweetest, loveliest spirits, that it was, and is, unworthy of! I was not sent for under the apprehension that her end was at hand, but on account of some painful symptoms which had manifested themselves since my visit in the morning. It was about nine o'clock when I arrived, and found her in a flow of spirits, very unexpected and unusual in her situation. Her eye was bright, and she could talk with a clearness and rapidity of utterance, to which she had long been a stranger. She told me that she had been awakened from sleep by hearing the sound of sweet singing—which, I need hardly say, was wholly imaginary. She was in a very happy frame of mind; but evidently in a state of dangerous excitement. Her sottish husband was sitting opposite the fire, his face entirely hid in his hands; and he maintained a stupid silence, undisturbed even by my entrance. Mrs T—— thanked me, in almost enthusiastic terms, for my attention to her throughout her illness, and regretted that I would not allow her to testify her sense of it, by leaving me a trifling legacy.

"George—George!" she exclaimed, with sudden and startling energy—an inspiration of tone which brought him in an instant, with an affrighted air, to the foot of the bed.

"George, I've a message from Heaven for you! Listen—God will never bless you, unless you alter your courses!" The man shrank and trembled under the scorching, burning, overpowering glance of her eye. "Come, dearest, come—Doctor—— will let you sit beside me for a few moments!" I removed, and made way for him. She clasped his hand in hers.

"Well, George, we must part!" said she, closing her eyes, and breathing fast. The husband sobbed like a child, with his face buried in his handkerchief—"Do you forgive me!" he murmured, half choked with emotion.

"Yes, God knows I do, from my heart! I forgive all the little you have ever grieved me about!"

"Oh, Jane—Jane—Jane!" groaned the man, suddenly stooping over the bed, and kissing her lips in an apparent ecstasy. He fell down on his knees, and cried bitterly.

"Rise, George, rise," said his wife, faintly. He obeyed her, and she again clasped his hand in hers.

"George, are you there—are you?" she enquired, in a voice fainter and fainter.

"Here I am, love!—oh, look on me!—look on me!" he sobbed, gazing steadily on her features. "Say once more that you forgive me! Let me hear your dear, blessed voice once again—or—or!"

"I do! Kiss me—kiss me," she murmured, almost inaudibly; and her unworthy husband kissed away the last expiring breath of one of the loveliest and most injured women, whose hearts have been broken by a husband's brutality!

12th.—This evening I looked in at the house where my late patient lay dead, for the purpose of fulfilling my promise, and seeing her locket placed near her heart, and the coffin closed. I then went into the parlour, where sat the bereaved husband, in company with his clerk, who had, ever since his engagement, shewed a deep regard and respect for Mrs T——. After I had sat some moments in their company,—

"I've something on my mind, Mr T——," said the young man with emotion, "which I shall not be happy till I've told you."

"What is it?" enquired his master, languidly.

"Do you recollect how often you used to praise my draft-copying, and wondered how I got through so much work?"

"Why, yes, d—n you, yes!" replied his master angrily; "what have you brought that up for now, eh?"

"To tell you, sir, that I did not deserve your praises"—

"Well—well—no more," interrupted his master, impatiently.

"But I must, and will tell you, that it was all done by poor Mrs T——, who learnt engrossing, and sat up whole nights together writing, that you might not lose your business, till she was nearly blinded. poor dear lady! and she would not even let me tell you! And I shall make free to tell you," continued the young man, rising, and bursting into tears,—"I shall make free to tell you, that you have behaved shamefully—brutally to her, and have broken her poor heart—you have—and God will remember you for it!"—And he left the room, and never again entered the house, the scene of his beloved mistress's martyrdom.

Mr T—— listened to all this without uttering a word—his eyes dilated—and he presently burst into a fit of loud and lamentable weeping, which lasted long after I left; and that evening he attempted to commit suicide, unable, like one before him, to endure the heavy smitings of a guilty conscience.

THOMSON'S BIRTH-PLACE.

BY DELTA.

"Is Ednam, then, so near me? I must gaze
On Thomson's cradle-spot,—as sweet a bard
As ever graced the name,—and on the scenes
That first to poetry awoke his soul."
So saying to myself, with eager step,
Down through the avenues of Sydenham,
The birth-house of the being with whose fate
Mine own is sweetly mingled, on I stray'd
In a perplexity of pleasing thoughts,
Amid the perfume of blown eglantine,
And hedge-row wild-flowers, memory conjuring up
The bright and soul-subduing lays of him,
Whose fame is with his country's being mix'd,
And cannot die;—until at length I gain'd
An opening in the road, between the stems
Of two green sycamores,—and lo! at once,
The downward country like a map unfurl'd
Before me,—pastures green,—and forests dark,—
And, in its simple quietude reveal'd,
Ednam—no more a visionary scene!

A rural church,—some scatter'd cottage roofs,
From whose secluded hearths the thin blue smoke,
Silently wreathing through the breezeless air,
Ascended, mingling with the summer sky—
A rustic bridge, mossy and weather-stain'd—

A fairy streamlet, singing to itself—
 And here and there a venerable tree
 In foliaged beauty:—of these elements,
 And only these, the simple scene was form'd.

Oft had I dream'd of Ednam, of the spot
 Where, to the light of life, the infant eye
 Of Thomson open'd; till the syllables
 Brought to my heart a vista of delight,
 A soft Elysian picture, dipp'd in hues
 Of pastoral loveliness—an atmosphere,
 Such as the wizard's wand has charm'd around
 The realm of Indolence, where every sight,
 And every sound, unto tranquillity
 Smooth'd down the ever-swelling waves of thought;—
 And oft, while o'er the Bard's harmonious page, Nature's reflected picture, I have hung
 Enchanted, wondering thoughts have cross'd my mind,
 Of his lone boyhood, and the eager thirst
 With which his opening spirit must have drank
 The shews of earth and heaven, till I have wish'd
 That on his birth-place I could gaze, and tread
 The pathways hallow'd by the feet of him
 Whose inspiration sang the Vernal morn
 With its refulgent brow; the Summer day
 Glowing and endless; the Autumnal eve
 Of mellow dye; and Winter's midnight arch
 Unclouded, paved with multitudinous stars.

Now Ednam was before me—but the thought
 Of Thomson vanish'd, nor would coalesce
 And mingle with the landscape, as the stream
 Loses itself within the summer sea;
 For why? a spell was broken; it was not
 My vision shadow'd by reality
 In lineaments harmonious, it was not
 The poet's birth-place,—earth etherealized
 And spiritual,—but quite an alien scene,
 Fair in itself, and only for itself
 To seek our praises or regard; the clue
 Of old associations was destroy'd,—
 A leaf from Fancy's volume was torn out,—
 And, as the fairy frost-work leaves the grass,
 A tract of mental Eden was laid waste,
 Never to blossom more!

Alone I stood,
 Gazing around me in the glowing light
 Of noon, while, overhead, the rapturous lark
 Soar'd as she sang, less and less visible,
 Till but a voice mid Heaven's engulfing blue.—
 Yet though the tones and smiles of Nature bade
 The heart rejoice, a shadow overpread
 My musings, and the fairy-land of thought “Melted into the light of common day.”
 A moment's look had disenchant'd years
 Of cherish'd vision; Ednam, which before
 Spoke to my spirit as a spell, was now
 The index to a code of other thoughts;
 And turning on my heel, I sigh'd to think How oft our joys depend on ignorance.

THE LAST SONG OF SAPPHO.

BY MRS HEMANS.

What is Poesy, but to create
 From overfeeling, good or ill, and aim
 At an external life beyond our fate?
 Bestowing fire from Heaven, and then, too late,
 Finding the pleasure given repaid with pain!
 And vultures to the heart of the bestower,
 Who, having lavish'd his high gift in vain,
 Lies chain'd to his lone rock by the sea shore.

BYRON'S Prophecy of Dante.

Sound on, thou dark unslumbering sea!
 My dirge is in thy moan;
 My spirit finds response in thee,
 To its own ceaseless cry—"Alone, alone!"

Yet send me back one other word,
 Ye tones that never cease!
 Oh! let your hidden leaves be stirr'd,
 And say, deep waters! can you give me peace?

Away!—my weary soul hath sought
 In vain one echoing sigh,
 One answer to consuming thought
 In human breasts—and will the wave reply?

Sound on, thou dark unslumbering sea!
 Sound in thy scorn and pride!
 I ask not, alien world! from thee,
 What my own kindred earth hath still denied!

And yet I loved that earth so well,
 With all its lovely things!
 Was it for this the death-wind fell
 On my rich lyre, and quench'd its living strings?

Let them lie silent at my feet!
 Since, broken even as they,
 The heart, whose music made them sweet,
 Hath pour'd on desert sands its wealth away.

Yet glory's light hath touch'd my name,
 The laurel wreath is mine—
 With a worn heart, a weary frame,
 O! restless Deep! I come to make them thine!

Give to that crown, that burning crown,
 Place in thy darkest hold!
 Bury my anguish, my renown,
 With hidden wrecks, lost gems, and wasted gold!

Thou sea-bird, on the billow's crest,
 Thou hast thy love, thy home!
 They wait thee in the quiet nest—
 And I—unsought, unwatch'd for—I too come!

I, with this winged nature fraught,
 These visions, brightly free,
 This boundless love, this fiery thought—
 Alone, I come! O! give me peace, dark Sea!]

THE PENITENT'S RETURN.

BY MRS HEMANS.

Can guilt or misery ever enter here ?
 Ah ! no, the spirit of domestic peace,
 Though calm and gentle as the brooding dove,
 And ever murmuring forth a quiet song,
 Guards, powerful as the sword of Cherubim,
 The hallow'd Porch. She hath a heavenly smile,
 That sinks into the sullen soul of vice,
 And wins him o'er to virtue.

WILSON.

My father's house once more,
 In its own moonlight beauty ! Yet around,
 Something, amidst the dewy calm profound,
 Broods, never mark'd before !

Is it the brooding night ?
 Is it the shivery creeping on the air,
 That makes the home, so tranquil and so fair,
 O'erwhelming to my sight ?

All solemnized it seems,
 And still'd, and darken'd in each time-worn hue,
 Since the rich clustering roses met my view,
 As now, by starry gleams.

And this high elm, where last
 I stood and linger'd—where my sisters made
 Our mother's bower—I deem'd not that it cast
 So far and dark a shade !

How spirit-like a tone
 Sighs through yon tree ! My father's place was there
 At evening-hours, while soft winds waved his hair !
 Now those grey locks are gone !

My soul grows faint with fear !
 Even as if angel-steps had mark'd the sod.
 I tremble where I move—the voice of God
 Is in the foliage here !

Is it indeed the night
 That makes my home so awful ? Faithless hearted !
 'Tis that from thine own bosom hath departed
 The in-born gladdening light !

No outward thing is changed ;
 Only the joy of purity is fled,
 And, long from Nature's melodies estranged,
 Thou hear'st their tones with dread.

Therefore, the calm abode
 By thy dark spirit is o'erhung with shade,
 And, therefore, in the leaves, the voice of God
 Makes thy sick heart afraid !

The night-flowers round that door,
 Still breathe pure fragrance on the untainted air ;
 Thou, thou alone, art worthy now no more
 To pass, and rest thee there !

And must I turn away ?
 —Hark, hark !—it is my mother's voice I hear,
 Sadder than once it seem'd—yet soft and clear—
 Doth she not seem to pray ?

My name !—I caught the sound !
 Oh ! blessed tone of love—the deep, the mild—
 Mother, my mother ! Now receive thy child, Take back the Lost and Found !

REMEMBRANCE.

MINE, Mary, thou canst never be,
 But kindly will I think of thee.
 The memory of the past shall fling
 A balm upon each bitter thought,
 And soften with its shadowy wing
 The agonies which grief hath wrought.
 I cannot, though I would, forget
 The beauty of thy youthful years,
 Ere Sorrow's bitter fountains wet
 Mine eyes with unavailing tears.
 Then we were happy ; and thy heart,
 Unused to play the mourner's part,
 Responded with a throbb divine
 To each enraptured pulse of mine.

Even when upon the boundless deep,
 My thoughts were ever turn'd on thee ;
 In vision, I beheld thee weep
 As when thou had'st adieu to me.
 Thy form has haunted still my heart,
 By starry night and gaudy day ;
 I see it in the moonbeam's start,
 I see it in the morning grey.
 Time cannot from my mind erase
 The memory of that angel face,
 Nor the corroding hand of Care
 Sweep out the thoughts imprinted there.

Let years pass on of earthly woe,
 Still thou wilt be to me for ever,
 As if Fate doom'd our barks to go
 United down Life's stormy river.
 To blot thy memory from my breast,
 Absence and Time alike hath striven ;
 Alas ! who calm on earth can rest,
 That once hath had a glimpse of Heaven !

A MODERN PYTHAGOREAN.

PARLIAMENTARY SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE business of the Houses, since the appointment of the new Ministry, has been rather of a rambling and conversational character. The Government has been wisely cautious of precipitating itself upon the important measures which it is pledged to bring forward and to support; and waits to consolidate itself before it proceeds to unsettle existing systems, in which the most important interests are concerned. There have, however, been some measures gravely proposed in the Upper House, and many matters slightly discussed in the House of Commons, upon which some remarks may not be uninteresting nor unuseful at the present moment. We shall, therefore, take a rapid glance at the more prominent matters which have occupied Parliament during the present month; and we may take this opportunity of stating, that during the current session, when parliamentary business may be expected to be of such vivid and paramount interest, we shall take a regular and methodical view of it, not only with reference to the debates, but the papers laid before the House, which frequently contain a vast quantity of important information that the kingdom in general knows nothing about, though the public pays a swinging sum for the preparation and printing of the documents.

Two parliamentary commissions, and three members of the House of Lords, are now busily employed with schemes for the reformation of the administration of the law; and it is to be hoped (unless, according to the old adage, too many cooks should spoil the broth) that we may ere long obtain some amendment of rules of law and practice so obviously contradictory to common sense, so plainly a hinderance in the way of justice, that it is only amazing that habit should have so long induced men to shut their eyes to such monstrous absurdity. We may boast of the principles of British law as much as we will; but in its details, and in its practice, it is, and must be, in the view of every man who loves truth, and plainness, and simplicity, the most revolting and ridiculous thing that can possibly be imagined. The simplest action at law is a course of lie upon lie, and fiction upon fiction, the expense enormous, and the result doubtful to the end, although the truth may be as obvious as the sun at noonday. If you go into the King's Bench with a common action, the very right of the court to try it is founded upon an assumption of that which the court knows not to be true. The declaration with which you commence must be full of lies; and when you know right well that a man has craftily and fraudulently obtained your goods, and will not give them back unless forced by the law, you are obliged to aver that you lost these goods, and that he (the defendant) casually found the same. This is only a taste of the quality of all legal proceedings. An indictment where a man is, or rather should be, solemnly charged with taking away the life of another, must, of necessity, be a hideous jargon, stuffed with gross and trifling absurdities, and altogether unintelligible to a plain English scholar. It is, therefore, no wonder that people are at last thinking of reform in the administration of the law. The difficulty of real reform, however, lies in this, that lawyers, from long habit, and because the law's intricacies put money in their pockets, are not sharp to see the absurdities which ought to be remedied; and yet none but lawyers can be intrusted to prepare the bills for the amendment of the administration of the law, because none but they can see his way through such a matter. If one unlearned in the law, should be rash enough to attempt such an amendment, he would be apt to fare no better than the sage on ship-board, who made a hole in the ship's bottom to let out the bilge water, and had the satisfaction of being drowned in clear water immediately after.

On the first of the month, Lord Wynford brought forward his bill for amending the practice of pleading—for lessening the expense of witnesses, by allowing written interrogatories to be used in law courts as they already are in courts of equity—and for giving power to judges to make security be entered into in certain cases for costs. The special pleaders say, that the bill is nonsense; but they have an interest in keeping up the abuse which the bill seeks to remedy. It is left over for future discussion, and at another time we may have something to say about it.

On the second, Lord Brougham brought forward his very important bill, for the establishment of local courts. He carefully stated, however, that it was no government measure, but one emanating from himself, as an individual member of Parliament. This was a prudent declaration, for it is the next thing to impossible that the bill, in its present state at all events, should pass into a law. Like many other of Lord Brougham's projects, the plan is bold, and the intention good, but the practical part of the matter has not been looked to with sufficient closeness, and we believe that every practical man who has examined the project, has decided that such a scheme is fit only for the imagination. That much may, and ought to be done, to reduce the wasteful and ridiculous excess of expense in law proceedings, is quite certain; but a regiment of flying courts like those proposed by Lord Brougham, is almost as wild a notion as the flying men and women of Peter Wilkins's celebrated narrative, which entertained our marvellous boyhood. Lord Brougham should have experience enough to know, that what might be a very good scheme if he had to build society anew, may be a very bad one for a community whose habits are formed, and arrangements made, in such a manner that the scheme would not fit them, unless they were totally altered. It is wise to undertake the alteration of our institutions, (so as it be done cautiously and soberly,) in order to adapt them to an altered state of society, because the matter is within our view and our power of management; but it is not within our power to alter society, so as to suit it to new institutions, which appear, to our abstract reasonings, better than those we have. In former days, when people were thinly scattered, when they themselves, as well as their laws, were more simple and natural, and when a plain story was told in a plain way, and decided without the aid of hundreds of books of law, and thousands of books of commentaries upon the law, county courts were fit for the people, and were used, but even then they did not fly about from place to place. In the present day, people are so closely locked together—everything being done by societies rather than by individuals, the various descriptions of property so much increased, and so much more difficult of definition—the quantity of rules touching the legal distribution of property in various cases increased a thousand-fold, and not possible to be known except by those who make it the study of their lives; and in addition to all this, a description of people having grown up, whose interest, and whose constant practice it is, to entangle and perplex every dispute by the application of an intricate system of laws to the circumstances of the controversy, it is supposed that none but the first judges of the land can satisfactorily preside over even the least important cause, and it is considered especially beneficial to remove it out of the way of local interests and local prepossessions, which continually operate more or less against strict justice. The people would not be satisfied with a flying tribunal, and a jury of their next door neighbours to decide their causes; nor is it likely that so very difficult a thing as the administration of our laws in civil actions, could be properly accomplished by itinerant local judges, even though a spring van were appointed to travel about with the library of the court, and lawyers should ride post, with volumes of reports and decisions stuffed in their saddle-bags.

Those who had not read the Report of the Common Law Commission would doubtless be surprised to see, by Lord Brougham's statement, how much of the litigation of the country was about paltry sums. He said, that at the Lancaster Spring Assizes of 1826, when fifty-two verdicts were given in civil cases, the average amount of each verdict was only £14, 15s. In the year 1829, out of the causes tried by the Lord Chief-Justice in London, one hundred and eighty-four were for sums under £20; three hundred and nine for sums under £50; and four hundred and six for sums under £100. In Middlesex, in the same year, three hundred and thirty-two were for sums under £30; five hundred and eighteen for sums under £50; and one third of the whole number in London and Middlesex was for sums under L.100. Now, what does all this prove? Not certainly that itinerant courts are necessary, but that there is a premium upon, an inducement to, litigation somewhere, that ought to be sought out and cut away; for who can believe that many persons, left to the calm exercise of their own judgment as men of business, would, for the settlement of a sum under L.20 or L.50, travel into Court, subject themselves to the loss of time, and the risk of defeat, and the certainty of costs beyond the amount in dispute? They do not follow their own judgment, but they are artfully led along step by step, by those persons to whom lawsuits give an inordinate profit. No doubt in many cases where the sum involved is nominally small, the interest at stake is great, and the sum put in issue, is only a criterion for the settlement of a much larger sum; and this circumstance Lord Brougham does not seem to have noticed; but still many of the actions—the greater proportion of them—are actually for small sums, and over and over again is the trite but true fable illustrated, of the disputants about the oyster, whose controversy was settled by a lawyer gobbling up the fish, and handing an empty shell to each of the parties litigant. What is required then, we humbly apprehend, is not a carrying about of our involved, intricate, twisted, unintelligible forms of enquiry and decision from door to door; but a thorough reform and simplification of the legal means of obtaining redress in WESTMINSTER HALL AND ON THE CIRCUITS; at least this is what should first be done. How disgusting it is to remember, that an attorney is permitted to charge in proportion to the number of sheets, lines, words, that his ingenuity can thrust into the papers in a cause! Which of our readers has been happy enough not to have seen an attorney's bill of costs for an action in an English court? Was there ever seen such a jargon of things unintelligible save in their expense? What a multiplicity of fees of which no plain suitor can tell the meaning or the reason! What reasonable person that has ever looked at the brief in a plain two and two affair, but must have been struck with the nonsense of so much paper, and so many words, to a matter so simple? The reason is, that the man who prepared the brief is paid according to its prolixity and consequent complexity. Then the barrister's speeches! Heaven defend us, and bless Lord Brougham for endeavouring to put some check upon this enormity! Let any one who has learned mathematics or logic, listen to any barrister making a three-hours' speech, and note down the propositions he has enunciated bearing upon the matter in hand, and compare the number of words they require, with the mass which has been uttered, making due allowance at the same time for a proper sprinkling of rhetorical flourish, and then he will see, how capitally thirty-five minutes might have done the business. By some it is contended, that a long speech is but the "menstruum," in which the precious pearl of argument is dissolved, in order that it may properly soak and saturate the minds of the judge and jury; or, that as an hostler puts chopped hay into the oats of horses who swallow too fast, this verbiage is necessary along with the argument, that the judge may leisurely chew and digest it; but this is not complimentary to the judges, and we dismiss the excuse at once. But one very principal cause of the expense is the delay. Why is this delay after the cause is ripe for trial? Because the King's Bench has more to do than it can dispatch. What is the Exchequer doing? Nothing. Why not then take your cause there? Oh! because the King's Bench is the "favourite court;" and having commenced our proceedings there, the forms of the other court are so different, that in order to get into it, we should commence de novo. How absurd is all this! Here is the evil to be remedied. Let no judges be appointed to any court, who are not competent, and then make it imperative on every suitor to have his cause tried by whatever judge of the land is at leisure to try it. When proper reforms are made in the law itself, or rather in legal practice in the highest courts, then it will be time enough to see whether tribunals must be sent round from town to town. As to sums under L.10, we see no reason why a simple and summary jurisdiction might not be given to the Court of Quarter Sessions, assisted, as in Ireland, by a barrister who might attend periodically for the purpose, and who would be well enough paid for his temporary absences from the metropolis by six or seven hundred a-year. Lord Brougham wisely proposes to try the experiment of his bill in two counties, before he carries it further. We very much doubt that his system will ever reach those two counties, and we feel quite sure that it will never go beyond them.

On the 3d, the Duke of Newcastle rose in his place, to complain to the House of the intemperate language used respecting himself by the King's Attorney-General, at an election in the principal town of the county, in which he (the Duke) is the King's Lieutenant. It is a strange thing that a man of Sir Thomas Denman's years, and experience, and character, should be so forgetful of himself, and the office which his Majesty, no doubt, with some reliance on his discretion, intrusted to him, as to allow a vulgar desire of mob applause to bear him away into expressions so unbecoming and so dangerous to the public peace. We cannot help regretting that the Duke did not bring forward his complaint in the form of a motion, which would have compelled the Attorney-General to resort to a defence different in manner from that which he is stated to have used in reply to the personal application for explanation. It may belong to a man's infirmity to be easily hurried away into passionate language, but when cooler judgment returns, candour and fairness should induce the promptest and fullest reparation. The Duke of Newcastle, however, informed the House, that "when he called for an explanation, the answer from the King's Attorney-General was neither explicit nor distinct; that he made use of all the legal sinuosities, twistings, and turnings, that could be made use of; but though it was hard to know what was meant in the answer, it was sufficient to identify the speech of the learned gentleman with the report." It does not mend the matter, that the Attorney-General put it in the power of the Lord Chancellor to make, on his part, a more explicit denial of the offensive expressions than he himself would make when applied to, nor does the excuse put forward by Earl Grey appear at all satisfactory. He stated, that "all he could then say was, that his Majesty's Attorney-General was a man who stood not only high in his estimation, but in the estimation of the whole country, as a man of great acquirements, great talent, and of the soundest principles. It was to be observed that he was at Nottingham not as an Attorney-General, but as a candidate for an election, and it was probable that he expressed himself in a manner that he thought most conducive to that end." We submit to the noble Premier, that when he next condescends to defend his Majesty's Attorney-General, something a little less resembling special pleading would be more suitable to the order to which he belongs. Sir Thomas Denman escaped for this time without any other censure than that which public opinion gives, but the lesson to observe more temperate behaviour we trust will not be lost upon him.

On the 6th, the Lord Chancellor was extremely erudite on the subject of the Regency Bill, and displayed a minute acquaintance with a portion of family history full six hundred years old. The Lords "marked, learned, and inwardly digested," but no one opened his mouth, so the House adjourned. In the Commons, the question of the ballot was introduced upon the occasion of a petition from Armagh. This is a very important question, to which an incidental notice can by no means do justice; but we may be permitted briefly to observe, that notwithstanding the refinement of argument which some able journalists have used in favour of the ballot, and which, as an abstract argument, it is not easy satisfactorily to answer, the common sense and feeling of the middle orders seem to be against its use in political matters. We think they have decided that practically the ballot would not be a good thing, and their judgment about the matter (assuming that such is their judgment) is, in our view, of more importance than the conclusion drawn from any subtle argument, which treats matters touching mind and morals, as it would matters coming within the scope of the exact sciences. There was a great deal of sound practical sense in the observation of Lord Ashurst, and with that observation we shall leave the subject for the present.

"Undue influence at elections may be gradually diminished, the evil may, to a certain extent, be remedied, but how it is to be totally eradicated, I know not. I am told that vote by ballot would effect all this, for that it would establish secrecy and security to the voter. In considering this subject, my first enquiry naturally was, how this could be proved? I must confess that I have not succeeded in this enquiry at all to my satisfaction. The assertion is everywhere made, arguments are founded upon it, but I find nothing to satisfy me that the assertion itself is well founded. The voter may conceal the actual fact of his vote at the time of delivering it, but of what avail is this secrecy, unless it be followed by security afterwards? For I can hardly call that a state of security in which a man lives as it were by a perpetual falsehood, and in continued fear, lest by a breach of confidence in some friend to whom in an unguarded moment he may have disclosed the truth, or by some other chance, the whole should come to the ear of the landlord, and his total ruin should ensue."

On the same evening was presented in the House, two scenes from a rather trifling farce, the plot of which turns upon the rival claims of the in and the ex-government, to the credit of abolishing the office of Postmaster in Ireland. It is pleasant to see Mr George Dawson and Mr Goulburn shining in a performance of this sort, so well fitted to their abilities. Seriously, we wish the House some better employment than debating upon whether one statesman or another decided upon so magnificent an act of executive authority as the abolition of a manifestly useless office which costs a few thousand pounds a-year. If the late government have no other act of economy than this to shew for themselves, it is hardly worth their while contending for it; if they have many more, they may leave this act of grace as the commencement of a stock in trade for their successors: the main thing that concerns the public is the abolition of the office, and that, it appears, at all events, is done.

On the 8th, the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave notice of his intention to move for a select committee to enquire whether any, and what, reductions ought to be made in the salaries of persons holding office under the crown, and being at the same time members of either House of Parliament. This is a matter of more importance to the Ministers themselves than to the public. It is not the salaries of ministers who really do some work for the monies they receive, that the public complains of, but it is the multiplicity of boards and offices, and the superannuations and pensions held by ignorant insolent persons, who have neither brains nor manual dexterity to transact any business, and are therefore not worth the wages of ordinary clerks. Such places are made the resource of imbecility, or the reward of infamy, more often than they are bestowed from any worthy motive, and their pride is generally in direct proportion to their helpless incapacity. But ministers say, we shall have it in our power to reduce others, when we can point to ourselves as having suffered reduction already. Be it so: we are willing to give ministers credit for their self-denying ordinances, unless, indeed, they expect to go out very soon, and wish to make these reductions for the benefit of their successors. But, after all, this rather too much resembles Mr Goulburn's fine reason for mixing up large sums with the civil list grant which did not belong to it, in order that it might not be seen how much was spent by the King. This is no time for mere prettinesses in politics: let it be plainly avowed, that those who do not work will no longer be paid; but let those whose abilities fit them for the discharge of important affairs, and who may possibly not have the advantage of a private fortune besides, be adequately paid for their services.

In a conversation which followed the notice given by Lord Althorpe, Mr John Wood of Preston, who has lately taken upon him to censure and to praise, as if he were a person of some consideration, indulged in a little severity upon Sir Robert Peel, and the right honourable baronet seemed to be perfectly astounded by the magnitude of his audacity. "That he should presume to lecture me!" said the ex-secretary. Now, there was Sir Robert's besetting sin again breaking forth. Was there any thing peculiarly atrocious in Mr John Wood lecturing Sir Robert, more than any other member? And if there was, was Sir Robert himself to be the man to put the gravamen of the offence upon that point? Could he not make little of Mr John Wood of Preston without placing the colossus of his own dignity beside him, and calling upon the House to "look on this picture, and on this?" It is a very unfortunate, and provoking thing that Sir Robert Peel, with his considerable abilities and fluent habits of discourse, will not lay aside this self-complacent manner, which is the more unpleasant from its very smoothness.

On the 8th, the Duke of Wellington in the Lords called the attention of the House to the procession of the trades, which had taken place that day, to the King's palace. The Duke appears to have considered that there was something alarming in the procession of so large a body of the common people bearing "flags and other ensigns." The Secretary of State for the Home Department, and the Lord Chancellor, whose nerves are perhaps not so sensitive as those of the Duke, though we would think the sight of masses of men bearing flags and other ensigns rather more familiar to his Grace than to the others, made rather light of the matter. The most curious thing in this affair is, that the law, as laid down from the Woolpack, was most unceremoniously contradicted by ministers in the House of Commons, who do not pretend to be lawyers at all.

The Lord Chancellor says, "Your Lordships cannot prevent people from walking in the streets; and though processions are not convenient things, you cannot prevent processions even with banners,—for processions are but long lines of people walking in one direction. The law gives you no power of prevention until there is an actual breach of the peace, or a most imminent risk of its being broken."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer says, "I am ready to admit that the procession was not strictly legal, according to the letter of the act; but the question is, whether it would not have been imprudent, rash, and ill-advised, to have prevented such a procession under such circumstances, and when the government had reason to believe that it would be conducted orderly? I know that such addresses are illegal, but the law is frequently violated with impunity."

Now, in whom are the simple to place their belief touching the law of this land? Is it possible that the Lord Chancellor of England publicly misrepresented the law in the House of Lords? And if he did not, how much is the Chancellor of the Exchequer to blame for being so positive in his error in the House of Commons?

On the 9th, Lord Wynford brought forward his important motion for a committee to enquire into the causes of the existing general distress, and to consider how far a remedy could be provided for it. At a period when the distress and discontent of the agricultural labourers of this country is so great, that outrage, unheard-of for its violence and universality, is going on, and sober-minded men seriously fear a violent breaking up of the established rights of property and relations of society, it does seem unaccountable that the government should deem it expedient, or even safe, to set their faces against such an enquiry. Yet, after hearing not only the motion, but all that was so ably urged in support of it, the Premier replied, that "in every respect he felt a great objection to the enquiry proposed, and he would not give his individual assent to it; if he opposed the proposed measure, it was solely from a sincere conviction that it could produce no good. It was acknowledged on all hands that the country presented a scene of great difficulty—how the difficulty had been produced it was not for him to say, for he was more inclined to look forward to correct the faults, than to look back to the manner in which they had been produced." Let us consider, for a moment, this language of the Prime Minister of England, and ask ourselves how it is possible that a reasonable man in such a situation could so speak. Let us put his matter into a methodical arrangement of propositions, and it will stand thus. It is acknowledged on all hands that the country presents a scene of great difficulty. Now the difficulty has been produced it is not for me to say,—that is, I cannot say how it has been produced. I will not give my individual assent to an enquiry to ascertain how it has been produced. I am more inclined to look forward to correct the faults, than to look back to the manner in which they have been produced.

Surely such a series of propositions as this, would seem to be unworthy of any man who had sufficient sense to button on his own clothes; yet they are those of the minister, allowed on all hands to be a man of first-rate ability. It is to be observed, that, in refusing to go into an enquiry of this description, Lord Grey follows the example of the Duke of Wellington, who similarly refused last session. On the present occasion, the Duke avowed his dissent from the motion, because from the extent and importance of the subjects which would have to be enquired into, it would be impossible to have such an enquiry without exciting expectations, and involving the country in difficulties and dangers ten times greater than those under which it at present suffers. This is very plain, blunt talk, and makes the Duke's opinion obvious enough; but we are at a loss for the reason that enquiry concerning the cause of the people's distress, and consideration of the best means of alleviating it, would make the difficulties and dangers ten times greater. As to "expectations," why should the people not expect? Does the Duke of Wellington or Lord Grey think that despair is preferable to expectation? Is it not monstrous, that, in a country teeming with abundance, where over-production is the cry of economists themselves, and where every man of sense and observation knows, that with our soil, rivers, seas, mines, machinery, and shipping, all the people, and twice that number, might live in comfort, not labouring above half their time—is it not monstrous, that, in consequence of some dreadful defect in our political or social arrangements, half the population is half starved, and great numbers of them roaming about like beasts of prey to take food by violence? Are we not to enquire into the cause of this shocking evil; are we not to consider the means of remedying it, and happily expectations might be created? Will the hereditary legislators of Great Britain shut their eyes in timorous hope that the danger will pass by, instead of looking at it in the face like men, and doing what is needful? Will they listen to one man telling them of the danger of examining what is the matter, and another voiding his presumptuous folly in the affected phraseology of a misnamed science, while the people are maddening around them, and while advantage is taken of their hunger by incendiary villains to drive them into open insurrection? How long will men be blind to the plain state of things? The time was when the owners of land and the manufacturers could not do without the labourers, because their assistance was necessary to obtain the produce of the ground, and to turn the raw material into manufactured goods. The labourers then had their sure hold, as well as any other class. True, all the property was in the hands of others; but then others could not use that property without the labourer's assistance; therefore they were sure of a share. In the present time, labourers have so much increased, and so much work can be done by machinery, that a large portion of them are not required by those who possess land and raw material, and such working people are left without any hold upon society at all. But is it because men of property can do without them, that they are to cast them off to perish? No. They are still a part of the society, and ought to be supported while the country affords the means. It is true, the capitalist cannot turn their labour to profitable account; but why should they therefore stand idle and starve? Their labour would support themselves if they had something upon which to apply it; and there is scarcely an acre of cultivated ground in England upon which additional labour might not be employed to a certain extent, which would produce food equal to the support of that labour. Besides, there is a vast quantity of ground not cultivated at all to which this surplus labour might be applied; and if machines have been invented, and things desirable to have can be made easier and more abundantly than before, why should it not be contrived that the people should get the benefit of such improvements, and have more than they had before, instead of wearing rags, and eating only half enough? As it is, the foreigner gets the benefit of our machinery; but our own people do not. For half the quantity of wine, or gold, or spices, or fruits, the foreigner can and does obtain as much British cotton goods as he used to do, but the man at home has nothing but his labour to give, which is rendered of no value by the very machines which make the cottons cheap, and therefore he cannot get them. Is machinery, then, to be done away with? By no means; but if we will not give the people clothing for their labour, let us give them machines to make clothing for themselves. If the means be in existence to make them comfortable, why should they not be made comfortable?

The Duke of Richmond appeared to considerable disadvantage in the debate on Lord Wynford's motion; he may shift about as he will, but if he would call to his aid the plain straight-forward honesty that he displayed last session, and the manly feeling for the suffering peasantry of England that he evinced then, he would not be driven to manœuvre his way out of such a motion as Lord Wynford's; vainly endeavouring to bear aloft the flag of consistency, while he retreated from a measure so similar to one proposed by himself last year.

In the House of Commons some questions were asked respecting the removal of the Irish Chancellor. The question had been mooted the preceding evening in the other House by Lord Farnham, when Lord Brougham, in reply, entered, for the first time, upon that style of oratory which consists in the uttering of words without saying any thing. Lord Althorpe was on this occasion rather more explicit as to the facts both of the appointment and the non-increase of expense in consequence of it, but he did not condescend to explain by what adroitness he was to pension off Sir A. Hart, at no cost to the country. The whole of the Irish legal arrangements appear to be rather disgraceful to the new ministry, and the matter has been made worse by the shuffling, undecided way in which the ministers have spoken of them in Parliament. If they must have their job, they may at least talk manfully about it, and confess they have an object in view, more important than the money which it will cost. It is ridiculous to mince and shuffle about a matter which must, sooner or later, come before the public exactly as it is.

The next evening the Lord Chancellor indulged himself in some facetiousness at the expense of Earl Stanhope. The strain in which his lordship spoke would have been more appropriate in the Lower House; and was less becoming in the Lord Chancellor, than it would have been in any other noble lord.

In the House of Commons Lord Althorpe intimated that the partnership hitherto subsisting between the Government and the Bank of England, was likely to be dissolved.

On Saturday the 11th, the House of Commons, contrary to custom, assembled, but to what good purpose did not distinctly appear. There was another conversational discussion on the Irish Union Repeal question, in favour of which, not ten men of common sense in the three kingdoms would be found to say a word. All the persons who petition about it, are poor ignorant people, whom Mr O'Connell can lead by the nose, into that or any other absurd mischievous notion, in which it is his fancy for the time to indulge.

Lord Althorpe moved for returns, which it is understood are to be used as the basis of the scheme of Parliamentary Reform which Government has in view. The returns related to the amount of population in various places. We shall say no more upon this question at present, than that the notion of founding a scale of representation upon numbers merely, is one of the most fallacious things in the world. If numbers were made the sole criterion, the three counties of Middlesex, York, and Lancaster, would return a third of the parliamentary representation of all England. There are not above half-a-dozen cities in the empire containing as many inhabitants as the single parish of Saint Mary-le-bone in Middlesex.

On the 13th, there was a very great quantity said in both Houses of Parliament. The new appointments, the pensions granted by the late government after their resignation, and various other matters interesting to the parties concerned, were discussed in the Lords. Lord Grey, with that humbleness of phrasology which aristocracy sometimes affects, alluded to a stipulation that his son should be immediately "discharged," if he did not shew himself diligent and capable in the office to which he was appointed. We have no doubt Lord Howick is quite capable of discharging the duties lately confided to Mr Horace Twiss. We have heard him, three years ago, lecture Mr Canning in the House of Commons; and as to his diligence, his sense of honesty will of course prevent him from taking a salary, if he does not go through the work, for which it is understood to be the remuneration.

In the Commons, the proceedings were of a very miscellaneous as well as important character; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer must have found his repose on Monday night particularly pleasant, after such an evening's "badgering." He was on his legs at least a dozen times, making statements and giving explanations, and as he is not a very facile speaker, the trouble to him must be the greater. A brief commentary on this evening's proceedings, would require a paper to itself. We can only say a word or two on the most prominent matters: the affairs of the West India planters underwent a discussion of some length; Mr Macauley was as usual flippant in his style, and talked considerably about the "periodicals." One would think he has enough of them, without troubling the House of Commons with them, which has not the same reason to take a lively interest in periodicals that Mr Macauley has. Sir George Murray's speech was altogether admirable;—whether we regard the soundness of the matter, or the natural and forcible eloquence of this most able man, we must always look upon him as a great credit to the representation of Scotland.

Lord Althorpe spoke decisively of the Government's intention to do nothing about the currency. Undoubtedly it is for the present the easiest course to do nothing, but how is Sir James Graham, a Cabinet Minister now, to preserve his consistency? If ever any man was pledged to try to remedy that which he has denounced as a most serious evil, Sir James is bound to do his best to overturn Sir Robert Peel's currency measures. Lord Althorpe thought proper to speak in rather a contemptuous manner of "the vague, general, and untangible allegations, of those who advocate the expediency of a small note currency." Epithets more diametrically opposite to those which truth would dictate as applicable to the arguments of those who support a well-secured paper currency, could hardly be devised.

On the 14th, the subject of tithes was discussed in the Lords, and the following remarkable avowal fell from the Bishop of London at the close of a very able speech. Speaking of the Church property he said, "that these funds might be more equally divided, he was the last man to deny, and he agreed that so far as it was consistent with the safety and stability of the Church, some such arrangement might be made. If the subject were taken up in time, with due consideration for vested rights, he was sure that the Church of England would stand, as it had stood, the admiration of Protestant Europe, and the pride of great England." Such words as these from an English Bishop—the metropolitan Bishop too! Verily these are days of Reform!

We have now arrived at the end of the Record for this month. The recess will give us time to bring up arrears, and to attend to the documents laid upon the tables of the Houses, which in this paper we have not had room nor time to consider. Never was Parliamentary business so important, or the course it will take more difficult to be anticipated. Mr Robert Grant already complains of the "premature distrust" of the new Ministers—they have indeed an unruly House to deal with, and their pledges towards popular measures, instead of being a shelter, will only make their difficulties greater. They have themselves set the tide in motion; let them stop it, if they can.

L'Enbop.

WE are sick and surly—and no wonder. The Whigs are In; and “Who, pray,” we ask ourselves in soliloquy, “brought them In?” A well-known voice replies, “Even We—Christopher North.” Yes—true it is, and of verity, that We drove that apostate and renegade Ministry Out—We—Christopher North—taking that Proper Name in its largest sense as designating all the True Tories of Great Britain. “See how Kit will trim!” (taking that Proper Name in its narrowest sense as designating the old man with the crutch) exclaimed, from a hundred holes, the Sneakers, and the Shufflers, and the Snokers, and the Scoffers, at the unhallowed hour when Wellington ordered Peel to sacrifice his principles, and was obeyed—aye to sacrifice—as the Tyrant afterwards insolently said—his political existence—which no man, we should think, can do without having previously sacrificed his personal honour. Kit did trim. He trimmed the Frigate of Athole Fir, no whit inferior to Norwood Oak, in which, for some dozen years, he had “braved the battle and the breeze;” and scorning to take in an inch of canvass, though the currents were cross, and the winds baffling, and the breakers surfing on a lee-shore, he laid the head of the NIL TIMEO right in the storm's eye, with “the silver cross to Scotland dear” flying at the main—and now, while the craft, in ludicrous alarm, are seen scudding, under bare poles, helter-skelter, for any haven, lo!

“SHE walks the waters like a thing of life,
And seems to dare the elements to strife!”

WE are sick and surly—and no wonder. The Whigs are In. But “yet there is ae comfort left”—the Traitor-Tories are Out. On the whole, therefore, sick and surly though we be, we are in better health and spirits—and more amiable—than we were a month ago; our face and forehead, our Physiognomical and Craniological Developement is like a majestic pile of frowning clouds fitfully illuminated by smiling sunshine. They lower but to lighten; and ere long our Countenance and Temples will be as the untroubled sky.

WE know and feel our strength. It lies not, like Samson's, in our hair—for we are bald—but in our brain, and in our bosom. There it burus and beats, and will henceforth, as heretofore, speak “with most miraculous organ.” Apostasy has not palsied our tongue, nor padlock'd our lips. Our garb is homely, but we are no turncoat—

“An honest man, close button'd to the chin; Broadcloth without, and a warm heart within;”

on our pou a sort of half-ahovel, half-quaker hat, a bold but not a braggart beaver, and in our paw, still pointed Whigward,

“A staff that makes them skip.”

“There is too much politics in Blackwood”—mutters some numskull. No. There has been too little—but there shall be more. All the most sacred blessings of freemen are now at stake—in danger of being beaten down by beatal feet. That many-mouthed Monster, the Swinish Multitude, erects its bristles, and grunts fiercely in the sty, pretending to be the People. The People indeed! Blaspheme them not—

“They are sprung
From earth's first blood—have titles manifold.”

And we, the Friends of the People, will uphold those titles—even while they “imagine a vain thing”—and assert—not with a sword, but a pen of steel —their true liberty and independence. The great engine now of peace and of war—of good and of evil—is the Press, and we know how to work it.

“ FALSE TRAITORS, avant ! We have marshall'd our clan—
Their pens are a thousand—their bosoms are one ! ”

The First of February shall see a Double Number of Two Hundred and Eighty victorious Pages—one half of which shall be devoted to Liberty, and one half to Literature. Not such Liberty as ye would give us—not such Literature ; but both native to our own soil and sky—racy—and to endure, like Trees, at once Forest-and-Fruit-Trees, after the rootless stumps ye would plant have rotted in their own fungous poison.

Ha ! Maga is neither sick nor surly—but healthy as Hebe still—and sweet as all the Muses. She rejoices loyally to stoop—but scorns slavishly to prostrate herself before a Hereditary and Constitutional Throne. She pays obeisance due to a time-honoured and time-honouring Nobility, but star and garter glitter in her eyes, only because they are emblems of good or great deeds done for the Land of Liberty. She venerates the Priesthood—because they being by nature but frail as their flocks—do, nevertheless, minister well at the altars of a pure religion. She admires the “ Gentlemen of England,” because they care for the People whom she loves—and she loves that People because it is writ in their annals that they have been good men and true—impatient unto the death of foreign or domestic tyranny—and the only People worthy to be called—and may they never be deluded into forgetfulness, or ingratitude to Heaven for that blessing—because they are the only People now worthy to be called—FREE.

PART I.

THE PRESENT CABINET IN RELATION TO THE TIMES.

At length, then, we have lived to see a Cabinet of Reformers! Forty years of opposition to Reform, as a fantastic speculation, through every organ of the state: and, until lately, through every mode—shape—and function of the national property; opposition, therefore, which (if any ever did) expressed the language of the national will, has at last given way. It has sunk under the combined assaults of design, concurring with accident, and the temper of the times. Yes: Reform has triumphed! and the very dust of some great statesmen, whom England once venerated, might be supposed to suffer agitation in the grave, in sympathy with this great event. Three different agencies have co-operated to so unexpected a result; the pestilent perseverance of the sincere reformers, which, by pressing the subject, has at length reached, penetrated, and mastered the passive or the neutral part of the public mind; secondly, the factious necessities of false or pretended reformers; and lastly, the quickening excitement of the late French Revolution. Messrs Hunt, Cobbett, and many others of a more literary order, who have either spoken or written with the same violence, and the same pertinacity, could not fail, at length, by mere dint of iteration, to produce some impression upon the many in every community who are nerveless in will, or unsettled in opinion. The seed sowed by them germinated powerfully under the French Revolution of July. And at length the accidental position of the party opposed to government, which stood greatly in need of some popular occasion for elevating them into power, concurred, for a moment, with the purposes of these real reformers. The indiscretion of the military Premier, who solemnly threw down the gauntlet, proclaiming as the watchword of his future government, no reform! threw open to the antagonist faction, under the temper of the times, a sudden avenue to power; but under one manifest condition—that they should adopt, as the badge and cognizance, that cause which had lent them so seasonable an aid. The existing passions of democracy adopted the sui-disant Whigs, on the understanding that the Whigs adopted them. That compact was well apprehended, and upon that the Whigs vaulted into power.

The foolish many are weak enough to imagine that Lord Grey's cabinet are unaffectedly and cordially reformers. Those who are in the secret, or have discernment enough to read what passed before their eyes, know that they would make any conceivable sacrifices to escape from their pledges. Reform they must. To that, under some interpretation, and for some extent, they are sold irretrievably. Escape, loophole, absolute evasion, they have none. Something in the shape of reform, some one or two of those changes which are within the meaning of that jealous, watching, suspecting party, which, for the moment, have lent them the popular countenance of their name and doctrine, they are under a twofold necessity to grant; the necessity of character, such character as they have, and the necessity of immediate interest. Their word is pledged on the one hand; and on the other, the storm of democratic vengeance would be far heavier upon the fraudulent traitor, than upon the frank avowed opponent. The reaction of public feeling would be tremendous against Lord Grey and his colleagues, if they were to shew any disposition to evade their engagements. And yet how, or under what modifications, is it possible that they should observe them? The contest has already become—how much shall be demanded, how little shall be conceded? The party within the Cabinet know that they are suspected; they know that the whole world of the discerning understand their situation, and are smiling at the perplexities in which a feeble instinct of conscience, and a strong one of self-interest, have concurred to involve them. Their language confesses their sense of the public suspicions; they keep exclaiming that they will convince the world that they are in earnest; knowing how ruefully they would desire to be tolerated in being in joke. Tentatively seeking to find out the very minimum of compromise which will be accepted, they would wish to disarm their vigilant overseers with a clamorous outcry that they are ready to go along with them to extremities. Almost we could pity their dilemma, were pity for the distresses of the unprincipled an allowable infirmity; for they have to deal with a faction, that, beyond all others, n'entendent pas la raillerie, gloomily and sternly keeping watch upon them, precisely understanding what they want, resolute to accept of nothing less, absolutely inaccessible to all cajolery, and upon any attempt in that direction armed and competent to let loose a storm of popular fury upon Lord Grey and his party, such as no administration has yet experienced. It is past doubting, that, by accepting a momentary strength from the reformers, Lord Grey has for ever communicated strength to them. The monstrous alliance between the government and the very refuse of the jacobin gang, may supply a momentary force to either; but in the end, and for permanent effects, it can elevate only the last. A minister who stoops to court aid from such an association, may and will give the elevating strength of respectability to them, but inevitably by degrading his ministry.

In such a contest, in such a competition for overreaching each other, between the king's ministers and a faction of disorganizers, are we the men to abet and befriend these last? We hope not. And yet, by comparison, if respect were not out of the question for either, we readily confess, that we could grant it more cheerfully to the frank and undissembling patrons of disorder, than to those who have adopted an alien cause,—fearing, hating, loathing it,—as the one sole means of scrambling into power.

Is it then certain that the present Ministers do fear, hate, and loathe the cause of reform? And secondly, is it certain that this cause is the cause of social disorganizers? We shall answer both questions firmly and distinctly.

First, for the personal question,—laying aside the general merits of reform,—are we sure, and have we convincing evidence that Lord Grey's Cabinet is only by compulsion the patron of that measure, as applied to the constitution of parliament? Is it not upon record, that, in very early life, Lord Grey himself was the originator, and even intemperate champion, of some such scheme, differing, perhaps, in its details, but going upon the same grounds, assuming the same abuses, providing the same remedies in substance, as Major Cartwright, or any later politician who has moved in that cause? The Major, no doubt, being a thoroughly honest, zealous, incorrupt man, (however wrong-headed,) and more unchecked by aristocratic prejudices, was disposed to go somewhat farther: he would wholly have annihilated the influences of property; and he would have gone the full length of universal suffrage, and even of annual parliaments. But Mr Grey, of the year 1792, was not very far from Major Cartwright's standard. Whatsoever he narrowed in the Major's sweeping plans, would very soon (and that he could not disguise from himself) have been enlarged to the most liberal expansion by a parliament framed upon his democratic constitution. Two sessions of such a Parliament would have annihilated the distinctions between him and the most revolutionary of his rivals. How, then, it will be demanded of us, should it seem so clear a certainty that Lord Grey, the peer of 1830, may not be as sincere as Mr Grey, the aristocratic commoner of 1792? As sincere, by possibility; that we can believe, though age is found to modify a man's views upon such questions. The simple and child-like Major Cartwright might be an exception; but, generally speaking, there is a wide difference between the theories of a man at the age of twenty-nine, and the same man at the age of sixty-seven, on questions affecting popular privileges. But what reason is there, we demand, in our turn, for presuming Mr Grey to have been sincere in 1792? It is a most obvious policy for a young man to court popularity for himself, and to sustain the interests of opposition for his party, by patronising measures of reform, which he is absolutely certain have no chance for success. Firmly secured in the privileges of his "order,"* those interests placed beyond hazard, he could well afford (as others have often done before and since) to offer ideal concessions, and to parade a spirit of self-sacrifice, which was sure of being called to no practical test. In reality, the Whig leaders of that day, and in particular Mr Grey, and his principal, Mr Fox, were notoriously more aristocratic, and, by temper and in manners, at least, more jealous of their patrician pretensions than Mr Pitt, the tutelar support and patron minister of the aristocracy; a spirit which, perhaps, they derived in part from their position throwing them more frequently upon the necessity of courting plebeian favour, and in part perhaps from the novelty of their own family claims. Mr Grey relied, at that era, upon three mighty antagonists, which were these, Mr Pitt, the King, and the Nation. There was no prospect at all that his own party could come into power; none therefore that they could be summoned to give effect to their theories. England was for them a pure Utopia or Laputa, in which they might safely indulge any excess of speculation, because their chance was so little of having any opportunity, in that reign, for acting or legislating upon the wild schemes they threw out, that it was hardly possible to charge them even with exciting unreasonable expectations. None at all were excited in any quarter; their own exclusion from office seemed very probably commensurate with that reign and that war. Secondly, even on the slender contingency of their acceding to office, the sovereign was known to be of a temper that would tolerate no innovations in that direction. And lastly, which was a barrier still more insurmountable, the spirit of the nation, in those years, and the all but universal hostility to innovating doctrines, was an absolute guarantee that the constitution of the House of Commons would remain unaltered. With this triple security, fenced in this impregnable manner by his very antagonists, Mr Grey might safely indulge himself in a young man's license; nor was it even necessary that he should question his conscience very severely upon the exact measure of his own sincerity.

That was the state of things in 1792. At present, how immeasurable are the changes that have been wrought in the whole condition of society; and, above all, in such of its aspects as bear upon this particular question! What was then the most romantic of chimeras, is now bare fact, and matter of absolute practice. What was pure jest, has become the most earnest of realities. And the mere vision of youthful speculators, indulged by the minister with one night's discussion in each lustrum, as a theme for academic rhetoric, is now entered upon the minister's note-book, as the most imperative, and the most immediate of the necessities which he has to meet in the public service. Trifling is past—the dallying and toying of youthful fancy is at an end. Instant ratification of engagements, absolute performance, that is now demanded loudly—sternly—inexorably. And what is Lord Grey's present disposition? It is possible that, in 1792, he was cordial with respect to reform, for the very reason, that circumstances made it impossible for him to be entirely sincere; now, the case is exactly reversed—circumstances oblige him to be sincere; and for that very reason, if there were no other, it is impossible that he should be cordial. A proposition, which cannot be other than a fanciful exercise for the talents, it is very natural that an advocate should seriously take to his heart. That same proposition, when it is extorted from the mere necessity of his situation, it is not possible but he must abhor, if otherwise even he were disposed to it. But we know that Lord Grey is not favourably disposed to it. Upon this there can be no deception, except for those who wilfully court it. We all know, that he has stood forward as the volunteer champion of his "order." The occasions on which he has done this are memorable. And what measure is there, which, by a thousand degrees, could so much affect his order as a measure of reform in the structure of the House of Commons—that sort of reform which is contemplated, less than which will not be accepted by the people, under the guidance which has now gained the mastery? Extensive changes might be borne in the composition of the House—they might leave the aristocratic influence unaffected for the present—and would be chiefly ominous, as paving the way for other changes, by increasing the popular infusion into the deliberations of the House, and throwing an overbalance into the democratic scale. For example, the thirty-six new members for the leading commercial towns would so far present neither an unbecoming nor a dangerous innovation, except in as far as this addition gave a precedent of revolution, and as one means, amongst others, of securing its democratic tendency in future; the commercial and moneyed interest being naturally opposed to the territorial and aristocratic. But thus far the effect would be limited; and that change, therefore, is the least of what is meditated. Violent and radical alteration in the electoral body, sweeping changes in the very constitution of the elective franchise, these are what the reformers demand; these are what Lord Grey and his cabinet are understood, and secretly understand themselves, to be pledged to; these are what, under the sheltering ambiguities of language, they have for the occasion countenanced; and these are what, in the end, they will seek to evade, or will most reluctantly fulfil. To a man who has not considered the subject, it may seem but a trivial or merely personal change, that borough influence should be abolished. The highest effect that it can work, may seem, probably, to him no more than the destruction of some family importance, or perhaps (in the event of no adequate indemnification being yielded by the nation) the sudden dissolution of some fluctuating wealth. But Lord Grey knows better than that. He is aware that every part of his order—those who have, and those who have not, borough property; nay, the whole of the landed aristocracy, and eventually, we may add, the whole property of the kingdom, will be neutralized as political powers in the state, by the abolition of borough influence. It matters not, for this view of the case, that no more than a couple of hundreds, suppose, of aristocratic proprietors, were the actual depositaries and virtual exercisers of the elective privileges which determined the composition of a large proportion of the House of Commons. They were in the nature of trustees for their whole body; for they could not wield their privilege so as not to favour the influence of property.

* Mr Grey's family did not then belong to the peerage, but was sure of rising to it on a favourable position of parties.

Property, and the aristocracy as the fixed and abiding possessors of property, and as the representative guardians of the stationary and conservative interest in each nation, in opposition to the terra filii and the innovating interest,—through Parliament only—through the legislation of the land—and by no imaginable substitution, for that mode of influence upon the national councils, obtain their legitimate political weight. Deny to property this sort of weight, and, for any thing that appears, this degree, and there needs no Harrington to shew us that the natural political balance is overthrown. That wise speculator has demonstrated, (if such a word can enter into politics,) that naturally and regularly the balance of power must follow the balance of permanent and abiding property; that the institutions of a country should, therefore, be so framed as to provide an opening for its influence, and to favour its natural functions; and that, wheresoever this object has been lost sight of, and the laws or political institutions have taken the course of thwarting this original function and tendency of property, in that case the true equipoise of power is disturbed, and civil dangers and irregularities without end are invited, in order to retrieve indirectly what has been lost by positive ordinance. The British aristocracy have hitherto secured their just weight in the country, by such an influence in the House of Commons, as, whilst nominally irregular, opened a channel for the healthy (and virtually constitutional) functions of property. The change which is contemplated in borough property, will apply a remedy to a mere ideal grievance, an irregularity which existed only in the name, whilst it will and must inflict the deadliest wound upon the spirit of the constitution, by defeating the natural influences of property. This, of itself, would be to offer a bounty upon some irregular erection of an extra-parliamentary influence, which, in any shape which it can take, must involve the anarchy of rival powers struggling for supremacy. But if we suppose a state of things in which the property of the land would quietly retire from the contest, a result would follow even more terrific. People are apt to imagine to themselves a reformed House of Commons, exhibiting the same dispassionate temperance, good sense, and sobriety, as that which we have at present, and differing only by reflecting more powerfully and sensibly the state of feeling and opinion in the respectable middle classes. "Middle classes" is a vague and most latitudinarian term: what are called the middle classes of society, comprehend orders of people that differ most essentially in manners, education, political sympathies, and the power of self-control. Under any of the schemes now contemplated for giving effect to reform, the House of Commons would be elected chiefly by a class much below what is often understood by the middle rank: and in that class, moving upon their own interest, and controlled by no interest of property, hardly any qualifications in a candidate would be regarded for a moment but those for conciliating immediate effect to the instructions (whatever they might be) of his constituents. For be it recollected by the way, that when the strong resistance of property was withdrawn, the relations of dependency between the constituency as master in the last resort, and the representative as servile agent, or attorney, would be drawn continually sharper and more defined. It demands a virtuous and self-controlling electoral body, spontaneously to concede a liberal indulgence to conscientious scruples, and to forego the power which is theirs in possession. The lower orders, therefore, the democratic part αὐτὸ ἄρχον of the democracy, will, upon this ground, speak directly through their organs in the House, with an overwhelming authority of voice. But were it otherwise, and supposing the old relations of independence and a liberal discretion of judgment maintained between the electors and their representatives, still—considering the sort of qualities which would guide their choice, the showy revolutionary kind of merit which would ensure their preference, and the entire absence of a controlling, thwarting, or balancing influence in the Legislative Body, from any of the old combinations of hereditary wealth, we may rest satisfied of this—that the composition of the House itself, apart from all undue influence of the electors (which yet in a reformed House of Commons, and biennial or even triennial parliaments, could not fail to be excessive), would ensure the prevalence of a most revolutionary temper. All those phenomena would develop themselves in such a senate, which are found to characterise mobs. Servile as it must be by interest to the mob, why should it not reflect as in a mirror the qualities and habits of a mob? Sudden and hasty resolutions, violent resolutions, judgments formed upon first appearances or the fallacious surface of the case, consequently abrupt changes of policy, contradictory measures, and reckless abandonments of pledges—[for in all extended bases of popular rule, where personal guarantees are out of the question, and disgrace is annihilated by infinite subdivision, measures are abandoned without shame, as they were undertaken without responsibility;—such are the features of mob counsels, and these would be the earliest characteristics of a House of Commons modelled upon the popular taste. For what qualities would it be chosen? For talent, and for effective violence; talent of a peculiar and exclusive kind, rarely found in connexion with legislative wisdom, and violence that acknowledges no restraint of decorum, justice, moderation, or modest doubt? What were the qualifications which lately pointed out Mr Brougham to the popular favour, and recommended him to the plebeian majority amongst the Yorkshire electors? Not the fine understanding, expansive statesmanship, and gorgeous eloquence of an Edmund Burke—no, but far cheaper, commoner, and more apprehensible qualities; his sycophants, and many of his feeble opponents, styled them transcendent: since Mr Pitt's time, that has been the Parliamentary word; but, properly speaking, they were these—a plain, but, for its range, a vigorous understanding, that bled no refinements, nor much apprehended them; an ornamented but forcible delivery; great fluency, and an impressive utterance; moral courage that shrank from no odium, welcomed opposition, and for a sufficient interest defied public opinion; arrogance, wherever arrogance was likely to be tolerated; humility, where humility could be useful; and finally, which more than all beside armed him for the service of a populace, a natural infirmity of overmastering violence of temper, womanish weakness, that for his purposes was often a crown of strength, and whilst it called burning blushes upon the cheeks of his judicious friends, met the cravings of plebeian malice with the most abundant gratification. This was what drew honour and support to Mr Brougham from the lowest of the middle classes. Confidence he had not: too often he had forsaken the expectations of his natural party by sudden and astounding acts of desertion; and therefore, in the classification of reformers, when characterising the quality and tendencies of the politics professed by public men, he was noted as "incapable," "doubtful," "not to be counted on." But for one thing he was relied on: the virulence of public feeling, and the positions of party questions, occasionally demanded that some great man should "have a dressing" (to use a slang phrase); and in such cases the passions of the democracy turned with eager expectation to Mr Brougham. He was their lancer—their scourge-bearer: and whether it were a foreign king, some autocrat of Russia or the Peninsula, who had made himself a mark for the hatred of liberals by the austerity with which he supported the privileges of monarchs against republican innovations; or were it a king at home, who kindled the fury of his plebeian subjects by claiming that right which the very lowest arrogated amongst themselves, of exposing or putting away a most profligate wife when she had wilfully refused the merciful compromise which was proposed to her; or were it an honest prince, who gave an extended credit to the charges against this modern Mesalina, by the frank expression of his manly and impartial opinion; or the same prince who offered a centre, in his own person, to the struggles of a constitutional party against the pro-Catholic violators of those sacred pledges, in which our ancestors had been sponsors for their posterity; or were it a lord steward of the king's household, who had failed to render homage to the majesty of the Commons, simply through the necessities of his office; in any of these cases, where, to a generous or high-bred man, there would have been a protection almost insurmountable in that elevation of rank which denied the possibility of retort, or of notice upon equal terms, Mr

Brougham sprang forward, with a chivalrous malignity, to the service of plebeian wrath. The hoarded spite which, in so large a multitude of minds, hungered and thirsted for utterance, but either wanted the gift of adequate expression, (as in most cases,) or, at any rate, wanted the vantage ground of commanding station to make itself audible through the empire, (as in all cases,) found in him an organ that corresponded to the fulness of its demands. One might see the brooding vulgar, on such occasions, anticipating their gratification; and, when it arrived, absolutely writhing with ecstasy, as this faithful servant of their vindictive appetites put in his blows, and following, with gestures of triumphant sympathy, "the hits—the palpable hits," which he delivered.

These outlines of a character somewhat singular, as regards the generation that is past, would cease to be so for the next. Mr Brougham, we must recollect, Mohawk as he shewed himself upon suitable excitement, was still modified and checked, unconsciously to himself, by the spirit of the assembly in which he acted. The present constitution of that body secures a very preponderating infusion of the high-bred courtesies and the sobriety of demeanour which distinguish British gentlemen. But, on its new model, adjusted to a democratic standard of plain-speaking and ferocious insolence, these temperaments and restraints would disappear; the very rules of the House would bend to the altered spirit of the members; and a Kentucky violence, and savage license of tongue, would mark the character of debate.

In these "reforms" of the House of Commons, the electors and the elected would act and react upon each other. Property having once retired, or being forcibly repelled, from its appropriate and constitutional influence, the very widest basis of democracy having succeeded to that presiding authority, those qualities would be invited to the representation (as we have now been attempting to illustrate) which would minister in the second place to the supposed interest of the people, but, in the first place, to its passions. Talent, therefore, of a particular description, would be all in all; talent for public speaking and for managing a debate, of course, but that would not be enough; talent for exciting, training, governing, and serving the mob appetites of revenge, cupidity, and levelling spoliation, now turned loose upon the field of national property, would be the paramount qualification for public service. Needy men, with this one accomplishment, in connexion with that of ready rhetoric, profligate fortune-hunters with these shewy pretensions in their hands, would then domineer upon the hustings. But why? it may be asked. If property as property, if birth as birth, would no longer avail their possessors, still, in combination with the requisite talents, would they not have, at least, a parity of advantage? We answer—No; because, to an excited state of the democratic spirit, all aristocratic privileges are offensive; because, with an equal relative amount of talent amongst the rich and high-born, the positive amount must be far less in classes comparatively so narrow; but, lastly, upon the much more powerful argument of the inertia, which, in all communities, is associated with hereditary right, and with property protected by law, matched against the vivacity and the subtle activities of needy talent, needing to be protected by itself. Everywhere, in this world, the instincts of preservation are weak compared with those of creation. Hence, it will follow, that men of the conservative interest will be almost excluded from the hustings. They will come forward with too many inherent disadvantages, as the party who have every thing to fear, and very little to hope; with too many public discouragements, as a class envied and hated; and in too helpless a minority to redress themselves by combination.

Indigent talent, thus giving the tone within the senate and to the legislation of the country, lending and receiving democratic excitement, will reciprocally encourage their constituents to new manifestations of revolutionary audacity. No man can even calculate the steps by which this spirit will develop itself, or the rapidity of its growth; for at the end of one five years, the very same man would look back upon that as a timid expression of innovating desires, which, at its beginning, he would have pronounced impossible. The old sentiment of "Tempora mutantur, et nos mutamur in illis," true for every kind of vicious progress, is never more true than when applied to the advancement of political disorganization. Men know not of what they are capable—changing with the changes of all about them, they are carried forward from stage to stage, until, by a succession of ascents imperceptible in its several moments, (to use the mechanical term,) they take their station of survey from a level at which those very objects seem near and accessible to their grasp, which once were seen at an aerial altitude above them. The extinction of the national debt, the confiscation of church property, the abolition of the hereditary branch of the legislature, with other measures of sweeping spoliation and revolution—these are not meditated at this hour except by some ultra reformers, nor amongst those even are they avowed distinctly; and in public it would be most premature to hint at such things. As yet the ice has hardly been broken on those speculations; and to the general mind they are still entirely unfamiliarized by the press. But we have memorable and urgent evidences before us—that the transition is accomplished, in no very formidable lapse of time, from utter and contemptuous abhorrence to a consecrated place amongst the privileged opinions of the state. Not many years are gone, those were then amongst the living who are yet but children, when such was the credit of reformers, that if, by accident, a person of that description called at the house of a gentleman, his butler failed not to count the spoons upon his departure. Now we all see him sitting on the Treasury bench; and the best of us would do well to revise his words in speaking of so respectable a personage. Not to look so far from home as the course of the early French revolution, which in three years advanced to a stage of exalted frenzy that was at first quite as little within the contemplation of the guilty actors as of the innocent victims, we have an instance in the successive pretensions of the Irish

Papists—how inevitably people are carried forward by those very successes, which (as redressing their original complaints) should naturally have brought them to a pause. Whatever may be thought of some one or two far-looking intriguers, it is certain that the great body of the Papists are not to be regarded as prudentially keeping back their claims, and developing them by fine degrees according to the advantages of their situation, but as sincerely and unconsciously enlarging their horizon upon each successive ascent which they attained. To keep a school, to inherit property, to sit upon juries, to give a vote for members of parliament—these concessions for many years bounded their ambition. But at length, so much had these changes altered the level from which they took their estimate of things, that they seriously looked upon all they had gained as trivial advances—they claimed universal liberation from civil restrictions and disabilities; and instead of suing for license to participate as electors of the legislative body, demanded to be themselves elected as legislators. Successive enlargements of privilege, indeed, or of unprincipled licence, operate not merely upon the conscious policy and cunning of the party interested as so many evidences and exponents of the yielding temper and facility of the conceder, but still more extensively, and even unconsciously to himself, they operate upon his own appreciation of himself, and upon his private standard of right. He finds himself, at the end of a few brief years, contemplating a class of questions with calmness or complacency, which, in the commencement of that era, he had either looked down upon with pity as visionary, or had looked away from with horror as detestable. This has happened even in cases left to their own unassisted operation upon the mind; much more in those pushed on by the furious agitation of the press. For this tremendous instrument has a double action in such situations, not merely by argument, which may chance to weigh only with the friendly or the neutral; but also by the moulding of habits, and by familiarizing the mind with the daily prospect of the last extremities, in which view it includes within its agency even the resisting and the hostile.

With so many examples of the changes, sensible or insensible, wrought in men's minds, or in the attitude of particular questions; with this near remembrance also of so inconceivable a change wrought in behalf of the Reformers themselves; no prudent man will venture to predict the extent of changes which might be expected to follow in every member, organ, function of the state, instantly or derivatively, upon a reform in the constitution of Parliament. Changes will follow that are not so much as dreamed of yet, in addition to others that are not yet openly avowed. What limit, indeed, will a wise man assign to a career of revolution, whose very overture commences with a measure liable to this brief analysis—an analysis that we challenge all reformers collectively to shake—that in one single act [the abolition of borough influence] it transfers the power of legislation, total, unbroken, undivided, into the hands of the democracy? Differences of opinion have prevailed as to the amount of power constitutionally due to the aristocracy, or actually possessed by the aristocracy. But we presume that nobody will justify, upon principle, the stripping that body of all power—direct or indirect, formal or virtual. Yet this is the inevitable result of the measure patronised by Lord Grey, if it is to realize the expectations he has encouraged. His own order will be the very earliest sacrifice. Ipso facto, indeed, it is sacrificed substantially by any measure which robs that order of its influence in the effective chamber of the legislature; but what we mean in this particular sentence is—that Lord Grey's order will be sacrificed also, formally, and as a separate branch of the legislature. The very same preliminary step will be taken in this respect by the new-modelled House of Commons, as by the House of Commons of the period of 1650, and for the very same reason—viz. to rid themselves, when substantially possessed of the entire political power, of the formal encumbrance involved in so dilatory and superfluous a machinery.

Can it be supposed that Lord Grey is unaware of these probable results? We must distinguish. He trusts, in the first place, to time, which may give him the benefit of some plausible pretext for entire evasion. If none should offer, he then relies upon a fraudulent performance of his contract—which, by some specious concessions of form, may stop short of the actual surrender which is understood, meant, and demanded. Nominal and formal concessions, involving no real transfer of power, like all hollow substitutions of words for things, will satisfy ninety-nine men in a hundred; but the hundredth will detect the fallacy, and then expose it to the foolish ninety-and-nine. Thus far there can be no doubt that Lord Grey understands his situation and its difficulties. That he does not understand the total tendency of reform, we think equally probable. The very men, now walking about amongst us as quiet fellow-citizens, who will compose that “reformed” House of Commons, do not themselves foresee or understand, nor would they at present own as possible developments in their own capacities of evil, those fierce appetites of disorganizing fury which the actual possession of the disorganizing power will first engender within them. Not a man of them but would smile, as at a romantic extravaganza or malignant caricature, could any power of anticipation present him with his own faithful portrait as an acting senator under his revolutionary commission. As yet he is not incarnated, as it were, in the fleshly robe of his new functions; and he knows not the amount of temptation to which that flesh is heir. People confide in the sobriety of the national character. But no guarantee of that sort, liable, besides, to continual over-rulings of individual temperament, can, in any number of men, avail against strong temptation and permanent opportunities.

No man ever yet was, no man ever will be, faithful to a trust imposing obligations so imperfectly determined as all political obligations must be, in their very nature under the large latitude of human opinions in those matters, after an immoderate access of power has been thrown into the class which he represents, and when a sort of bribe is held out to revolutionary movements as the best chance for forestalling a movement of the same character upon a more destructive scale. For it is the prevailing doctrine at this moment, that what is called reform, which, in the shape chiefly designed, is the most fundamental revolution that could be comprehended in any one act, is at this moment necessary to prevent the more open and flagrant revolution that manifests itself by sanguinary civil confusions. "Reform," says the fashionable slang, "that we may prevent a revolution." And reform is to effect this in two ways: by strengthening the weak parts of the constitution, and by conciliating its enemies. As if (for the first purpose) the way to restore a function, lost or impaired, were—to annihilate an organ; or (for the second), in order to conciliate the enemies of the constitution, that is, we presume, the enemies of the aristocracy, the natural and reasonable course were—to load them with power, and violently to tempt them to its abuse. But such is the doctrine: and there is no reason to think that Lord Grey violently regrets it. Not only does every man seek to reconcile his necessities with his choice, to find a motive of civil prudence for doing that which, after all, he must do; but, for Lord Grey in particular, he has a separate and peculiar reason, available even if he were not in office, for seeking the countenance of sober discretion, and of disinterested wisdom, to some practicable scheme of reform in Parliament. That reason arises out of his past life. The most conspicuous act (as an independent act) of his long political career, though moving in such eventful times, has been a proposition of that nature. Nothing more important will be recorded of him through a period of forty years. Now, on principles of human nature, from weakness not more than from the aspirations of an honourable ambition, it must be desirable for Lord Grey that a justification for himself in this particular, should be found, in the circumstances of the times, beyond what a mere partisan would require. He must wish to set himself right with posterity as, in this celebrated proposition of his youth, a discerning patriot; as one who saw, at a very early period, the tendencies of things, and sought to control them into a constitutional direction, by meeting them from afar with anticipating provisions, rather than as one distinguished for his zealotry in the cause of Whiggism, and who aimed at no capital object beyond that of harassing or annoying a hostile minister. Hence, and not merely for the sake of consistency, but to reflect back upon his whole life a new interpretation, and to give to its principal act a sagacious meaning, pointing to aspects which are only now evolving themselves, Lord Grey would be delighted to devise a scheme of reform that, in the latest measures of his political life, should reveal, with slight differences, the earliest, and should thus harmonize the close and the commencement of his course.

For such reasons, and with so strong temptation, gladly would Lord Grey find that repose and hope, or even those corrigible tendencies, in the ascendant plans of reform—which (as we repeat) he all but knows to be impossible. Knowing that, or but suspecting it, why did he accept power? This question we shall answer very briefly. Perhaps he was aware that, in contempt of him or any other individual whatever, so headlong is the present tendency of society in England, under the combined efforts of a traitorous press and a band of reformers, who, by comparison with that press, must almost appear honest patriots; and (speaking to the accidents of the immediate year) under the overwhelming irritation of the stupendous convulsions on the continent, so perfect and mature is the understanding amongst the moving forces of the democracy,—so mighty their means, so peremptory and absolute their demand, that reform—and of a desperate nature—cannot long be evaded. True; thinking thus, much we fear that he thought rightly; he discerned the awful temper of the times, and did justice to the impending fatality. Reform, and of that character which the radical reformers call for, will be had ; this most unwillingly we believe. Our faith is—that, under a prince of perhaps little personal determination of character, and those parties dissolved by Mr Canning's fatal intrigues, which were indispensable for the support even of a much firmer sovereign ; with all domestic barriers shattered ; and from abroad, in every quarter of the compass,—east and west, north and south,—one whirlwind of tempestuous anarchy wrapping us around in a cloud of contagious sympathy, personal checks are become ridiculous ; even the formidable name of Mr Pitt would be but as a bulrush against a monsoon : and England, it is fated, shall be given up at last to the experiments of those Jacobinical innovators whom for forty years she had succeeded in baffling. Such is our faith : and that will acquit Lord Grey of having substantially caused the crisis which he has sanctioned. By this monstrous alliance of the government with the cause and interests of the reformers, we believe that he has, after all, done no more than accelerate a movement which the tide of affairs was but too vehemently hurrying forward. Yet, with this equity of allowance for Lord Grey, can any candour exculpate him in thus impressing the official countenance and seal of the British government, and the attestation (though a subordinate matter) even of his own venerable age and respectable character, upon the general name—cause—and doctrine of reform,—without distinction of modes, plans, purposes, or political alliances ? Decorum even forbade this in any case ; and supposing the creeds and motives of reformers to be all pure and without alloy, surely it is not becoming in the executive authority of a state to proclaim the practical constitution which it administers, and has long administered, as essentially corrupt. But a far higher principle of action than any which decorum can furnish, forbids us to sanction innovations which we do not approve (especially of so indiscriminate a character)—even under a more absolute assurance that these innovations must at all events take effect, than any which Lord Grey can plead. That plea, therefore, cannot be received as valid, which would rest the Premier's defence upon this total independency of reform upon his concurrence. Perhaps then, secondly, his friends will do well to rely upon a more human and less pretending apology, viz. that he felt his right, after a long life with few of the ordinary rewards from place or power, to make good his title and his sudden opportunity as a candidate of old standing, and foremost pretensions for the dignity of Prime Minister ;—that, in giving effect to this title, he found himself thwarted, and the duration of his power, for so much as a single week, endangered by the unprincipled menaces of a first-rate intriguer ; and that he yielded the cause of reform, not to the party outside, but to the aspiring candidate within ; and that upon that intriguer devolves the entire burden of the responsibility which settles so heavily upon that head which first made Reform a Cabinet concern.

So be it ! and this draws off our attention from Lord Grey to Lord Brougham. If the first, as we began by arguing, be an insincere friend to Reform, surely (it will be said) the other is not : One real patron of that measure, at least, will vindicate the Cabinet from absolute hypocrisy. So it is thought. And, as we are now considering the Cabinet simply in relation to the times, and to that one absorbing interest of the times which allows no account or place to any other, we shall wind up our present survey with one overwhelming statement, to which no attention has been drawn, and which places Lord Brougham's character, and the sincerity of the existing administration, so far as it may be gathered from the position of its presiding members, beyond all further question. The memorable intrigue of Lord Brougham for securing the triumph of his personal ambition, and for visiting with condign punishment the insult offered to him in pressing upon his acceptance places below that which he now holds, all this has been amply exposed in the journals of the day. Justice has been done also to the character of this Cabinet, as beyond comparison, and amongst multiplied professions (partly volunteer, partly extorted) of economy, retrenchment, and pure hands, the most distinguished dealer in jobs upon record.* But what we are now going to call forward into public notice, has totally escaped animadversion: and we shall not weaken the impression of our statement by one word of comment: the memorable fact we would recommend to our readers' attention is this:

Lord Brougham took up the question of Reform in Parliament on a sort of compulsion, after long dallying throughout his political life, and (as we have good reason for believing) with great reluctance, and with as hollow a spirit of insincerity in taking it up as in laying it down. He took it up from the necessities of his Yorkshire connexion, and in submission to the pledges which were then racked out of him. He declared that he would never renounce it; and in any case, to have slipped out of his obligation by delegating it to others, would have been a jesuitical evasion. A conscientious delegation cannot be executed in a sudden verbal conveyance of such a trust to another, or others, who have themselves no security that they shall ever be in a situation to do it justice. He, the original undertaker, was solemnly retiring for ever from that House in which only he ever could discharge his engagement. So much has been noticed by the journals.

What we would now bring forward to light is this:—On accepting the seals, Lord Brougham declared, and he has reduplicated this assurance, that he had not taken office, or countenanced any belief that he ever would take office, until after a most solemn condition yielded by the Premier that his Cabinet should apply their united strength and influence to this measure. Reform, in short, that measure which Mr Brougham twice opened in the House of Commons, that measure, we repeat, and not some one of a thousand possible schemes pretending to the same verbal title, was secured, pledged, fastened upon the Cabinet. Now, hear; two days after this, Lord Grey declared in the House of Lords, that a measure of Reform, some measure or other was determined on; but so far from this being the measure, that identical scheme, or necessarily any likeness of that scheme meditated by Mr H. Brougham on the two memorable days of Nov. 1830, that Lord Grey begged he might not be pressed upon the nature of the scheme, on this particular ground—that none at all was yet arranged; no scheme of reform had been yet distinctly contemplated; nor any outline of it adopted by the New Cabinet, or so much as proposed!

Yes! the die is cast! Great times are at hand, times of confusion, which hereafter may leave any of us but little leisure or motive to enquire after the individual defaulter whose criminal intrigues have precipitated, if they have not occasioned, the revolutions which impend. The King's government have adopted the reformers; and upon that rock the reformers will build their church. Their cause is now safe, placed beyond the possibilities of final defeat, liable no longer to the fears of the desponding, and transcending even the recent hopes of the visionary. Things have remotely and indistinctly tended to this issue for some few rapid years: private ambition has concurred in a most remarkable manner with great national events: tendencies have been suddenly developed in the composition of society, and the temper of the public mind, which have latterly left few doubts for the discerning that all things, whether in the chapter of accident or design, were gradually co-operating to the ultimate triumph of reform: of that cause, in short, which, through the entire last generation, and so long as war presided over the prospects of mankind, was of all political speculations the lowest, least hopeful, most abject, and disreputable. Under what necessity of party purposes, sudden—instant—critical—these tendencies have been ripened or crudely forced into maturity, and by whom, may, in a few short years, by comparison with the tumultuous interests that are on the point of unfolding themselves, become a very secondary question. For us, of this day, among personal questions, it is not so. It is singular and memorable, that two individuals, among the shewy intriguers of the day, two Parliamentary leaders, differing much in the quality of their accomplishments, and agreeing in little else than laxity of principle, have become unintentionally the two main personal instruments; whilst looking only to their private ambition for hastening forward the present unparalleled crisis, and maturing the preparatory stage which we have reached already. These two persons were Mr Canning and Mr Brougham. Both were accidentally reduced to the dire alternative of sacrificing their honour and professions on the one hand, or their dearest ambition on the other. For both there was the same appalling dilemma; for both the same exquisite temptation. Mr Canning in one hour renounced the principles of his whole life, and for the sake of a glittering distinction, (which he was destined to hold only for a few weeks,) descended to one of the worst of coalitions, actually courting the alliance of that man who had prayed that he might be known to posterity as the enemy of the great anti-jacobin minister, whom Mr Canning himself almost literally worshipped as his guide and patron. By this act he dissolved, or confounded all party divisions; and by this first and general apostacy, annihilated all those bulwarks which might else have availed us against the second, and more special apostacy, in the matter of the Catholic relief bill. These great scenes of trial and temptation ended in shaking most public men, both in their party connexions and in their political principles; and furnished, undoubtedly, the first great stage of preparation for the present reforming (or, strictly speaking, revolutionary) frenzy. In Mr Canning, the dereliction of principle was more marked and noticed, simply because he had, and was reputed to have, more principle. Mr Brougham had always made it understood that his opinions and his party adhesions were fluctuating and uncertain. Else, for the individual question at issue—for its extent and for the degree which it was certain of suffering by Mr Brougham's virtual renunciation of it at that crisis, under those circumstances, and above all, in its first agonies of parliamentary birth,—there can be no doubt that the perfidy of Mr Brougham is greater—more unequivocal—and more redundantly hypocritical, than that of Mr Canning. This latter was accustomed to say, that not himself went over to the Anti-Pitt faction, but that faction to him. And perhaps the profligacy of any possible alliance being once allowed for, that was in some measure true. But for Lord Brougham, the betrayer of Mr Brougham's pledges, there exists no such palliation. Mr Brougham, twice, and with circumstances of memorable solemnity, bound himself under the eyes of the whole nation, looking on with attention, to the zealous prosecution of a known public question. Lord Brougham renounced the personal support of that same question, upon this ground, that all his demands on behalf of the people were conceded by the king's official advisers; that the question was now in hands the very same as his own, for its particular shape and management, but in hands far stronger than his own for its prospects of success.

No part of this was true: No shadow of this could, by Lord Brougham, be believed to be true. Government, having told the public, could not have concealed from him—their colleague—that they had as yet framed no plan at all. Consequently, whether any, which eventually they designed to frame, would in one atom of its provisions approximate to that plan of Mr Brougham's, which was so solemnly adjourned in the House of Commons to the 25th of November, and afterwards so perfidiously abandoned,—this question no human being could at that time answer, or can yet answer. What was Mr Brougham's own plan for that, Lord Brougham was a satisfactory guarantee. What will be Lord Grey's plan, whose vicarious merits were at once to indemnify the nation—to reconcile Mr Brougham's Yorkshire constituents—and to justify Lord Brougham's secession from the arena of his volunteer engagements, Lord Grey must naturally be the first man to know; and as yet he has declared himself ignorant.

This astonishing self-contradiction on the part of Lord Brougham has not been noticed by anybody.* The mere blank impossibility that he could have made over his popular schemes to government, reposing upon substitutions of theirs which are not yet developed even to themselves, seems to have escaped every man. One senator has, however, animadverted with egregious severity upon the general air of bad faith, recklessness, and indecorum, which lies upon the face of Lord Brougham's conduct. Mr Croker delivered one of the most stinging reproofs ever heard within the walls of Parliament, upon occasion of the new writ being moved for Knaresborough by Mr Spring Rice. That it was felt keenly and deeply, that right honourable gentleman may be well satisfied from the abuse it has drawn upon him. Having obliquely suggested as possible motives for Lord Brougham's conduct, whatever are most shrewdly suspected to have been the actual motives, Mr Croker concluded thus:—"Until such an explanation," as he had described, "is afforded, I must take the liberty of saying, that the character of the noble Lord is under a cloud, which nothing but an explanation of a satisfactory nature can dispel or remove." Yes!—and that explanation never will or can be offered. The noble Lord who bartered for the "whistling of a name," and for the bauble of a title, a popular station, which never can be retrieved, has manifested but a vulgar quality of ambition: that is his concern. But he has conducted his barter in a spirit of perfidy: that is ours. Had Lord Grey's scheme been even sufficiently matured to have warranted his delegation of confidence, still, (as one of Mr Brougham's brother representatives for York observed,) he could not, as a Peer, give that support to the measure which he had promised as a Commoner.

He, therefore, is under a cloud, from which he never can emerge. And a Cabinet that either could be duped by him in so capital a point, or would surrender their own free choice in a matter of that moment to a bold intriguer,—a Cabinet that would suffer any man's promised co-operation to weigh with them in a question really so transcendent, for this period,—they also are, and will continue to be, under a cloud. They proclaim too much conscious weakness for the respect of the politic; too much time-serving duplicity for the confidence of the upright. That Cabinet, if otherwise not liable to speedy dissolution, by the advanced age of its chief, can have no root in the reverence of the nation. That Cabinet, having made a way for the inroads of revolution, will fall, and will be remembered only for the intrigues in which they arose, or, more lamentably by far, for the confusions which they introduced.

* How very prone is the public mind to this oversight, may be seen in one of the party tricks now commonly pressed upon the reforming meetings by the friends of the new ministry. "Call for Reform," it is said, "but leave the details" [details, in this case, meaning the whole substance and extent of the measure] "to ministers." Strange that so obvious a sophism should escape any man's detection.

NOTE ON THE BISHOP OF EXETER.

EVEN the affair of the Bishop of Exeter is a job of the most scandalous kind; it is swindling in the first place—and, secondly, it is swindling for a vindictive purpose. We, with our well-known views on the Catholic bill, shall not need to clear ourselves from the odium of undue favour to Dr Phillpotts. For his own sake, we shall never cease to lament, that a champion so powerful should, for any earthly consideration that princes or courts could offer, have listened to the overtures of the enemy, and have cancelled the services of so honourable a warfare, by his ominous silence on that memorable catastrophe of the cause. From people in our situation as to politics, the language of reproach would have a natural propriety. But to those who justify Sir Robert Peel and his set, we hardly concede the same license. A privilege, wide enough to shelter Sir Robert and Mr Derry Dawson, might, we should suppose, be available to Dr Phillpotts. We see no difference in their situations, except perhaps this—that the plea of expedience, urged in bar of acknowledged principles—policy put forward as paramount to conscience, sad and grievous as it is for any man's character, does certainly sit less unbecomingly on the confessed worldling than on a member of a consecrated profession. But this one difference allowed for, in other respects the case of both parties seems to be the same. And, if not, that could in no degree affect the claims of Dr Phillpotts in the present instance. Having done wrong, he did not, therefore, forfeit his title to bare justice. Now, it is upon record, from the statement of Sir H. Hardinge, that his present Majesty's government (in the persons of a ministry now dissolved) entered into a negotiation with Dr Phillpotts, and acceded to a most distinct stipulation, about which there was no mistake, that in any case Stanhope was to be held in commendam with the see of Exeter. In reality, no stipulation could be more reasonable or proper, and there never has been any difference of opinion on that matter till the present occasion. But were it otherwise, a bargain is a bargain; and none could honestly seek to evade it. Farther, the obligations of such a bargain are trebly binding, when one party has done that upon the faith of its provisions, which, in the first place, upon any less consideration, he never would have done, and which, secondly, cannot be undone. It can make no difference at all in this case, that his Majesty's government was then administered by the Duke of Wellington, and at present by Lord Grey. Every administration succeeds to the absolute engagements of its predecessor, and inherits all its contracts, unless where they are merely personal. But, in the present case, we request the reader's attention to this plain distinction, that though a promise may originally have been merely the minister's, yet when ratified and carried into effect by pledging the party interested to corresponding acts, which else he would notoriously have declined, and, above all, by the king's compté d'être, it is no longer the minister's but the king's engagement. It is the king's faith that is now pledged to the fulfilment of its entire stipulations—it is the king's honour which is at stake; and the minister who dares to violate such a compact, is, in fact, sporting with the royal word, and pursuing the vengeance of his faction at the price of the royal honour. The hollow pretence of the ministry is, that, in deference to public opinion so loudly expressed, they had advised his Majesty not to complete the engagement. No, no; say not so, my Lord Althorpe! Not in deference to public opinion, but in deference to the hoarded and accumulated malice of your faction—now seeking a poor pretext for a mean, ungentlemanly revenge. The fact is, many have joined in this clamour, who, if asked their exquisite reason, would have no more to say, than that, upon principle, they were hostile to pluralities. That may be; but what justice is there in applying a general principle thus invidiously to the oppression of an individual? Deal with pluralities as you like; but take up the question in an honourable way, upon public grounds, and without distinction of persons; not for a base and cruel purpose of crushing an individual, and, at any rate, not at the price of the king's honour. For it is as evident as any one fact in politics, that the king's government (no matter by whom administered) has tricked Dr Phillpotts as shamefully as any of the swindling gentlemen who are daily "pulled up" to Bow Street for ring-dropping; and that they have made their sovereign a cat's paw in this base intrigue.

So much for the enemies of the Bishop of Exeter. But now, at parting, we turn to the Bishop himself, and take the liberty of saying one word to him. His Lordship, on one occasion, did this journal the honour of selecting it for the channel by which he wished to convey to the public the correction of some misstatements of his enemies. This gives us an interest in his character, which we shall most unwillingly resign; and upon the footing of that friendly interest, we may almost plead a title to come forward as the public spokesman, in stating what seems to be the Bishop's present position in respect to public opinion. Sir Henry Hardinge, in his place in Parliament, has assured us, that it is a complete delusion (propagated, in fact, originally by the press) to suppose that Dr Phillpotts approved of the Catholic bill. He retained, it seems, his old sentiments; and in heart, at least, was faithful to the old cause. Such is the statement of the gallant officer: and what he asserts, as a matter of fact within his own personal knowledge, there can be no pretence for doubting. It is undeniable, then, that all of us were grossly misled; and Dr Phillpotts himself in effect aided our error, by refusing to notice it—a policy which seems to us perfectly erroneous. We grant that a dignified clergyman ought not, upon light causes, to notice newspaper attacks: but for his character, for all that was most dear to him, and when the mistake by which he suffered had become national, surely it was allowing a most disproportionate weight to the restraints of etiquette—to grant them a paramount voice in opposition to the clamours, and, we may say, passionate pleadings of his own character. An Irish Archbishop came forward, within these last ten years, in the newspapers, to rebut the unsupported slanders of a mob orator, upon an occasion no higher than the terms asked for renewing a lease. That might be undignified and unclerical. We do not wholly defend it. But in a question so critical, so urgent as that which affected Dr Phillpotts, the simple but awful question—Had he, or had he not, behaved like an honest man? no earthly punctilios or scruples ought to have interfered with his earliest and frankest answer. One word was sufficient: no call for details. Breach of etiquette, we contend, under such an overwhelming justification, there could have been none: but, had there been, will Dr Phillpotts say, that it is not better to suffer for a moment in the opinion of his order, as a violator of ceremonial observances, than for ever in the opinion of all his countrymen, as a man who bartered his conscience for preferment? By his silence, he has allowed that construction of his conduct to travel far and wide: by a word, as it now appears, he could have arrested it. The past, however, is past. That explanation which he would not make for himself, Sir H. Hardinge has made for him; but, alas! too late for correcting the false impression which had settled into the public mind. One thing still remains, which the Bishop of Exeter can and ought to do for himself; and it is our main object in what we are now saying. We have a pretty distinct remembrance, that, on the first notification of the Duke of Wellington's measure of relief to the Catholics, in a letter to the President and Fellows of Magdalen College, Oxford, or some similar document, he delivered himself to this effect:—that as yet he was not fully acquainted with the purposes and provisions of the bill, but that, as soon as he should be so, he would discharge his conscience by a public declaration of his opinion upon its merits and tendency. This he promised; and this, so far as we could ever learn, he has not performed. The question is—Why? upon what circumstances arose this breach of his volunteer engagement? The public, the friends of Dr Phillpotts, the many who admire the vigour of his talents, and thank him for his services, earnestly unite in this question; not as a question of curiosity, but for the satisfaction, and in right, of that just interest which they take in the public character of one whom they had long valued as an efficient servant of the times—a man of honour, of great ability, and (as they still venture to hope) of untarnished integrity.

THE SOUTH STACK.

He who, within the last few years, has quitted the Irish coast, at night-fall, for Holyhead, may have remarked, after the progress of a few miles, as he paced the deck, a speck of light glimmering in the east, on the very verge of the horizon, now dipping below it, now emerging above it, as the vessel, breasting her way, rises or falls upon the wave. On a nearer approach, he will perceive this apparently insignificant star slowly and regularly assuming the form and brilliancy of the brightest planet; and then again receding, or dying away, as if gradually absorbed in surrounding darkness.

The traveller by day, on the other hand, who, in his passage up or down channel, nears the eastern shores, must have observed a white tower, posted like a sentinel, on the brow of a low hummock, apparently forming a projecting ledge from the seaward base of Caer gybi, or the mountain of Holyhead. On approaching still nearer, he will perceive that this hummock is, in fact, an island, torn from the main mass, but connected therewith by a link, at a distance resembling the gauze-work of a gossamer, which, in its fall, had accidentally caught upon the corresponding projections of the disjointed rocks.

Let him look a little longer, and he will now and then detect minute objects passing to and fro, and come to the obvious conclusion, that this aerial pathway is neither more nor less than a connecting ladder of accommodation formed by the hand of man.

The speck by night, the white tower by day, with its hummock and fairy bridge, comprise what is called the South Stack; and, taken altogether, it forms a prominent feature in the bold, romantic scenery of this iron-bound coast, and combines so many objects worthy of notice, natural and artificial, that, be the observer what he may, poet, philosopher, mechanist, or naturalist, he will find wherewithal to excite his curiosity, and reward his labour, in visiting a spot which has not many rivals in its kind in the wide world. I am not aware that its annals have hitherto been recorded. In consideration of the many hours I have strolled upon its rocks and pry'd into its recesses, I will, therefore, assume the office of its chronicler.

Equally attractive by sea and land, the visitor, who would fully satisfy his curiosity, should so arrange matters as to go by the one and return by the other; in failure of which, he may rest assured, that if he has any taste for the sublime or beautiful, he will lose much which he ought to see.

Some preliminary cautions are, however, necessary, in the marine department of the expedition. In the first place, the day must be calm and the sea unruffled, or, if it does blow, that it is with due moderation from the east; for this being an offshore wind, in a great degree tends to counteract the heavy swell, which, rolling in from the westward, renders a passage by water either impracticable, or, if practicable, disagreeable. In the next place, if choice of season is available, a preference should be given to the early part of June, when the sea-birds are assembled in congress for the important business of nidification and incubation, when every tenable cranny in the rocks is occupied, and the whole shore echoes with wild cries, "their waste of music in their voice of love."

The tides also should be consulted, for if unfavourable, it will require a stout and sturdy crew to contend with its influence, in addition to the "race," a certain confluence of eddies, which, under peculiar circumstances, has been known to act a part not much inferior to its worthy congener, the Norwegian Maelstrom. There is evidence of its having once swallowed up an entire brig, with all her masts, yards, canvass, and cordage; the luckless vessel got, by some means, entangled in the vortex, and, after a brief struggle, yielded to her fate, foundering in a sea of foam, before the eyes of a spectator on the heights. It may be feared, indeed, that feats of this appalling nature are not infrequent in the long dark nights of winter, as scarcely a year passes without the melancholy sight of broken spars and lacerated rigging, from time to time thrown up from its fretful cauldron.

We will suppose our traveller, with every favourable requisite, on his way to join the boat waiting for him at the pier-head. Ere he reaches it, he will first pass the bridge connecting this fine pile of masonry with the town, over what is called the Sound, a narrow passage, even now of no great width, but much more formidable before it was smoothed down by chisel and gunpowder, through which, on a memorable occasion, Captain Skinner stemmed his way during a heavy gale of wind. On his passage from Dublin, an Irishman's carriage contrived to get rid of its lashings, and vaulting through his mainsail, bounded into the sea, leaving the vessel disabled by such an untoward exploit, and incompetent to adopt the then hazardous step of running for a crowded harbour's mouth, and already exhibiting the wreck of a vessel or two knocking their bottoms out on its rocks immediately to leeward. A few yards farther will conduct him under a very handsome triumphal arch of dark Anglesey marble, erected to commemorate the landing of his late Majesty on the island, when the royal squadron remained wind-bound in the bay, mourning, with half-mast pendants and ensigns, the loss of Caroline, his Queen. On its frieze is the following inscription, with its counterpart in Welsh on the corresponding side:—

GWO. 4. ITEX,
Monam mvisens, hinc appulit,
Aug. VII. A. D. 1821.

Côf—Adail. I. Ymwe ad.
y. Brenin. mor. y. y. IV. 4g ynys
Fôn. Awst NNI.

Finally embarked, a westerly course is steered, usually leaving on the right a villainous nest of invisible rocks, called the Platters; which, if stones had tongues, could tell many a dismal tale of misery and mischief of their own production. If the tide admits, a shorter cut is practicable, by passing between the mainland and a ragged-looking, little, rocky island, called Ynys y welt; of this island and its adjacent rocks, a pair or two of oyster catchers (hematopus ostralegus) seemed to have taken possession, exhibiting, as they ran along or flew from point to point, their smart, piebald, glossy coats, in full contrast with their long, bright, orange beaks and legs, and crimson irides. Beautiful, and easily domesticated as these birds are, it is surprising they are not more frequently introduced in our pleasure-grounds. Those who have visited Brighton within a few years, may remember the numbers running about, without alarm, on the lawn of the Pavilion. For a short distance beyond this island, the scenery is tame and insipid. As we advance, however, the rocks assume a bolder and more precipitous front; and in a few minutes, when the small insulated rock, called the North Stack, detaches itself, a magnificent picture appears through the fissure; and from this point may be said to commence a series of splendid scenery, continuing, without intermission or diminution, for the remainder of the voyage.

Here, too, as in the case of Ynys y welt, there is a passage between the rock and the main, but so narrow, that, unless the water is perfectly smooth, an inexperienced navigator might hesitate to attempt it, even in a boat; and yet through this channel, flanked and fringed as it is with bustling rocks, staring, like sharks' teeth, from its yawning side, it is on record that a large cutter passed, in a heavy sea. The event took place some fifty or sixty years ago, and the particulars are fresh in the memories of many still living. She was one of the post-office packets, conveying the mail from Dublin to the Hebrides. The wind was blowing tremendously, and a thick mist had, for a time, veiled the land. At a moment of extreme anxiety—the Captain being well aware of his proximity to the coast—it cleared up, revealing as fearful a situation as any in which mortal men could well be placed; an overpowering sea rolling before the gale, was hurrying the vessel onwards to a fate which seemed inevitable, imprisoned, as she was now discovered to be, in a sort of bay of precipices, lashed by sheets of foam, bursting not only at their bases, but breaking over the ledges of rocks, which here and there reared themselves above the swell. Letting go an anchor would have been useless, had it held the ground, the strongest tackle must have instantly yielded before the pressure of such a sea. To beat out was equally hopeless, for the North Stack projected so far into the offing, as to afford no chance whatever of weathering it. At this awful and critical juncture, an experienced sailor stepped forward, and urged the possibility of escape.

"It is high water," said he to the captain, "but there is a channel between that island and the main, and I think we may push her through"—hidden as it was behind the rocks of the Stack, over which the waves were frightfully breaking. To hesitate was death; the forlorn hope was decided upon; and with that ready confidence, so peculiar to British seamen in the hour of peril, the order was given—"Up with the helm—haul taught the sheets;" and away luffing to the wind, the bounding vessel flew towards the terrific chasm, on which every eye was riveted. Had the helmsman relaxed in nerve but an iota, had the swell interrupted the action of the tiller, though but for an instant, had she swerved but a foot from her course, her planking must have been rifted from her ribs by the grim range of serrated rocks, on which a biscuit might have been thrown with ease, as she floundered through the foam, and shot by them like an arrow from a bow. For a minute, their fate hung upon a hair; in another, they were in safety; and within an hour, firmly moored in the harbour.

On passing through this opening, the eye rests on pile above pile of stupendous rocks; the lower range broken into fissures, forming natural vaults and caverns of the most magnificent and picturesque description. Immediately on the left, one called Ogo vaur, (or the large cavern,) actually perforates the base of the high headland, called Morva llwm, or the bare headland of the boundless sea—from Morva, boundless sea, and llwm, bare, exposed, naked. It is, I believe, only at low water or half-tide, that a landing can be effected, on a rough shingly beach, mingled with broken masses of rock in a spacious portal, forming, when the spectator looks towards the sea from the interior, a suitable frame-work to as fine a marine view as can be imagined; the perforation is perfect, and accessible to those who think it worth their while to clamber over broken fragments in the dark, with the chance or the certainty of slipping over tresses of sea-weed into puddles of water left by the tide. Not far from it, there is another called the Parliament-house, far more worthy of inspection, and which will amply reward the candidate ambitious of taking a seat within its walls, compared with which, its namesake in St Stephen's chapel, in all its glory, must hide its diminished head. If it is in the breeding season, let a gun be fired on entering by all means, and mark the effect—for lo! from every chink, and crevice, and chasm, as if shovelled out or exploded from a cask,—for I know not by what apter comparison I can convey an idea of the effect,—down tumble shower upon shower, and pack after pack, of guillemots and razor-bills,—their snow-white breasts and dark velvet backs forming a beautiful contrast with the back-ground gloom, as they dart through the aperture; while above, below, and round about, gulls glide or hover, screaming and wailing at this ill-timed intrusion on their privacy. Here the empire of birds commences, and is continued with little interruption, though with singular selection and variety, for a considerable distance along the more inaccessible heights of the coast. The claimants for the undivided possession of this empire of air and water, are divided into four classes, who occasionally contest possession of certain spots and allotments. Of these, the most numerous are the gulls and guillemots, with their congeners, or cousin-germans, the razor-bills; but of them I shall speak more at large when we set foot on their favourite haunts in the South Stack, merely noticing them at present, as forming a conspicuous feature in this part of the scenery; dotting in fixed or movable patches, the rocks, the sky, or the sea, according to their immediate occupation of nursing, flying, or feeding. But though fewer in number, perhaps the most attractive and characteristic are the gloomy ominous forms of the shags and cormorants, and the stately, grave, and sedate figures of the herons. On the lower rocks, forming sunken ledges, with pinnacles just level with the water, or a few feet above, may be seen small assemblages of the former. Milton, though an excellent poet, makes but an indifferent remark for an ornithologist; he, I suspect, being the first who ever saw one of this sable tribe sitting on a "Tree, and highest there that grew;" but he is truth itself, when he describes the foul fiend

"Like a cormorant."

Observe the alouching form, the wet and vapid wings dangling from her sides to catch the breeze, while his weird and wildly staring eye scans and scowls about in all directions. Surfeited with his morning's meal, the filthy gormandizer reposes, gaping his naked yellow-skinned mouth, from whence in loose folds hangs a distended flap, big enough to form the floating bladder of a Greenlander's fishing tackle; while a greasy imp or two sits waiting for a fermented portion of food from the parental pouch. Higher up behold the heronry; from little jutting shelves or corners, a few sticks project, slightly covered with a scattering of withered sea tang; these are the nests, on which the mother may be seen sitting, or near which, if the season be further advanced, the young brood stand, patiently expecting the return of their parents from the marshes and shallows, with a wonted supply of small fish. One of the most singular circumstances connected with this associated location, is the absolute line of demarcation and boundary observed on both sides; each species taking a separate site, and never intruding on the appropriated districts of a neighbouring tribe. The guillemots and razor-bills nestle for the most part in their holes and corners; the gulls are scattered with rather a more latitudinarian spirit over the whole surface; while the cormorants usually sojourn on a somewhat lower range, as if more suitable to their heavy awkward flight. But most select and ascetic, as far as communication with others is concerned, are the herons. Simon Stylites, on his column, could not have more effectually secluded himself from the world, than one of these long-legged birds upon his solitary ledge.

Having left the caves of the North Stack some distance, a perpendicular wall of rock presents itself, of which the herons have taken exclusive possession, reminding me, from the peculiar positions of their nests, of the hermits of Montocvat, who, by a refinement on solitude, and stretch of self-denying ingenuity, have so contrived their dwellings, that the door of one may be placed within a few yards of another, without the possibility of the tenants holding the slightest converse or communication. Thus, if a square foot of insulated space can be found, there one of these staid and melancholy birds is sure to be found posted like a warder on a watch-tower—motionless, grey as the rock itself, he might be mistaken for a piece of sculpture, but for the harsh cry ever and anon uttered, or by his now and then drawing back his neck and burying his head between the shoulders; and then stretching out his long legs far behind, in lieu of a tail, to act as a rudder, he launches himself silently from his resting place, and floats away, slowly flapping his wide-spreading pair of flagging wings. A colony of about twenty or thirty appear to have monopolized this dreary façade, and year after year, at the appointed time, their rude eyries are refitted, for the reception and perpetuation of this lonely tribe.

This rugged amphitheatre affords other features also of considerable interest; the eye is, in its progress, attracted by an extensive surface of recently exposed rock, evincing the incalculable powers of electric fluid, which in an instant severed an enormous superficies, and shattering thousands of loosened fragments, hurled them like pebbles to the bottom, where they remain, the everlasting record of an event, occurring on the 29th December, 1823; further particulars of which will be reserved till we come to speak of the signal station on the mountain, where its effects were, if not so powerfully, at least more singularly exhibited. About midway, in crossing the bay, there is a chasm so uniformly regular and direct, that its formation can scarcely be accounted for by any other theory than an actual recession of the originally united parts forming the line of precipice,—a phenomenon not unfrequent in several similar mountain ranges, and peculiarly applicable to this, which bears throughout unquestionable marks of having been exposed to upheavings and concussions fully sufficient to rend in twain far mightier mounds. This singular fissure, cleaved in so direct a line from the summit to the base, forms, or rather did form, a passage of communication, of no small celebrity in ancient days, and retaining its odour of sanctity till a very recent date. It is known by the name of Ogo Lochwydd, Ogo, as before mentioned, signifying a cave. Respecting the word Lochwydd, there is some difference of opinion; by persons of high authority it has been explained to mean a place of meeting and assembling together—an interpretation perfectly satisfactory, if accurate; if, however, it may be supposed a compound of the words Lloc and wd, it will admit of a different meaning, Lloc signifying a mound, a fold or confined place, and wd something that is extended or stretched out; which might lead to the conclusion, that it was named from its obvious peculiarity, viz. a confined place extended in length, which, whether right or wrong, at all events most accurately defines this remarkable spot.

The particulars connected with its past and present notoriety deserve a moment's interruption to the thread of our narrative. A spring of crystal water, filtering through the deep strata, formed a small well at the bottom, which, in all probability, at a very early period attracted that notice which, in all times, and in all countries, wells and fountains in singular situations, particularly if difficult of access, from Delphos downwards, have invariably received. The next step, and the natural consequence in dark ages, was a chapel for the accommodation of pilgrims; and here, accordingly, the well at the bottom was in due time supported by its necessary appendage, a chapel at the top, called Capel Llochwydd, which name a considerable remnant of ruins, situated just at the higher opening of the gorge, still retains. What was the nature of its early virtues, tradition has not handed down; but till within sixty years, for time unknown the lonely chapel and its well were the resort of the lads and lasses of the island, who, at a certain annual festival called sillia mic rariah, corresponding to the wakes of the northern counties of England, and held during three successive Sundays in July, assembled in troops to ascertain the matrimonial contingencies awaiting them. Each diviner into futurity of either sex descended the chasm to the well, and there, if after having filled the mouth with holy water, and grasped two handfuls of sand from the brink of the charmed font, he or she could accomplish the re-ascent without squirting out the one or scattering the other, each might look forward with a fair hope of becoming bride or bridegroom before the close of the year. About sixty years ago, however a reverend

Mr Ellis, the worthy incumbent of the parish, duly abhorring all superstitious rites and ceremonies, alike associated with paganism and popery, opposed himself with the zeal of a John Knox to all such unhallowed assemblages, and, as the surest mode of cutting them up root and branch, he forthwith reduced the chapel to ruins, and concealed the well, by filling it up with rubbish. But, notwithstanding the truly orthodox exertions of this modern reformer, till within twenty years or thereabouts, walls, to the height of seven or eight feet, remained sufficiently entire to convey a tolerable idea of the perfect building, which is represented to have been a substantial, though rude and simple edifice, composed of unhewn stones cemented with mortar, the window and door-frames excepted, which were well wrought by the chisel, with considerable labour, from very obdurate materials; the whole consisting apparently of one chamber of an oblong form, not exceeding a few yards in length. Of the well, however, not a trace was left, though its existence was proved beyond the shadow of doubt very few years ago, by a party who landed, and at length succeeded in detecting the spot, from which, after removing a quantity of sand and loose stones, again gushed the fountain of pure water, in all its pristine vigour, and doubtless, inherent virtues; but time, that "edax rerum," has pressed with so relentless a hand on the long neglected pathway, that I fear few candidates, under any circumstances, much less with watertight mouths and unclenching hands, would now venture with a prospect of success to ascend the precipitous pass of Ogo Llochwydd.

At no great distance, there is a solitary escarpment, for it deserves not the name of a landing-place, on which, during a tempestuous night in the beginning of March 1808, a luckless sloop, driving before a snow-storm, strewed her broken timbers; it was no subject of congratulation, that the ill-fated crew reached the land in safety, doomed as they were to suffer a protracted and more bitter fate; for when the morning dawned, they were discovered frozen in the attitudes in which death had assailed them. The captain seemed to have patiently resigned himself to what was irremediable. He was found stretched at the foot of a rock, under which he vainly sought a remnant of shelter, his head resting on his hands, having breathed his last in a frozen sleep. Of his companions, some had struggled more, some less, wandering amidst the snow, or in vainly attempting to reach the summit. One poor fellow had nearly succeeded; he must, it was evident, have persevered gallantly through the night, but human efforts were of no avail; he too was doomed to follow the fortunes of his messmates, leaving his remains within a few yards of a place of safety, which he was destined never to attain.

This interesting amphitheatre, beginning with the North and terminating with the South Stack, embraces something more than a mile, being flanked on its southern extremity by the leading object of this article. A glimpse or two might have been caught previous to passing the North Stack, according to the course steered, whether closing with the land or keeping more to seaward. But it is not till the bay is fairly entered, that it stands out, in all its details. As few visitors approach it before the sun has gained the meridian, and therefore long after the eastern rays are withdrawn, the island usually appears of a gloomy, sombre hue, approximating to black, its dingy uniformity broken only by the indented sinuosities and irregularities of its surface; whereas the mainland, either from being somewhat less assailable by the sea, or more exposed to the air and sun, and also from the operations of the artificers employed in forming the communication, presents a variety of shades, in which, however, a dull red is predominant. On a nearer approach, every part assumes more importance and interest. On the left, the headland precipices rise abruptly from the water's edge. In front, the light and airy bridge springs from rock to rock, while on the right, a dark deep cavern forms the aperture of another natural tunnel, similar to that of Ogo-vawr, penetrating through the north-eastern side, and curving in a south-easterly direction, where it opens on a little gulf, the sea rolling through it, I believe, without interruption, at low as well as high water.

It is at the mouth of this cavern, alongside a shelving rock, that the boat is laid; and by means of a rude flight of steps to a certain point, a tolerably commodious and easy ascent is practicable to the summit level of the island, near to the spot on which the suspension bridge terminates. The histories of the island, bridge, &c., from the causes which first brought them into notice, to their present state, are well deserving of attention.

On casting an eye over the map, it will be seen that every vessel, in her passage up St George's Channel for any ports to the eastward of her course, (such as Liverpool, &c.) after taking a departure from the Smalls light, off Milford Haven, must steer in nearly a direct line for the Skerries, on the N.W. coast of the island of Anglesey, which line must of necessity bring her almost in contact with the western extremity of the projecting range of this and neighbouring rocks; and that in consequence of the whole flood-tide setting into Carnarvon bay, a vessel, even with due allowance for keeping clear of Bardsey Island, must be seriously affected by an inland draft; but should she by good management avoid this danger, and have run the greater part of the chord of which the bight of Carnarvon bay is the curve, another assault is made upon her, when within about three leagues of the Head, by the reflux of an ebb-tide also making into the bay. These contending currents are probably the predominant causes of that dangerous "race" already alluded to, whose influence in gales of wind is by no means confined to the immediate point of collision between counter currents, but extends far out to sea over a considerable space. Those who have experienced eddies of this description can alone appreciate their overwhelming powers: the swallowing up of a brig has been already noticed. It is stated in a paper published by Captain Evans, the present harbour-master of Holyhead, to whose representations the chief merit of this establishment is due, after a long list of shipwrecks in the vicinity, that scarcely a winter passed, previous to the exhibition of this light, in which the neighbouring peasantry and fishermen have not fallen in with floating fragments, or various articles of merchandise, belonging to vessels which had gone down in the race unseen, unpitied, and unaccounted for. The dead set of the currents up channel was not long ago verified by a curious incident. It was known that a homeward bound ship, wine laden, had gone to pieces off the Scilly Islands, when to the surprise of all, in about a fortnight, several butts of sherry, forming part of her cargo, made their appearance, and drifted ashore on various parts of this coast. There are many anecdotes of hair-breadth escapes to confirm the danger of this indraft. During an intense fog, and light breeze from the S.E. a fisherman in a skiff, close in shore, examining some lobster baskets, was surprised by the sound of voices; and on looking up, was still more astonished by seeing the looming of a large square-rigged vessel almost on board of him. On his loudly hailing, she steered clear, and he immediately pulled alongside, conveying the unexpected information to the captain, that, if he persevered on that course but a few minutes longer, he would bring himself upon a parcel of rocks almost under his bows. Measures were of course instantly taken, and a danger easily avoided, which but for this timely notice, must inevitably have been fatal. The fisherman was requested to remain on the look-out, as several other vessels were supposed to be not far astern. And so it proved; for on the fog's clearing up, a little fleet was discovered standing on steadily and unconsciously to certain destruction. One other anecdote may be mentioned, which, though it terminated, as far as the vessel was concerned, less fortunately, was certainly one of the narrowest escapes in one of the most critical situations in the annals of shipwrecks.

I shall give it nearly in the words of an observer on the spot: Soon after dusk, in the beginning of April, 1826, a fine new brig, named the Alexander, on her voyage from Jamaica to Liverpool, made Bardsey light, and shaped her course for the Skerries, with a strong breeze at S.W., weather hazy. At ten o'clock she shortened sail; soon after which a rock was observed close on her larboard bow, and breakers right a-head: the alarm was given, and the affrighted passengers hastily dressing themselves, and collecting their valuables, prepared for the worst. In a few minutes, the master came down, announcing the grateful intelligence that the danger was over, and they again retired in confidence to rest; but they had scarcely done so, when the vessel struck violently abaft, and the cabin was almost immediately filled with such a rush of water, that they were compelled to seek instant safety on the quarter-deck. The brig, when the first alarm was given, had been hauled to the wind on the larboard tack, with the intention of laying her along the land till an offing was gained; but as in the confusion they omitted to brace up her yards, on coming to the wind the sails were taken aback, and getting stern way, she grounded on the cliff: after a few heavy blows, she swung round in a line parallel to the shore, and there remained, beating violently, with her masts and yards entangled in the projecting rocks, which snapping and shattering with the repeated shocks, fell down on the deck, and added to the danger and confusion. By this time, the passengers had assembled round the master, who stood irresolute, until the chief mate assured them that the spritsail-yard lay upon a low table rock, upon which he thought it possible to conduct the women and children, if they made haste; a young lady from Kingston was the first to offer, and with much difficulty reached the rock in safety; when the gallant mate returned to the wreck, and finally succeeded in landing two other ladies, three children, and a Spanish and English merchant. The master and crew then followed, and just as the last man landed, the yard was carried away, and all communication with the wreck cut off. Nineteen persons were thus huddled together at midnight on a ledge of rock just sufficient to hold them, but compelled to remain in the exact position in which they were first landed, lest by the slightest movement, they should precipitate the person before them into the sea. The night was dark and cold, and no one but the watch on deck had any covering beyond their night-clothes. But all their miseries were trifling compared with the terrible anxiety with which they watched the flowing tide, with an apparently inaccessible cliff behind them, and the water even then curling round their feet; each wave evidently reached a higher mark than its predecessor, and it was too clear that another half hour's flood must sweep them all into the sea. At length, when the dead level of the water was only a foot and a half below them, with inexpressible joy and thankfulness they observed it first to pause, and then gradually but perceptibly recede. Just before dawn, the chief mate and a boy, with great difficulty, scaled the cliff, and calling up the country people, obtained ropes, by which the whole party were successively drawn up in safety, with the exception of one individual, whose thigh was fractured by a splinter from the rock.

The next day the wind changed, and blew hard, breaking up the unfortunate vessel, from which little of the cargo was saved; but her boat drifted safely on shore from the booms, with three small goats, which long survived the miseries of that eventful night.

Under such circumstances, to all vessels, but more especially the post-office packets, the necessity of a light became of paramount importance, compelled as their commanders were by the nature of the service, when exposed to thick weather, or particular winds, (knowing full well the character of the coast right a-head,) to make the Skerries, or at other times to land their mail and passengers at the back of the Head.

Impressed at length with the obvious advantages, not to say necessity of the case, the Trinity-House finally entered into the views of Captain Evans, and decided upon adopting his suggestions, assigning to his superintendence the preparatory operations, which were commenced in May 1808, when temporary shelter was erected, and a cook's galley set up for the accommodation of 70 men, who were only allowed to absent themselves, when weather permitted, from the Saturday evening till the Sunday morning.

At this period, it should be observed, that the present landing-place, on the north side, indifferent as it still is, at certain times of tide, was then altogether impracticable; and that on the south-east alone, where at all times more or less there is a considerable swell, a precarious footing was attainable. The difficulties of landing being thus so great, and the power of supplying this large population so precarious, particularly with water, there being none on the island, it was found absolutely necessary to provide against this inconvenience. Accordingly a canvas hose, 900 feet in length, was made to communicate with a small tarn, about 400 feet from the summit of the nearest headland, descending thence at a sharp angle the remaining 100 feet, till it reached the island; in connexion with this hose, a stay and traveller were rigged out, by which milk, instruments, and a variety of other articles, were safely and commodiously passed to and fro. On one occasion, a passenger of a very different description attempted this fearful communication in the person of an active young man, one of the workmen. Having received intimation of his mother's sudden illness, he resolved, as the surf was too high to admit of the usual egress by water, to trust himself to this aerial conveyance. Accordingly, firmly grasping the hose and tackling, he slowly but steadily made his way good, with every eye intently fixed upon him, and trembling for his safety, up this terrific pathway, and safely landed himself on the mountain's brow. This hazardous adventure took place without the superintendent's knowledge, who very properly, upon hearing of it, issued a positive order, that it should on no account whatever be repeated.

As the works proceeded, the necessity of a more frequent and certain communication naturally increased. Accordingly an ingenious old millwright, in conjunction with Captain Evans, set their heads together for the accomplishment of this desirable object, the fruits of which appeared in the course of the summer, in the form of a small box or cradle, suspended on two strong stays, running through sheaves, and swung across the chasm, a distance of 150 feet, (a space 30 feet wider than the present bridge and subsequent cradle passage,) being made fast to the nearest projecting point of the mainland rocks, from whence an ascent was practicable. We would request the light-headed and nervous portion of the community, who may chance to visit the South Stack, to have pointed out to them the precise point on the mainland rocks, from whence this first and original cradle took its departure; and thence to trace clearly and distinctly the goat-like ascent up and down, which all who, whether from business or curiosity, visited the island, were necessitated to clamber and crawl.

The cradle itself, moreover, in its infant state, was by no means a bed of roses, before experience and practice had vouched for its security; and it is but fair to allow to Captain Evans, who was the first to embark and ferry himself over, something of the "robur et æs triplex," assigned by Horace to the man who first ventured his person on the wide seas, in the crazy barks of ancient times.

Confidence in its stability, however, soon removed all reasonable fears; and as one of the passengers who tried it in this its early day, I can perfectly recollect that even the first moment of its launching from terra firma, was a change much for the better, compared with the headlong scramble down certain parts of the precipice leading to its point of suspension. In the meantime, workmen, lowered by ropes, were constantly employed in forming a more commodious staircase on the broad face of the rock, from which, in January 1809, a shorter passage, 120 feet in length, was effected. Still, however, by means of a cradle, though of a somewhat improved structure, which remained as the sole direct mode of communication for five years, during which time no accident occurred to any living being, Captain Evans' dog excepted, who one day, in his haste to secure a passage, at the moment of the cradle's departure, sprung forward unsuccessfully, and was precipitated into the waters below, from whence, as the sea was comparatively smooth, he was rescued without receiving the slightest injury. Two passengers were the legal complement of the limited dimensions of this carriage; but occasionally three, if not four, contrived to pack themselves on board. It was on one of these occasions, the inmates being all females, during a heavy gale of wind, what with the lateral pressure of the whirling eddies, combined with the extra gravitating weight of the overloaded vehicle, it so happened that the workmen were for a time unable to haul it forward on the strained cordage, leaving the ladies for a time to enjoy their leisure, and meditate upon the scenery, heightened by the howling of the wind, the vibratory motion of the cordage, and the roaring of the waves below them.

To this cradle, at the expiration of five years, succeeded a regular foot bridge, of the most simple, primitive, and picturesque construction. Strong cables were thrown across, over which planks were laid, and on either side a light balustrade of stout net-work was raised, the whole secured, and the vibratory motion in part counteracted, by long guys, made fast to appropriate points on either side. Over this, those possessing tolerable nerves might trip comfortably enough, for there was no real danger, though to some the passage was still a matter of hesitation. But whether from the march of intellect wishing to meet the advancement of the times, or whether to rival in its way the gigantic undertaking over the Menai on the opposite side of the island, the bridge which succeeded the primitive cradle has itself been superseded by an elegant structure on the true scientific principles of permanent suspension bridges, over which a regiment of horse might pass.

But to return to the light-house.

The preparatory operations having, as has been stated, commenced in May, 1808, and the foundation of the building laid in the following August, so rapidly were the works carried on, that, on the evening of the 9th February, 1809, the light was exhibited for the first time. The lantern, in which it is placed, is elevated above the sea about 200 feet, the summit level of the island being 140 feet. The reflectors cover three triangular surfaces, which revolve by clock-work machinery, wound up every nine hours, giving, in order to distinguish the light from that of the Skerries, a full face every two minutes, which may be distinctly seen from a ship's deck, at the distance of about nine leagues. The tower is a substantial stone-building, with walls at the lower part five feet thick; but, solid as was this foundation, it was found on trial not to be sufficiently dense to keep out the pelting of the winter gales, when the waves bursting upwards, dashed their spray with such inconceivable force, that the water actually filtered through, and kept the interior in a constant state of moisture; so much so, as to excite an apprehension that it might seriously injure the masonry. A variety of remedies were suggested, and the most experienced opinions taken; copper bolts were inserted, on which a casing was to be made fast. Persons were dispatched from London with a mixture of pulverised iron, Parker's cement, ashes, and sand. With this composition, every crevice and interstice was carefully filled, and the whole smoothed down to an uniform surface, which set, and became firm as stone itself; but all to no purpose, for, to the general astonishment, water was still forced through, and the interior walls were as damp and trickling as ever. Captain Evans went to London, and reported the case to the Trinity-house Board; small slates were then recommended, as an additional casing; but the blast of the first hurricane ripped them away like shreds. In this dilemma, when, in the multitude of counsellors, no wisdom had been found, an old carpenter, employed in repairing a window-frame and door-case, which he knew to have been set up above 40 years, at a mansion-house in the neighbourhood, remarked that every part of the casing below ground was in a state of decay, whereas the other parts, which had been coated with a mixture of painting oil, white lead, and sand, remained as sound as ever. Happening at this juncture to meet Captain Evans, he mentioned the fact, which thus accidentally suggested a similar application at the light-house.

Accordingly, a mixture was prepared, consisting of sand from Port Davaich, free from sea-water, which, after being thoroughly dried in an oven, was well sifted. Two men were then employed to paint as far as they could reach, with a mixture of white lead and oil; and then over this glutinous surface, the sand was dashed on, and left to dry and harden for five or six days, after which the process was repeated; when, to the surprise of all, two coats were found fully to answer the purpose; for since that time, the water has been effectually excluded, and not a drop of moisture ever penetrating within.

Exclusive of this tower, there are two dwellings for the accommodation of the light-keepers and their families, and another, on a small scale, fitted up by Captain Evans for his own use, when detained by business on his frequent visits to the island. And thus a spot, hitherto rented at £.1, is, for the summer-pasture of a few sheep, on its scanty patches of grass and thrift, became at once an object of interest and importance to the public in general. To the geologist and naturalist, it must, indeed, have been always so.

The whole coast partakes more or less of a micaceous schistose character, traversed here and there, as may be seen at Port Davaich, about three miles east of the South Stack, by a vein of trap, in itself a sufficient indication, that indirect igneous, if not immediate volcanic causes, have been no slumbering agents in the formation of this range of coast. Of its having been upheaved or severely compressed by some adequate force from an original position in the earth's crust, a glance upon the precipice fronting the island, affords undisputable proof; and that a great portion of this stratification was at one period in a semi-fluid or pliant state, must be admitted to be equally unquestionable. I can nowhere recollect such a series of fantastic festoonings and twistings, as the face of the rock presents, a few yards on the right of the mainland gateway, opening upon the suspension bridge. I can compare it to nothing more analogous than rolls of ribbon uniformly plaited, resting on an uneven irregular foundation. A little further, on the other hand, the rock changes not only its integral character, but its stratification; assuming, instead of the horizontal, a perpendicular form, exhibiting finer and bolder, though perhaps less curious, features, than its intimate neighbour, on which it immediately impinges. Thus, the Parliament-house cavern seems to have been formed by the falling in of fragments disturbed and disjointed by a sudden change from a horizontal to a perpendicular stratification; when, at the period of its rising, it showed aside and bowed away the more yielding masses of the tortuous schist. An additional proof that this unbending obdurate mass was the aggressor, may, I think, be inferred from the shattered face of the elevated surface, forming the highest peak of the mountain, rising far above the surrounding and more decidedly micaceous schistose beds, exhibiting a dismal scene of fraction, dislocation, and of trituration, (if the term may be applied to fragments of many tons in weight,) as if the cumulus had contended with sturdy obstacles in its process of elevation. An experienced observer will require no directions to detect various points of contact between rival masses; but there is one within a few yards of the spot on which he first treads upon the island, after crossing the bridge, so well adapted for observation, that it may be allowable to point it out. On proceeding towards the light-house, he will perceive a deep indenture very conspicuous on the south-east side, where the sea rolls in, forming the gulf before mentioned, into which the natural tunnel opens; proceeding to the extremity of the promontory, immediately fronting the abrupt face of the opposite side of this gulf, he will trace a marked difference in the texture of the arm on which he stands, and that directly facing him; the one being in part more massive, while the other inclines to the micaceous schistose form—and on following the two curves of the gulf to their point of junction, he will readily remark, that, although in very close contact, they are, nevertheless, not identically the same stratum; and possibly the intermediate chasm may have been occasioned by the rupture which took place in their component parts at the moment (and if it was the work of a moment—what a moment!) of collision—when these mighty rocks rose from the sea, grinding and grating the one against the other.

Thus much of the geological attractions. As for the naturalist, in the scene which appears in all its feathered glory before him, he will find certain species, which can nowhere be contemplated with such ease and satisfaction, as at the points of this projecting promontory. There have I sat, and could have remained for hours, watching these sea-birds, and listening to their wild cry, mingling with the hoarse roar of the waves lashing the rocks below. The perpendicular faces of this little gulf are intersected by innumerable fissures, crevices, ledges, and shelves, admirably adapted for birds requiring these accommodations; and here accordingly an army of razorbills (alca torda) and guillemots (colymbus troile) had taken up their position, almost, though not entirely, to the exclusion of the gulls. And therein, as if conscious of their safety, it being an inviolable rule never to disturb them, they were carrying on their usual occupations with the most perfect unconcern, permitting one to enter fully into their domestic arrangements. Closely jammed in a lateral niche, just opposite, sat 72 guillemots, all bowing their heads at each other, with a gravity and solemnity unaccountable. On they went for above a quarter of an hour, without intermission, each nodding slowly to his neighbour, who, with equal composure, nodded as slowly in return. Now and then, from another ledge, one or two would come in from a short excursion, and, jostling the whole line, send a dozen or two backwards over the edge, croaking disapprobation at the intruders, who took the vacant places, utterly disregarding the confusion they had caused. It was impossible at first to divest oneself of an involuntary shudder, as they slid headlong or backwards into the abyss, their squab plump bodies supported by such comparatively disproportioned wings. I felt at every moment a sort of rising cry, "Ah, poor bird, nothing can save him! he must be killed." When flapping his little pinions, away he went, cleaving the air, making his circuit of a mile, skimming now and then over the sea, but not touching the waves, and then returning to his friends. Amidst the myriads of old ones, I looked in vain for any thing like a corresponding number of young; I could scarcely see a single individual. It is true, that the females only produce one egg; but still that could not account for the paucity of progeny. I suspect from certain sympathetic croakings uttered by the old ones, when turning their heads towards little chinks, the recesses of which were invisible, that the infant birds were kept in the background; and well they are so, or otherwise, in the constant disturbances, and tumblings over, that take place, they must inevitably break their necks in the confusion.

But a greater surprise was excited by perceiving in the midst of the bustle a solitary egg here and there lying on the bare rock, within a few inches of the edge. By what care or instinct is it preserved from falling? It has been said, that if they are removed by the human hand, it is impossible, or at least extremely difficult, to replace them in their former steady situation; whence it has been inferred that they are glued by some secreted liquid to the rock. One of our best ornithologists, Montagu, on good evidence, doubts the fact, but still the mystery is great, if not greater; there they are in a most hazardous situation, but they are preserved—by what means? How many are the things which our philosophy cannot fathom! The razor-bills were by no means so numerous as the guillemots, and, generally speaking, did not mingle with them; they seemed to hold themselves apart as the better bird of the two, peering at one another, and pluming their coats with a sort of dandy consciousness of their superior brilliancy and glossiness. But both agreed in keeping aloof from me; there was nothing like intrusion on the spot I had selected for observing them. Not so the gulls, at least the Larus cœvus, or common gull. They were all familiarity; some flew so near, that I could almost feel the fanning of their wings; while others settled within a few yards, conning me over with a vacant simple stare, uttering their plaintive, melancholy, imploring sort of note. While on the other hand, a pair or two of the large black-beaked gulls (Larus marinus) now and then sailed by, and then alighting on an inaccessible ledge, reconnoitred me with a scrutinizing look from their keen, suspicious, penetrating eye, expressing a very different language. The former, barely opening their slender beaks sufficiently to give vent to a gentle cry, seemed to say, "We are poor harmless creatures, do not hurt us." The latter, on the other hand, the moment they had perched, opened theirs as wide as possible, uttering, at the same time, a loud hearty scream, ah imo pectore, as much as to say, "This is our territory; you have no business here; we wish you would go away." Not far from the resting-place of this pair of black-beaked gulls, a pair of the common sort had established themselves on a bit of a plateau that made one giddy to look at, and quite tremble for the fate of their sole offspring, a little grey down-covered toddler, with about half an inch between his toes and destruction, for a breath would have blown him over; but there he stood quite at his ease, so well tutored apparently, that when the old ones successively returned with food, he was indifference itself. No tremulous movement of his flappers, no impatient stretchings of neck, or gaping of mouth, like other young birds. I cannot conceive a more melancholy advance from infancy to maturity, than this youngster's; it being evident, from the moment of his quitting his egg-shell to the present hour, the choice of standing on his right or left leg, or a cautious putting of one before the other, to the extent of a few inches, was the only source of amusement or variety within his reach. It was curious to observe the proceedings of many of the older birds. The din was incessant, and some seemed quite exhausted with screaming, or hearing others scream; for I could perceive them retiring from the main body to rest a while in perfect silence. Now and then, indeed, as if by mutual consent, the uproar entirely ceased, and the whole body settled on a rocky inclined plain, interspersed with grass, of some extent, just below the light-keepers' dwellings, which formed their grand nursery establishment; for there, in every stage of growth, hundreds of young ones were moving about; I conclude that each parent had a perfect knowledge of its own nestlings, though, generally speaking, there were no striking symptoms of recognition; apparently, old and young seemed to mingle without much reference to relationship, and a stranger might have supposed that there was a community of offspring. The only sign of attachment I remarked, was, that an old bird would now and then fix its eye in a more pointed manner on some one of these movable puff-balls of downy feathers, and then suddenly opening its mouth, deposit at the feet of the fledgling, a crawful of half-digested shrimps or soft crabs. Numerous as they are even now, before the erection of the light-house and bridge, these assemblages in the breeding season were tenfold greater. When the works were commenced in the spring of 1808, the unusual appearance of persons on the island, with their operations of blasting, &c. so disturbed the proceedings of the birds who had recently arrived, that with the exception of one solitary pair of gulls, the whole body, including guillemots and razor-bills, took to flight, leaving the intruders in full possession of a spot which they, from time unknown, had occupied by a sort of prescriptive right, although occasionally annoyed by other birds, as well as accidental visitors from the mainland. This solitary pair had taken post on that inaccessible plateau of bare rock where I noticed the single young gull, and seemed to be aware that nothing but shot or stones could dislodge them. Their determined confidence in the security of their stronghold met with its due reward, orders being issued that none should molest them. The consequence was, that in a short time they became quite familiarized to the noise and bustle, and remained until their young were reared, and in a condition to shift for themselves.

In the ensuing spring, the same pair, as was supposed, retook possession of their old post, and strict orders, as before, were given, on no account to disturb them, and as a further protection, no fire-arms were allowed to be used, and any strangers disregarding these rules were not to be admitted again on the island. In consequence of a rigid attention to these humane regulations the same pair continued for five successive years to visit the same ledge, and rear their young, consisting generally of two, and never exceeding three in number. But although only this single pair were observed to breed on the island, a considerable number at times, as if aware of their security, sought shelter, denied them on the mainland, where, notwithstanding the bare and perpendicular character of the precipices, there was scarcely a spot among the clefts and hollows to which the young men and boys of the neighbourhood did not find their way in search of eggs, for which they found a ready demand.

The main body of gulls at length, finding that these wonted haunts no longer afforded security, and whether taught by the experience of the above pair, or from their own observation, in the spring of the sixth year took refuge in the island, chiefly on the south side, and on the inclined plain before mentioned, where they have remained during the breeding season ever since, and on this spot, in particular, their artless nests are spread in such numbers, that it is difficult at times to avoid treading upon them. It is remarkable, however, that only two pair of the black-beaked gulls returned, and these, according to their usual habits, not only build apart, but never herd with the rest. Neither have the razor-bills and guillemots re-established themselves in the same abundance, or with the same apparent confidence, which may in some degree be accounted for by the parts of the rock most suited to their habits having been more or less used as landing-places.

But although these poor birds have, contrary to the general rule, found a protector in man, they are not entirely without their troubles and annoyances. Certain crows, the light-keepers say, a pair only of one particular species, come at the same time, and build their nest just opposite the Stack, as if for the express purpose of harassing and stealing their eggs. For no sooner do the gulls begin to lay, than these two crows are perpetually on the look-out, frequently hovering over and watching for an opportunity to carry off a prize. The moment the thieves appear, the whole gull colony is in a state of commotion and consternation; those on their nests cowering over their new-laid treasures, while the others, by their screams and menacing attitudes, do their best to frighten and drive the marauders away; but the cunning crows usually gain their point. Watching an opportunity, down they pounce, pierce an egg with their sharp beak, and fly off with it in a trice. The light-keepers assert, that these crows are of a species known only in Ireland, and never, with the exception of these two individuals, seen in Anglesey; from their description, I have, however, no doubt of its being the hooded or Royston crow (corvus cornix), well known in many parts of England, and in the north, very destructive to the eggs and young of the red grouse. A curious circumstance fell under the observation of the light-keeper: a pair of these birds had for some years frequented the same spot, when one season the female was shot, and the male almost immediately disappeared, remaining absent for the space of three or four days, when he returned with another partner, and the business of nidification was carried on as before.

The gulls, at this season so numerous on the island and adjacent coast, disperse themselves for half the year, and are never seen congregated in great numbers, except when attracted by shoals of herrings, or some similar cause; but it is positively asserted by the light-keepers, as a very extraordinary fact, that they all instinctively return to the South Stack on the same night, viz. the 10th February, and retire, with the exception of those that, having been robbed on the main, had resorted to the island to renew the labours of incubation on the night of the 12th August. The keepers state that, in the middle of the former night, they are warned of their arrival by a great noise, as it were a mutual greeting and cheering, adding, that they look to their return as that of so many old acquaintances after a long absence, announcing the winter to be over, and spring approaching. For a time they appear to congregate together without any order whatever; but in the course of a month, begin to pair, and getting their nests in readiness, proceed to lay their eggs. (On a lonely spot, facing the South Stack, a couple, of what are familiarly here termed mountain hawks, but which I ascertained to be the peregrine falcon (falco peregrinus), annually build; and as they occasionally give chase to the sea-birds, they are frequently brought under the notice of the light-keepers. One day the hawk was seen pursuing a razor-bill, but aware probably of the toughness of its skin, instead of assaulting his prey with the usual death-pounce from the beak, he seized the unfortunate bird by the head with both his claws, and made towards the land, his prisoner croaking, screaming, and struggling lustily. Being a heavy bird, he so far incumbered or overbalanced his aggressor, that both descended fast towards the sea; when just as they touched the water, the falcon let go his hold and ascended, the razor-bill as instantaneously diving below.

About sixty years ago, an American ship was lost near the sound between the South Stack and the Main, when a great number of rats, described to be of a very large size, probably the Norway rat (mus decumanus), landed upon the island, where their descendants remained until about six years ago, to the great annoyance of the light-keepers, who adopted every possible means to get rid of them, by poison, guns, dogs, and traps; a considerable number were at length killed, and probably this incessant warfare decided them upon decamping, which they did, it is supposed, in a body, at the same time, for not one has been ever seen on the island since a particular night. There is, moreover, good reason for believing that they not only went off in a body, but to the same identical spot, as immediately afterwards the nearest farm-yard at Tynmawr, about a mile from the head of the Stairs Inland, was found to be overrun with them; and in one rick of corn, which was nearly half consumed, no less than eighty were killed in making their escape. I believe no other wild quadrupeds breed on the island; but ~~squirrels~~ and weasels frequently destroy ~~tame~~ rabbits kept near the dwelling-houses; and that they come from the mainland cannot be doubted, half-consumed dead rabbits having been found on the bridge, evidently the prey of these animals endeavouring to carry them off. In endeavouring to collect any particulars tending to throw light upon the mysterious subject of migration, I ascertained that five woodcocks, and several small birds, such as thrushes, &c. had flown against the plate-glass reflectors with such force as to kill themselves, not always coming from seaward, but often from the land; and I was further assured, that they invariably, in these cases, came from leeward, flying against the wind.

On crossing the bridge, the visitor will find a commodious ascent up a steep zig-zag flight of 374 steps, hewn out of the rock, commanding, at its various angles and windings, a near and picturesque view of precipices on every side; and if he is fortunate, he may peradventure have an opportunity of witnessing the frightful risks to which human beings will fearlessly expose themselves in search of eggs, or samphire (erithimum maritimum), equally "dreadful trade." The latter however, I believe, is chiefly found on the precipitous rocks to the eastward. That nine-tenths of these adventurers do not come to untimely ends, must be matter of astonishment to all who see on what apparently rotten or slender tackling their existence depends. Held on by an urchin or two, heedless of consequences, and often inefficient in bodily strength, a lad will lower himself with perfect sans-froid down the face of a precipice, enough to curdle one's blood to look upon, and on reaching a ledge, barely wide enough to admit the foot of a goat, away will he scramble with .. without the rope, according to circumstances, to pillage the nest of a gull, which, if aware of its own powers, might not only baffle his attempt, but flap him headlong to the bottom. Wonderful, however, to say, very few fatal slips are on record; but narrow escapes naturally enough occur frequently. A lady living near this part of the coast, dispatched a boy in search of samphire, with a trusty servant to hold the rope at the top; while the boy was dangling in her service midway between sky and water, whether unused to his situation, a sudden dizziness from looking downwards at the boy's motions, or misgivings as to his own powers of holding him up, I cannot say, but it so happened that the servant felt a cold sickly shivering creeping over him, accompanied with a certainty that he was about to faint, the inevitable consequence of which, he had sense enough left to know, would be the unavoidable death of the boy, and the probability of his own, as in the act of swooning, it was most likely he would fall forward, and follow the rope. In this dilemma he uttered a loud despairing scream—by good fortune a woman working in an adjoining field heard him, ran up just in time, and caught the rope as the fainting man fell senseless at her feet.

On reaching the summit of the headland, a walk of about a mile to the left leads to the signal station, an establishment connected with two different departments, one belonging to government, to report the arrival of the packets, and other information connected with the public service; the other under the control of individuals, for the purpose of conveying, by telegraphic signals, to Liverpool, notices of homeward or outward bound vessels. This was the station which so severely felt the effects of the lightning alluded to before, when we passed the avalanche of fragments shattered from their primeval resting-place, and forming part of the surface of rock near the North Stack. It was soon after midnight on that dreadful night, when the electric fluid seemed to be in action over the whole body of the mountain, from its apex to its base, that a servant girl, sleeping with two children in the signal cottage, was roused to a sense of her danger, by a crash which shook the house to its foundation. The lightning stripping the shutters, and displacing a large bow-window, entered the bedroom of the signal-man, who was asleep with his two other children, one of whom and the father were scorched, the latter from the middle of the thigh, in a spiral form up to his neck, burning several holes in his flannel waistcoat, which, with the shock, rendered him some time senseless. On examining the room, it was found that the bed-posts were all broken, the curtain rods melted, the pillow of the bed ripped up in all directions, the clock-case and the bell shivered to atoms, the wainscot, and the dresser behind it, cut to pieces, the front door forced some yards out, a large shelf above the kitchen fire-place forced through the front window, and three of the beams that supported the deck roof broken, forcing all the others out of their sockets. It then tore a hole through a twenty-inch stone-wall, and made its way into another bedroom, where it shivered to pieces all the furniture, iron pots, earthenware, &c., also the wainscoting of the bedroom in which the servant maid and children lay, but without doing them material injury. It then made its way through another twenty-inch stone-wall, into the store-room, where it wrenched from the wall a large cupboard, shivering to pieces its front, shelves, and all the paint-pots, glass, &c. that it contained; then through the foundation of the building, and destroying large stones, it finally furrowed up the pavement, and disappeared through a potato clump twenty yards off. It is a singular fact, that the only article untouched, was a chest containing some dozen cartridges used for signal guns, which, had they exploded, would have blown up the building, and destroyed every individual in it. A brass pan was also blown from a shelf, bottom upwards, upon a turf fire, blazing on the hearth-stone, thereby preventing that destructive element from doing further mischief. The servant, after recovering from her fright, called to her master, but receiving no answer, scrambled over the wreck, and succeeded in taking him out, placed him under a wall some yards from the place, and then carried two of the children, and led the other two, all with scarcely any clothing, to a house at the foot of the mountain, full half a mile distant. Then returning to her master, she found him still senseless in the place where she had deposited him; by proper treatment he was gradually restored, though, for a time, it was feared he would lose his sight; this, however, he at length recovered, with the exception of an occasional weakness, which still remains.

The summit of the mountain not far distant, is in the centre of a very extensive area, surrounded by a rude stone-wall, usually assigned to the Romans, though probably of much more remote antiquity. That the Romans may have occupied it as a post, there can, indeed, be no doubt, as seven very fine coins, of the date of Constantine, were lately found on the mountain; and a small inlet and island, about four miles S.E. of Holyhead, still bear the name of Portl and Ynys Diana, (Port and Island of Diana.) Near this latter spot, is a small sandy bay, called Portl y Capel, (Port of the Chapel,) on the borders of which a tumulus of considerable elevation is surmounted by the ruins of a chapel, much resembling, in size, construction, and form, Capel Llochwydd on the mountains. Of late years, the sea has made extensive encroachments on the shores of this bay, and almost entirely laid bare the seaward face of the mound, and strewed the whole surface with human bones, evidently shewing that it was of artificial origin, erected over the remains of a considerable number of bodies. The spot deserves the minute attention of the antiquarian. From an examination of the lower strata, and, indeed, the occasional heterogeneous manner of many of the upper deposits, it would seem that they are the remains of bodies collected after a battle, and thrown together without reference to order; but in other places, entire skeletons are deposited in rude graves, formed of, and covered in with, small laminar slabs. On a slight search, I discovered the entire remains of an infant, as well as others of full-grown persons; and about a year ago, a small tin box was picked out of one of these graves, containing ornaments, which, from all that now can be collected, (for the boys who discovered them threw them away as valueless,) were probably necklaces and ear-rings; the box, however, which I saw, was in too perfect a state to have been of Roman manufacture, and rather inclined me to conclude that, as was often the case, this sepulchral monument, be its antiquity what it may, acquired a sanctity which rendered it a favourite depository for the dead, till much later times.

One thing I must remark, which, though possibly accidental, may be of importance in establishing, if not the exact date, at least the race of people by whom it was originally formed. I observed that most, rather, I should say, all those rude graves, whose directions I could accurately ascertain, as well as the position of some of the lower skeletons, were placed north and south. And I further ascertained, from an intelligent friend, that some skeletons discovered in forming a road in the island, not many years ago, were also laid in the same direction. It would be far too wide a field, in an article like the present, to enter into the manifold, and, I think, convincing proofs, that the early Northern and Indian nations were of one and the same stock, and to trace, from a knowledge of the latter, their mysterious veneration for the north. Suffice it to say, that as the main front and gateways of the great Jain temple at Ajmir were due north, so do we find that the passages of some of the most celebrated of the ancient temples of the sun-worshippers, who originally peopled this country, invariably, for some equally mysterious cause, were also north and south; for example, that of Grian-an (signifying literally the place of the sun, or appertaining unto the sun,) on Greenan mountain, in Doungal; and it may be observed, that this and many similar ruins have, by antiquarians, been compared and classed with the circular erections on the mountain of Holyhead. -- Time warns me to conclude, or I might say a few words upon the holy legends of this sacred mountain. I might speak of the discourses held by its patron saint, the holy Gybi, with his brethren, on the isle of Baedre, or enquire into the possible causes which prompt him at daily dawn, as the chronicles have it, to walk forth upon the waters to meet the patron saint of the Ormshead, and then having met and spoken, why each turns upon his heel, and retires by the way he came; thus, by Gybi's morning course being ever towards the east, and his evening towards the west, and the sun's rays thus ever falling upon his face, his countenance is described to be dark and sunburnt; whereas that of his companion being ever in a counter direction, beholdeth not the sunbeam, and is, therefore, fair and comely to look upon. But upon matters of such high import, I feel some hesitation in speaking without more consideration and deliberation than are now at my command.

ON THE LATE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

No. II.

ERROR is never so dangerous as when it is involved in propositions containing a large intermixture of truth. The shades of difference between what is just and what is erroneous in human affairs, are so evanescent; the distinction on which they are founded so subtle; that they entirely escape the observation of the generality of mankind; and entire generations, deceived by the obvious truth with which the falsehood is blended, implicitly adopt the whole, and rush on their own destruction, in the sincere belief that they are adopting the only means capable of averting it.

It is thus that the empiric deceives so large a portion of mankind in private life. He adopts a bold and hazardous course, well adapted for most cases, utterly ruinous in others. Ignorant of the symptoms which distinguish the situations where it should, from those where it should not, be applied, he practises in the same way in all. The public, deceived by the undoubted cures which he effects in the first class of cases, never anticipate the danger to be incurred in the last; and unfortunate victims are sent to their graves, from no bad intention on any part, but from not accurately distinguishing the circumstances in which the practice is safe, from those in which it is dangerous, and yielding implicit confidence where experience proves it is misapplied.

National diseases have their empirics, as well as those of individuals: whole generations are seized with fatal prepossessions, as well as high-born dames: the ablest and wisest men are misled by the intermixture of error with truth, as well as the thoughtless votaries of fashion.

In no instance is the truth of these principles more obvious, than in the opinions now generally received as to the expedience of concession to the demands of the people, in periods of great political excitement.

Timely concession, it is said, is the only way to prevent disaster. The disturbances which afflict society are almost all to be ascribed to the obstinate adherence to old institutions, in circumstances where the state of society requires their modification. Change, in time, is reformation; when too late, revolution.

The observation is perfectly just in one sense, and when applied to trouble springing from one cause; and perfectly erroneous in another, and when applied to discontent springing from a different source. It is only by attending to the distinction between the two great objects of popular ambition, that the different practice to be adopted in different situations can be distinguished: and the means attained of allaying public discontent, without unhinging the frame of society.

There is, in the first place, the love of freedom, properly so called, that is, of immunity from restriction, oppression, or injury. This principle is perfectly innocent, and is the spring of all elevation of individual character, and all improvement of political condition. Every concession which is calculated to increase this species of liberty, is safe in all ages and in all places. No matter how strong political excitement may be, if it is directed towards the redress of practical grievances, it cannot be too soon allayed by their removal.

But there is another and a different principle, strong at all times, but particularly to be dreaded in moments of agitation. This is the principle of democratic ambition; the desire on the part of the lower orders of exercising the power of sovereignty, of usurping the government of the state. This is the dangerous principle; the desire, not of exercising industry without molestation, but power without control.

Such is the intermixture of good and evil which is contained in the cup of liberty, as in every other part of human affairs. From the first principle have sprung the greatest and most glorious effects in the history of the world; the arts of Greece, the arms of Rome, the taste of Italy, and the navy of England. From the last, the most dreadful disasters which have ever afflicted humanity; the factions of Athens, the proscriptions of Rome, the discord of the Italian commonwealth, the bloody sway of the French republic.

But the dangers of the democratic spirit, great in all circumstances, and such as they have been in all ages where freedom has existed, are nothing to what may be anticipated, and have been experienced in modern times. The republics of antiquity, and of the middle ages, were confined to mere towns: Freedom was experienced only by their citizens, the storms of faction were limited to the discussions in the forum. But the discovery of printing, amidst its other incalculable consequences, has spread the means of thinking and acting on political subjects among the whole community. Journals have assumed the place of orators and demagogues: the influence of the editors of newspapers almost superseded that of parliamentary leaders. The storms of faction are not now confined to the forum of Rome, the Place of St Marc at Venice, or the market-place at Ghent; they are diffused over immense nations, and embrace millions of mankind. They are not, as Voltaire said of the factions at Geneva, "storms in a teacup," but the vast swell of the Atlantic, wafted from distant lands, and heaved on the bosom of an insurgent ocean.

The first principle, the love of real freedom, will only produce disturbances where actual evils have been felt; and with their removal, the restoration of tranquillity may be anticipated. The second, or the passion for power, frequently occasions convulsions, independent of any real cause of complaint; or, if they have been excited by such, they continue after the grievance has been removed. The first never spreads by mere contagion; the second is frequently most virulent when the disease has been contracted in this manner.

The love of freedom may always be distinguished from the passion for power. The one is directed to objects of practical importance, and the redress of experienced wrongs; the other aims at visionary improvement, and the increase of democratic influence. The one complains of what has been felt, the other anticipates what may be gained. Disturbances arising from the first, subside when the evils from which they sprung are removed. Troubles originating in the second, magnify with every victory which is achieved. Experienced evil is the cause of agitation from the first: anticipated power the source of convulsion from the last. Reform and concession are the remedies appropriate to the former: steadiness and resistance, the means of extinguishing the flame originating in the latter.

The greatest political errors which have ever desolated the world, have arisen from confounding these opposite principles. They produce the same effects, popular complaint, and disaffection; but the modes of allaying them are as opposite as light and darkness. The concession which is calculated to allay the discontent arising from real suffering, adds fuel to the flame of democratic ambition. The more the latter gains, the more it desires: so long as power or influence are in the hands of their superiors, so long will it never cease to envy and assail them.

In moments of political agitation, it should be the object of the statesman to remove all real causes of complaint, but firmly resist the encroachments of popular ambition. All restrictions upon personal liberty, all oppressive taxes, all odious civil distinctions should be abandoned; all prosecutions calculated to inflame the passions, and convert a demagogue into a martyr, should be avoided. If punishment is required, the mildest which the case will admit, should be selected; in choosing the species of prosecution, the least vindictive should be preferred. The inflicting of death should, above all things, be avoided, unless for crimes which public feeling has stigmatized as worthy of that penalty. But having conceded thus much to the principles of justice, and the growth of freedom, all measures calculated suddenly to augment the power of the people, should be firmly resisted, and nothing yielded likely to inflame the passion of democracy. During the flames of a fever, is not the moment to stimulate the frame by ardent spirits.

The expansion of popular power should be left for cooler moments, and made to take place by insensible additions. It is thus that all the great changes of nature are effected. The darkness of winter melts into the light of summer, without any day being sensibly longer than the one which preceded it. All violent and sudden accessions of power are dangerous to society,—ruinous to those who receive them. The riches of harvest are gradually ripened by the increasing warmth of summer; but what would be the consequence if the sun of July were suddenly to succeed the chill of February?

Reflections of this sort are naturally produced, upon comparing the present state of public feeling in Great Britain with that which preceded in France the first Revolution. They cannot be useless at this moment. Past experience is the best guide to future safety. • •

For some years previous to the first Revolution, a vague feeling of disquietude pervaded France. The weight of the public debt was excessive, and totally disproportioned to the revenues of the state; increasing burdens, and diminishing income, daily augmented the embarrassments of the financiers; the Parliament of Paris and the provinces were refractory, and refused to register the edicts of taxation, or sanction the loans that had been contracted by the royal authority; the people groined beneath the weight of feudal servitude and oppressive taxation; the middling ranks were impatient under the invidious distinctions between them and the privileged classes. A general cry for Reformation pervaded the nation; from the peasants, for liberation from their burdens; among the burghers, for extension of their civil rights.*

No administration, in such arduous times, was able, for any length of time, to maintain its place at the head of affairs. It was in vain that the old courtier, Maurepas, called to his aid the enlightened Turgot, and the virtuous Malesherbes, to combine the favour of the people with the support of the court. The reform which they attempted, excited the jealousy of the noblesse, and they were overturned. Calonne next endeavoured, by a profuse expenditure, to increase the public activity, and put in practice his favourite maxim, that “prodigality is a large economy;” but the contraction of new debt soon brought matters to a crisis, and the discovery of an annual deficit of L.7,000,000, overthrew his administration. The Archbishop of Sens then succeeded, and, yielding to the increasing clamour of the nation, agreed to convoke the States-General in 1789; but being unable to avert a national bankruptcy, or provide funds for the public creditors, he, too, was compelled to yield, and Neckar, the idol of the populace, was recalled.

Two courses to alleviate the public suffering, presented themselves to the Swiss minister. The first was to redress the real and experienced grievances of the people; the second, to seek their favour by the concession of political power. Turgot had been the great advocate of the former: he himself had always espoused the latter. In an evil hour he made his election for the adoption of his favourite democratic principles, yielding to the following considerations:—

“It is in vain,” it was said, “to argue that the representation, as it stood on the last convocation of the States General, in 1614, is to regulate the National Assembly in 1789. New cities have arisen, new districts have been covered with inhabitants: the relative importance of the nobility and the commons, have been totally changed by the lapse of time.† Something is necessary to tranquilize the public mind: the only way to prevent a revolution, is to remove the causes of popular complaint.”

These considerations prevailed with the liberal administration of France, and Neckar, to tranquilize the country, and gain the discontented party to his side, obtained an ordinance of the king, increasing to a considerable degree the number of popular representatives in the approaching States General. Tranquillity, gratitude, and peace were anticipated from this liberal concession to the popular party; and what was the consequence? Did it satisfy the public mind; did it put a stop to the clamour for innovation; did it avert the horrors of the revolution? The answer will be found in the words of the man in existence who gained most by the revolution, Napoleon Bonaparte. "The concessions of Neckar, were the work of a man ignorant of the first principles of the government of mankind. It was he who overturned the monarchy, and brought Louis XVI. to the scaffold. Marat, Danton, Robespierre himself, have done less mischief to France than Neckar: It was he that brought about the revolution. I have lived through it. I have witnessed those days of disaster and public mourning; but be assured, while I live, they shall never return. Such reformers as M. Neckar, such framers of Utopian plans of government, do incredible mischief. The weak read their works; the populace are carried away by them. The public happiness is in every mouth, and soon after, the people find themselves without bread; they revolt, and that is all that is gained by such theories. Neckar was the author of all the evils which have desolated France during the revolution: all the blood shed during it rests on his head."*

In truth, it is not difficult to perceive that nothing can be so dangerous as to give any considerable accession to the power of the people, during a period of public excitement. It is an equal error to augment their power, in such circumstances, as to repress it with undue severity in prior periods of tranquillity. Neckar granted to the tiers état, a great accession of numbers; he gave representatives to many places which had previously possessed none, and by these liberal concessions, he hoped to have allayed the public discontents. Immediately after the meeting of the States General, viz. on 23d June, 1789, the king published an ordinance, which, even according to the admission of the republicans, redressed all the real evils of France.† Thus the people had obtained parliamentary reform, and all their practical causes of complaint were removed. And what was the consequence? Were the commons satisfied with the advantages they had gained? Were the new representatives inclined to support the cause of order? Their conduct was diametrically the reverse. No sooner had they obtained real freedom, no sooner had they got quit of the feudal fetters, than they were seized with the passion for political power: their very first act was an usurpation of the rights of sovereignty; they subverted the constitution of the monarchy, by compelling the other orders to form one assembly with them, instead of voting according to immemorial usage in separate houses; and then, by the force of numerical majorities, confiscated the whole property of the church; struck off two-thirds of the national debt; abolished titles of dignity, and the right of primogeniture; and established the most thorough democracy which the world had ever beheld.

Nor was the fate of this popular minister—this champion of the commons of France—this leader of Parliamentary Reform, less remarkable than the consequences of the measure which he introduced. For a few weeks, he was hailed by the shouts of the multitude; and when the king, acting under the influence of other councils, dismissed him from the ministry, he was brought back from Coppet, in Switzerland, by the popular voice, in triumph, equalled only by the return of Napoleon from Elba. But, from that day, his popularity declined. The popular party having gained their object of augmenting their own forces in the constituent assembly, speedily abandoned the minister who had conceded that great addition to their power; dismissed by the assembly, who now adopted other leaders, more audacious and less honest than himself, he was arrested by the populace on the very road which he had recently traversed in triumph, and compelled to sue for permission to leave France, from that very assembly which owed its elevation to his concessions.

There can be no greater error than to suppose, that because the concession to popular desire for power is supported by many of the wisest and most generous men,—because it can boast of partisans among the most enlightened of the nobility,—because it seems to be almost the unanimous wish of the whole writers and orators of the day, that therefore it is not fraught, in periods of excitement, with the utmost danger. It is chiefly to be dreaded, because it is introduced under such auspices: and men of inferior weight could not let loose, though they might flow with the current. The duplication of the tiers état in France—that fatal measure which brought on the Revolution—was supported by the greatest statesmen of the day. There are, doubtless, many great and good men, who now support the cause of Parliamentary Reform; but they are neither more virtuous than Turgot and Neckar, nor abler than Mirabeau and Bailly. Yet the concessions of these great men are now universally admitted to have been the immediate cause of the Revolution. “No revolution,” says Madame de Staël, “can succeed in a great country, unless it is commenced by the aristocratical class; the people afterwards get possession of it, but they cannot strike the first blow. When I recollect that it was the Parliament, the nobles, the clergy, who first strove to extend the power of the people in France, I am far from intending to insinuate that their design in doing so was culpable; a sincere enthusiasm then animated all ranks of Frenchmen; public spirit had spread universally; and among the higher ranks, the most enlightened and generous were those who most ardently desired that public opinion should have its due weight in the direction of affairs. But can the privileged ranks who commence a revolution accuse those who carry it on? Some will say, we wished only to go a certain length, others, a step farther; but who can regulate the impulse of a great people when the torrent is once let loose?” These are the words of M. Neckar’s daughter, the intrepid defender and faithful worshipper of her father’s memory; herself one of the greatest characters of the age, and the warmest friend of the cause of freedom. She had lived to see the consequences of those concessions to the people, which her father was the first to support.

We are not in the least moved by the great names who now, seriously and conscientiously, support the extension of the popular representatives. We have seen many delusions as great, universally prevalent; we have seen the whole public press of the country unanimous one year in support of opinions, which in the next were universally abandoned. The existence of a general clamour in newspapers, orators, and public meetings, proves that the passions are afloat, not that reason is predominant.

During the whole of 1828, the journals, not only of England, but of Europe, were unanimous in maintaining that the Russian arms had experienced the greatest disasters. No one ventured to assert that the Ottoman forces would not be triumphant. “The Sultan has saved himself by his firmness, and Europe by his example,” was the language universally used by all the writers, orators, and popular men in Europe. The retreat of the Russians, on the close of the campaign, was hailed with almost as much exultation as the flight of Napoleon from Moscow. It was in vain that a few individuals, who attended to the facts, observed that the Russians had conquered in that campaign half the Turkish empire in Europe; that the loss of the Danube deprived the Ottomans of their chief source of revenue; and the possession of Varna gave their enemies a seaport, the key to the Balkan, and the outwork of Constantinople. All such opinions were treated with utter disdain.

A year passed over: the Russian soldiers, issuing from the stronghold of Varna, captured Silistria, defeated the Grand Vizier on June 11, crossed the Balkan, took Adrianople, and dictated peace almost within sight of the seraglio. Confounded and perplexed by such events, the journals of Europe were silenced, and the unanimous opinion of 1828 was, in 1829, unanimously abandoned.

Concession to the Catholics, it was universally said by the ablest men in Britain, would extinguish the jealousies and animosities of Ireland. Religious rancour would no longer distract that beautiful island: the great military force hitherto maintained in it would be withdrawn for the protection of the rest of the empire, and instead of a focus of sedition it would become a fortress of loyalty. This measure, in itself just and reasonable, was carried by a great exertion of ministerial vigour and capacity; and what was the consequence? Is Ireland less formidable to Britain, her peasantry less discontented, her Members of Parliament more grateful than before? Have any of the troops who compose her garrisons been withdrawn to protect the south of England from violence and conflagration? The fact is notoriously the reverse, the democratic spirit has come instead of religious fervour; Repeal of the Union has become the war-cry instead of Catholic emancipation; and the bitterest enemies of the late ministry, have been those very men who owed their seat in the Legislature to their exertions.

The great error of the friends of order in the present time, consists in not attending to the ultimate consequences of the concessions to the democratic part of the constitution, which are now proposed. They see it brought forward by able and enlightened men; splendid orators and gifted statesmen; supported by those who have a great stake in the country, and whose interests are decidedly adverse to popular violence. Nothing brought forward by such men, it is thought, can have a revolutionary tendency. This is perfectly true, with reference to the measures which will be proposed by them. But the question is, if they give an impulse to democratic ambition by conceding one point, will the government be hereafter able to resist additional concession, when demanded by an inferior class, roused to revolutionary energy by the hope and ambition which the first victory of the people will inspire?

Democratic ambition, it is always to be recollected, is insatiable; it will never rest satisfied till all the power of government is at the immediate disposal of the people. It is totally unlike the discontent arising from oppression; like all other passions, it is repressed by the absence, and increased by the revival of hope. It is never so strong as when it has the nearest prospect of complete gratification.

A signal proof of the truth of these observations occurred in both the French revolutions. The revolutionary energy of France was quadrupled by the duplication of the tiers état; it multiplied an hundred-fold with the Tennis Court oath. "The Commission proposed by the King on 23d June, 1789," said Mirabeau, "would have been hailed with transport two years ago; now it is too late." Why was it too late? Because in the interval Necker had yielded to popular clamour; because he had doubled the number of the Commons and excited the revolutionary ardour of all classes by this extraordinary addition to the power of the people.

"The consequences of the revolt of July 14th and the capture of the Bastille," says Mignet, "were immense. Half a million of National Guards immediately rose into action; the movement of the Revolution became irresistible."† This is the language of the ablest of the republican historians—this was the consequence of the next victory of the people. So far from inspiring moderation, it increased audacity; because the spirit which got possession of the nation was not the desire of freedom, but the passion for power.

Twenty pieces of cannon, guided by a Ney, a Drouot, or a Murat, placed in battery at the Louvre, on July 28, 1830, would have changed the destinies of France. They would have crushed a hydra which five hundred thousand brave men now could not overcome. Such are the consequences of irresolution and unbecallity, in resisting the first attacks of revolutionary aggression.

Napoleon knew well how to act against popular insurrections—no man understood better that the way to quiet the people was not to yield to their demands. On the 2d October, 1795, all Paris was in insurrection against the government of the Convention; 40,000 National Guards, well armed and disciplined, and animated by the utmost enthusiasm, advanced against the Tuileries, defended only by five thousand regular troops and a train of heavy artillery. But these troops were commanded by Napoleon. Menou had nearly ruined the government by his irresolution on the preceding day—the committees of government—the Convention were trembling; proposals of capitulation to the insurgent capital were openly made in the Assembly. But Napoleon was immovable. A few discharges of grape-shot from his powerful batteries dispersed the dense columns of the assailants; and a revolt which, if successful, would have changed the destinies of the world, was extinguished in three hours.

On July 28, 1830, the same posts at the Tuileries were attacked by a mob, not exceeding 6000 men, imperfectly armed, and totally undisciplined; but they were not met by Napoleon. The whole effective regular forces in the city did not then amount to 5000 men; they had only eight pieces of cannon, and only four rounds of grape were discharged in the whole three days' conflict.* The consequence was, the Tuileries were forced, the government overturned, the disaffected over all France roused into action, revolutionary hopes universally diffused, the dynasty of Belgium overthrown, and Europe threatened with a general war.

Such are the different effects of steady resistance, and imbecile submission to popular clamour.

Where was it that the Revolutionary spirit so powerfully excited by these memorable events was arrested? Was it by the system of concession and temporization which went on at Brussels at the commencement of the revolt, or the feeble and dastardly attack of the Dutch troops? It was by the fire of the citadel of Antwerp:

Had General Chasse commanded at Paris, the approaching devastation of Europe would have been averted.

We do not make these remarks in order to recommend any illegal or violent acts on the part of government. We have an utter horror for all coups d'état, especially when supported by five thousand men, and four rounds of grape shot. The steadiest adherence to existing law, the most rigid observance of the Rights of the People, should form the leading principle of every administration: nay, the existence of public excitement is a sufficient reason for selecting this as the period for the most anxious examination into any real grievances that may oppress the people, and the immediate repeal of all restrictions on, or unnecessary burdens on, public industry. But while all this is conceded, the question still remains, is this the time for a great and unprecedented addition to the powers of the people? When the democratic spirit has been every where set afloat by the extraordinary success of the Belgian and French Revolutions; when the daring, the reckless, the desperate, are only waiting the commencement of any considerable change to work upon the people by their ambitious projects; is it a fitting season to give a greater increase to the popular part of the constitution than it has received since the Norman Conquest? is there no danger that if the relative strength of the opposing forces in the machine is so suddenly changed, its balance may be subverted, and the flywheel become incapable of regulating its movements?

There is a principle in the constitution which admits of a progressive and gradual addition to the democratic part of the state; and we deeply lament that it has not been matured into a regular system. This is in the disfranchisement of such boroughs as are convicted of corruption, and the transference of their right of electing to the most considerable manufacturing cities. Such a system would produce that gradual addition to the democratic power in the constitution, which is consistent with the equilibrium of the whole. Were it fixed by act of Parliament, that as soon as any borough is disfranchised for corruption, its member should be returned by the unrepresented town, containing the greatest population, a clear inlet would be opened for the gradual extension of popular power. It is just because we feel strongly the benefit of any such progressive change that we deprecate the introduction of any sudden and general measure at this juncture.

The Duke of Wellington's declaration against Reform in the House of Lords has been more the subject of obloquy than any statement by a minister in the recollection of any man living. So also was the battle of Navarino: the most glorious event almost that ever graced the annals of Britain, the justest and "bravest deed" ever done by a Christian power. Yet who now concurs in the vituperation that was once lavished on that heroic achievement? We are proud to take the lead in dissenting from the clamour; and in recording the assertion on Feb. 1, 1831, that, situated as the country was, assailed by domestic incendiaries, and convulsed by foreign revolutionary example, it was the wisest statement that could then have been made by a Prime Minister. General dissent will probably be expressed against this opinion: and it will be said, timely concession was the only way to avert a revolution. We shall see, when it becomes matter of history, to which side the verdict of reason will incline.

From the language and conduct of all parties at the present crisis, one would imagine that the lessons of experience have been forgotten by the young, the experience of years by the old. The 13th Charles II. c. 32, enacts, "That no person or persons shall repair to his Majesty, or both or either Houses of Parliament upon pretence of presenting or delivering any petition, complaint, remonstrance, declaration, or other addresses, accompanied with excessive numbers of persons, nor at any one time with above the number of ten persons, under the penalty of £100 in money and three months' imprisonment." In the case of Lord George Gordon's riot in 1781, it was determined by Lord Mansfield, that this act was in full force. Nevertheless, in December 1830, a deputation of the trades of London, attended by 8000 persons bearing a tricolor flag, presented a congratulatory address to the sovereign.

We acquit all concerned in this measure of the remotest bad intention. We know the demeanour of the trades in the procession was perfectly becoming; and we have no doubt that the Government conscientiously believed, that contesting the point would have been productive of worse effects than conceding it to the people. But still the propriety of the measure remains a question, and it is material to attend to the consequences of the practice in the neighbouring kingdom.

Early in the revolution, the custom was introduced of presenting addresses to the French king by numerous deputations from different bodies, and for some time without any bad consequences. But what was conceded to one set of petitioners could not be refused to another; and what was yielded in periods of tranquillity as a measure of prudence, came to be demanded in moments of agitation as a matter of right. At length, on October 5, 1789, four months after the meeting of the States General, the scarcity of provisions in Paris, the natural consequence of a revolution, produced an unusual degree of excitement among the labouring classes. They set off in a body, 30,000 strong, to present their petitions to the king. La Fayette in vain endeavoured to induce the National Guard to resist the tumult: after labouring for five hours without intermission, he was obliged to yield to the torrent. A furious multitude of drunken men and abandoned women proceeded to Versailles, where they insulted the King, broke at midnight into the palace, ransacked the royal apartments, and pierced the bed of the Queen with their bayonets in spite at the escape of their victim. On the following day, the royal family were brought captives in mournful procession to Paris. "Two of the Body Guard, with all the parade of the execution of justice, were cruelly and publicly dragged to the block, their heads stuck upon spears, and led in the procession; while the royal captives, who followed in the train, were slowly moved along, amidst the horrid yells and thrilling screams, and frantic dances, and infamous contumelies of furies of hell in the abused shape of the vilest women. After they had been made to taste drop by drop more than the bitterness of death in the slow torture of a journey of twelve miles, protracted to six hours, they were, under a guard composed of those very soldiers who had thus conducted them through this mournful triumph, lodged in the old palace of the Tuileries, now become a Bastille for kings." ⁴

On June 20, 1792, when the passions of the people were wrought up to the highest pitch by the refusal of the king to sanction the inhuman laws against the nonjuring priests and emigrant nobility, an immense body of workmen proceeded from the Faubourg St Antoine to present a petition to the king, praying him to withdraw the veto. The unruly torrent first approached the National Assembly, and tumultuous bands defiled through the Hall of the Deputies, amidst the shouts of the Jacobins. Next, they inundated the Tuileries, filled every apartment of the palace, insulted the royal family, surrounded the king for hours with vociferous threats, and compelled him to put on, in derision, the red cap of liberty. The smallest accident on that day would have exposed to destruction the whole royal family.

On 2d June, 1793, forty thousand armed men proceeded to present a petition to the National Convention, that very democratic assembly which had so recently beheaded the king, praying for the immediate impeachment of six of its members. Beset on all sides, the deputies in vain endeavoured to impose on the people by the majesty of the legislature, and force a passage through the columns of the assailants; the insurgents pointed their cannons against the Assembly, and drove them back in dismay to their seat of deliberation. "Retire, deliberate, and obey!" said

Marat, and the trembling legislators, in momentary expectation of death, yielded to the demands of the sovereign multitude, and gave up the thirty-one illustrious leaders of the Gironde, the bravest and noblest republicans, to captivity and death. With the presenting of that petition commenced the Reign of Terror in France.

On the 20th May, 1795, an assemblage of the populace of Paris surrounded the Hall of the Convention to present a petition, praying for "bread and the constitution 1793." Unable to resist such formidable supplicants, the Convention were compelled to admit them to the bar of the Assembly. Vociferous multitudes defiled in their presence, exclaiming, "Bread and the constitution 1793!" Pikes and pistols were presented to the breast of the president, the deputy Feraud, who, with generous devotion, interposed his body, received a fatal stroke, and was seized by the mob. His body was dragged out and beheaded in the lobby; and the murderers returned with the head on a pike, and presented it to Boissy d'Anglas, the president of the Assembly. With Roman constancy he bowed before the lifeless remains of duty and devotion, and was at length dragged by his friends from the jaws of destruction.

All these petitioners founded their right to be received en masse upon the practice of such petitions having been admitted in the commencement of the revolution. They were all preceded by the tri-color flag.

And, on the 7th December, 1830, a petition was presented to the King of England by eight thousand persons, bearing, amongst other banners, the tri-color flag.

Was the flag of England, that which waved at Cressy, and Hohenlind, and Waterloo, then not sufficient? Were the citizens of London driven to seek devices from the French republic in consequence of the absence of any heart-stirring emblems in the records of their own city? Truly, the present generation of English seem to have forgot the ancient glories of their race.

The danger to be apprehended, we repeat, is not from the present administration, or the immediate and foreseen consequences of any measure which they may bring forward. Neither was the danger to France, from the anticipated effects of the increase of the Commons by Neckar. Yet that fatal measure immediately brought on the Revolution. It is the ultimate consequences of the concessions to the people now so much the object of encomium, which are to be dreaded. It is the spirit which they will excite, the hopes they will revive, the passions they will awaken. The spirit which revolutionized France was excited by sudden additions to the popular representations brought forward by men as great, supported by arguments as plausible as those which are now arrayed on the side of reform. But these great and good men were speedily overthrown by the democratic energy which they had excited; the idols of the people one day, they became the objects of universal execration the next, the moment they strove to moderate the fury on which they had risen to eminence. The present administration, like Lafayette, Mirabeau, and Bailly, will maintain their popularity as long as they concede to the demands of the people; the moment they oppose them, they will, like him, become the objects of popular detestation—and lament, when too late, the growth of a revolutionary spirit, which all the might of England will, perhaps, be unable to subdue.

The growth of this spirit has already been frightfully rapid. Since it was announced that reform was to be made a Cabinet measure, it has augmented tenfold—the vehemence of its partisans has increased in that short period to a degree unprecedented in the memory of man. Universal suffrage, vote by ballot, are talked of by the people as inevitable acquisitions. The addition of a hundred new members to the House of Commons from the commercial cities is spoken of as certain—an addition which will render the democratic party irresistible. “Were opinion,” says the Atlas, “not so strong and irresistible, the weakness or wickedness of nature might come in to delay the consummation of the great national events which are now in progress. The Minister is now, he cannot help it, impelled by the vox populi. He is carried on with the tide, and although he may be the very last convert in the kingdom, he has no time to wait for conviction. The question of reform has advanced with inconceivable rapidity even since the date of our last.” Such is one of the consequences already produced by concession even on the admission of the very party in whose favour it is made. Reform has made inconceivable progress “since the date of our last;” the minister has now “no time for conviction,” “he is impelled by the vox populi.” A graver and more serious question than any which has been agitated since the revolution; one on which the future destiny of Britain hangs, is hastened on in this manner. How clearly does this indicate the presence of the “passion for democracy!” How exactly does it resemble the fatal precipitance of the Constituent Assembly!

Objects of real practical importance are now disregarded—a sure proof that it is the desire of power, not the love of freedom, which is agitating the country. The repeal of the assessed taxes, the reformation of the poor-laws, the limitation of corporeal punishment in the army; the mitigation of the criminal code; the amelioration of Ireland; the employment of the poor, occupy no portion of the public attention. No public meetings are called on such subjects—no journals think them worthy of discussion. When passion is awakened, the voice of reason becomes inaudible—real benefits are overlooked in the struggle for political supremacy.

Mr Stanley, one of the most gifted men in Parliament, of an old and illustrious Whig family, himself one of the most able advocates of popular reform, has been thrown out, and Mr Hunt is elected Member for Preston! This is exactly what might have been expected; it is an example of what may be generally anticipated from a sudden extension of the elective franchise to the great manufacturing cities. The high-minded and upright Whigs will be immediately discarded, as the Constitutionalists and Girondists were in the French Revolution. To be a reformer and a patriot, will no longer be a recommendation with the populace—stronger popular flattery will be required—more extravagant professions of zeal for the majesty of the people demanded—those who headed the movement will speedily be supplanted by those who have adopted it.

We devoutly hope the returning good sense of the nation may avert the calamities we apprehend; but should a convulsion arise, it will be very different from any which have preceded it in this country. The next revolution which Great Britain undergoes, if so deplorable an event should ever occur, will not be long headed by the higher orders; it will not follow the guidance of the Lords and Commons—it will not be directed to the establishment of any civil immunities. Power, not freedom, will be its object; it will be directed against both Lords and Commons—it will aim at the destruction of all influence save that which emanates from the lower orders of society. It will be a general insurrection of the lower orders against the higher; an effort of the populace to take the powers of sovereignty into their own hands, and divide among themselves all that is now enjoyed by their superiors. It will be followed by the consequences which attended a similar effort in the neighbouring kingdom. It will, in the first instance, be loudly praised, and it will excite the most extravagant expectations; it will be headed by many good men, warm in their hopes of human felicity, ardent in their expectation of the regeneration of society. Speedily their ascendant will be at an end; vice, reckless ambition, daring selfishness, will rise from the lower classes of society; philosophic enthusiasm will instantly be annihilated by vulgar ambition. The property of the church will be the first victim; the regenerators of society will declare, that they take the public worship under the safeguard of the state, and they will perform their promises by giving its ministers L.40 a-year each. The national debt will be the next object of attack; the people will find it intolerable to pay the interest of burdens which they had no hand in imposing; the public creditors will be swept off, and the industry of the people relieved by destroying the accumulation of a thousand years. The estates of the nobility will then become an eyesore to the purifiers of society; land will be viewed as the people's farm; the public miseries will be imputed to the extortions of these unjust stewards, and a division of the great properties, will be the consequence. In the consternation occasioned by these violent changes, commercial industry will come to a stand—agricultural produce will be diminished—the employment of capital will be withdrawn—famine, distress, and want of employment, will ensue—the people will revolt against their seducers—more violent remedies will be proposed—stronger principles of democracy maintained. In the struggle of these desperate factions, blood will be profusely shed. Terror, that destroyer of all virtuous feeling, will rule triumphant. Another Danton, a second Robespierre, will arise; another Reign of Terror will expiate the sins of a new Revolution; and Military Despotism close the scene.

Should we be accused of gloomy predictions, we ask our readers to study the History of the French Revolution; they will find that what in this country is Anticipation for ourselves or our children, is there History.

THE BRITISH COLONIES—ANTI-COLONISTS.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE EARL GREY, &c. &c.

MY LORD,

THE following letter, forming the fourth of a series, addressed to his Grace the Duke of Wellington, your predecessor in office, upon a subject of vital importance to the British empire, was written out and ready for the press at the time when the political change took place, which brought your Lordship into a station which has placed the destinies of the British Colonial empire, together with the naval preponderance of this country, entirely in your hands; but, as connecting itself with the other letters on the same subject, the address to his Grace is retained. Permit me to draw the attention of your Lordship to the facts which it contains regarding the colonies, and the great Colonial question, which at present agitates this country. The passages relating to myself, rendered necessary for the vindication of my character and my labours in the controversy with the Anti-colonial calumniators with whom I have to deal, are not of material consequence to the statesman, except in so far as these afford remarkable examples of that total disregard for truth which directs and impels my reckless adversaries in their unconstitutional, their unrighteous, and their ruinous course.

To you, my Lord, the British colonies now look for protection and for justice—that protection and that justice which has so long been denied them, but which, as British possessions and British subjects, they are entitled to expect, to receive, and to demand, from the rulers of their country. Your Lordship cannot forget that they are possessions which Napoleon, in the plenitude of his power, coveted; and that which he, as a politician and a statesman, coveted, your Lordship, as a British minister, will most assuredly neither endanger nor throw away.

One hundred and fifty millions of British property in the colonies, a trade giving annually ten millions of imports, and five millions of exports, and employment, in the direct trade with the mother country, to 200,000 tons of shipping, and 17,000 British seamen, depend upon the solution of the Colonial question—depend upon the judgment, firmness, and discretion of your Lordship; and it is scarcely necessary to remark, that upon the protection or the destruction of all the vast interests just alluded to, the interests of the landed proprietor, and, consequently, the interests of the aristocracy of this country, are deeply, most deeply, connected and involved.

The question before your Lordship is not a political party question, but a question relating exclusively to property—to the property of men of all parties,—a question whether two hundred millions of British property and capital, and the existence and support of millions of individuals dependent upon these, shall be protected and preserved, or abandoned and destroyed. This is the real point at issue; nor is the question confined to the state of things in the Charaibbean Archipelago. No! it extends to Hindostan; and, if carried and enforced, as the anti-colonists proclaim they mean to do, throughout all the British dominions, it will convulse that vast peninsula to its centre, and be the means of driving every Briton far from its shores. An awful responsibility, therefore, rests on your Lordship's head, while you have it in your power at this moment, by acting as a statesman, and not as a schoolboy, to do more good, or more evil to your country—to her empire, to her resources, and to her power—than any statesman who has gone before you ever had; and your Lordship has, I feel assured, had too much experience in human affairs, to make me doubt about the proper and the favourable result.

I am, &c.

JAMES MACQUEEN.

Glasgow, January 4th, 1831.

LETTER FOURTH.

TO HIS GRACE THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON, &c. &c.

FROM JAMES MACQUEEN, ESQ.

MY LORD DUKE,

YOUR Grace has had numerous opportunities to learn that there are many inconsistent and turbulent characters in the world, and how far these, in order to gain any particular object, will depart from the truth. This being the case, I may perhaps stand excused for bringing, in vindication of myself, the following collection to the notice of your Grace, and to the notice of the public.

First in the list, and "the Goliath" of the band, I must mention JAMES STEPHEN, Esq. Master in Chancery.* This gentleman, thinking he had, by his customary way of classing things, a fine opportunity to do me an injury with the powers that be, tells the world in his new anti-colonial volume, p. 197, and after garbling a silly and malicious statement in a Jamaica journal, in order to help out his case, that my labours in defence of the colonies, had been extended to "the Glasgow Courier, Blackwood's Magazine, the Morning Journal, and other ordinary vehicles of his mercenary labours."

Your Whig Attorney-General having, for reasons best known to himself, extinguished the Morning Journal, Mr Stephen conceived it would be a good opportunity, judging of your Grace's feelings and ideas by his own, to win your ear, and to attach odium to me, by coupling my name and labours with that journal. In this way I appreciate the attack. On this account I notice and reply to it shortly thus: In or for "the Morning Journal, or other ordinary vehicles of mercenary labours," I never wrote a line at any time, nor on any subject; and in the face of the British Empire, I brand the dastardly accusation as a falsehood, a deliberate falsehood. The volume to which I refer, so far as I have yet been able to glance into it, is made up of similar reprehensible, disingenuous, and disgraceful accusations and matter.

At a meeting of "the Dublin Anti-slavery Society," held (see Dublin Morning Post, April 14th) in that city on the 8th of April last, an individual named "JOSHUA ABELL," secretary, after adverting to a new establishment "for the culture of potatoes and tobacco in the moon," the only place where African free labour has yet succeeded, proceeded thus:—"But let it be remembered that this same Mr Macqueen receives about £3000 yearly of that which is robbed from the slaves, in order to bribe him to write against law, justice, and the rights of the British people."

It is time, my Lord Duke, that I should draw upon friend Joshua for this munificent income, which some unconscionable knave of his acquaintance has hitherto withheld from me. I do this without ceremony or courtesy, where neither are due, by branding, as I do, in the face of my country, the statement, in all its parts, as an odious and a positive falsehood, and further, that Joshua Abell, when he made it, knew it to be so.

This paragon of veracity further told his hearers, that the West India Colonies cost this country "altogether ten millions a-year!" The magnitude of this falsehood no one can better appreciate than your Grace. The gross income of Great Britain and Ireland for 1828, the year I can first lay my hands on, was in round numbers £60,000,000. The expenditure stood thus: £28,200,000 for the interest and management of the national debt; £5,300,000, expense of collecting, &c.; £8,000,000 for the army; £3,700,000 for the navy; £1,500,000 for the ordnance; civil list and miscellaneous, £2,200,000; naval and military pensions, &c. £1,700,000; miscellaneous.

* In my last letter, I shewed that this gentleman and his family and relations received above £13,000 of the public money yearly. Hence his anger!

£2,000,000, leaving about £1,500,000 for the sinking fund, and to make good the reduction of taxation, and all the casualties attending the finances and the expenditure of this great country.—(See Finance Accounts, 1829, p. 19.)

Moreover, with regard to the existence of personal slavery in the East Indies, Joshua Abell told his meeting, "that the Anti-slavery Society never denied this point—they merely said, that no sugar was raised by slaves; and Macqueen does not deny this point." Now, "Macqueen" did, and does "deny this point." He shewed also that the Anti-slavery Society did deny it, till the production of the documents called for by themselves, and first noticed by your humble servant, destroyed all their impudent assertions, "Macqueen" not only shewed this, but from the report published by the East India Company regarding the cultivation and the production of sugar in India, he further shewed, that every kind of agricultural produce, sugar included, was raised in various districts in India by the labour of personal slaves.

It would be to insult the memory and the understanding of your Grace and my readers, to return even for a single moment to the official documents previously referred to and produced, in order to establish these facts, but Abell may do so at his leisure.

At the Dublin meeting in question, Mr O'CONNELL, after vomiting forth a prodigious quantity of blarney as senseless as the adoration of a wafer or the worship of an image, proceeded thus to demolish the anti-colonial battery which himself and friend Abell had raised:

"There was one thing which filled him with melancholy; it was this—the slave owner in the British House of Commons, was, in general, a liberal and enlightened statesman in all questions of general and national policy. He generally voted against every job and every oppressive law, whilst, on the contrary, the advocates of negro emancipation in that House were, in general, the supporters of every bad measure of domestic policy and of ministerial profligacy!"

The records of the Treasury, and of every other department and office and place under the British government, or within the sphere of its influence, if produced, will, I am informed, attest the fact, that there is scarcely one interested job by which influence or emolument could, during the last forty years, be wrung from the country, in which the leaders of the anti-colonial or Wilberforce party have not for themselves, or their friends and their dependents, been engaged. The fact is notorious; and the day, my Lord Duke, is not distant, when it is hoped that some honest British senator will tear to pieces the veil which has for so many years concealed the imbecility of government, and the dark doings—the boldness and the venality, and the sordid pursuits, of that "necessary" party, as poor in numbers, as its members in general are deficient in honesty, in plain dealing, in justice, in judgment, and in truth.

I leave Joshua Abell and his anti-slavery associates to reply to, or to refute, if they can, the above statements, simply and shortly observing to "the supporters of every bad measure of domestic policy and ministerial profligacy," that no measure can be worse or so profligate as to take away by force and injustice the lawful property of "British people."

At some anti-slavery collection held about Carskaddon, Surrey, about eighteen months ago, a reverend gentleman named King, told, as I am informed, his gaping hearers, that your humble servant was "the arch-enemy of mankind." If I was to act towards this gentleman as he has chosen to act towards me, I might recriminate by remarking, what a blockhead of a Parson he must be who could utter this as Gospel; but upon enquiry, I find that Mr King is an honest but hot-tempered man, and on colonial subjects misled by "the arch-enemy," therefore I leave him to ruminate upon the falsehood and the injustice of his accusation, and recommend him in future to enquire before he proceeds so rashly to asperse and to condemn.

Some months ago, this country was stunned with the annunciation of "glorious revolution in France," and presently after, we saw, as notified in the Morning Chronicle of the 4th

August, at the head of the subscription list, by special desire, "T. P. Thomson, Lieutenant-Colonel, half-pay, three months' half-pay," L.52, 12s., "for the relief of those who had been murdered by the Bourbons!"

My Lord Duke, these are inquisitive times, and being so, I may be permitted to ask, is this "T. P. Thomson, Lieutenant-Colonel, half-pay," the individual who was eight years in India, "above the rank of a common soldier," and who wrote the atrocious article in the Westminster Review, recommending the robbery and massacre of his fellow-subjects in the West Indies? I have a right to make this enquiry, because the above Colonel is a portion of that "dead weight" to whom half-pay was granted, not for rearing up the tri-coloured flag, but for putting it down. Some British legislator will, I trust, enquire, if the Heed of his Majesty's Treasury does not, where this man earned the laurels which entitled him to receive half-pay, or any pay, and, moreover, to find out how he came to learn the principles of liberty, while engaged in enslaving Hindoos.

A very remarkable circumstance, disclosing the inconsistency and hypocritical obliquity of the human mind as connected with the subject of West India property, occurred in a neighbouring town, (Paisley,) where Mr CARLISLE, late provost of the town, and Dr BURNS, established minister of the Abbey Church there, lately figured, the former as chairman of an anti-slavery meeting, and the latter a violent speaker, each clamouring for the annihilation of colonial property in slaves, as a most sinful and criminal thing for either nations or individuals to hold or to be connected with. Some time ago, JOHN PARK and MARGARET HUTCHISON of Paisley left, as the deed of trust will shew, one West India estate, and a mortgage upon another, having on both at least 250 slaves, in legacies and endowments. Mr Carlisle and the other trustees sold the estate, the mortgage, and the slaves. Out of the proceeds Mr Carlisle got one large legacy, and Mr Ninian Hodgart, another trustee, another large legacy. Hutchison's Charity School, at present chiefly under the superintendence of the parochial clergy of Paisley, and Dr BURNS, I presume, amongst the rest, was established and endowed with L.1500, as directed by the benevolent testators, and carried into effect by Mr Carlisle and his co-trustees from the proceeds of the sale of the estates and slaves mentioned! Mr Carlisle, therefore, should remain silent till he regorges his "LARGE LEGACY" with interest.

Has your Grace been told of the conduct of Mr Smith, a custom-house officer in Jamaica? This gentleman has an anti-colonial brother in the established church in Ireland. At the request, and from instructions furnished by the latter, Mr Smith transmitted a long account of cruelties and oppression exercised within his own knowledge upon the slaves in Jamaica. This letter the reverend clergyman receives and adds to, and interlards it with the worst passages from Mr Stephen's first volume on "Colonial Slavery," and prints the whole in the Irish and English journals as the letter which he had received from Jamaica! This made-up letter went to Jamaica. Astonishment and indignation filled the minds of the people of that colony. Mr Smith was called before the assembly, and on his oath declared how far the letter had been extended, and also that what he had written regarding the treatment of the slaves in Jamaica was altogether untrue! Has this officer been dismissed from the place he holds? Is such a system to be tolerated for ever?

It may be as irksome to your Grace to read, as it is to me to write, about individuals like these, but as the anti-colonial chieftains in Aldermanbury Street employ such individuals as their tools, it becomes necessary to notice them. Leaving, however, the smaller anti-colonial fry, I proceed to notice the labours of those who, being more confident and ferocious than their fellows, think that they are beings superior to, and wiser than, the rest of mankind.

Your Grace has heard of Mr ORWAY CAVE, a fraction of those dangerous political materials which you had to watch and to manage in conducting the affairs of this country. This ex-senator was ousted at the last election for Leicester, although he was drawn into and through that town by a cavalcade of free labour ladies, instead of horses! Mr Lovell, the mayor, informs us (see Leicester He-raid, Sept. 1; an able and honest journal) that they were "only able to draw £2450 from Mr Cave towards an account of many thousands due from him"—for "expenses incurred in taking up freedoms," that is, buying the bodies and the souls of Englishmen! The newspapers also inform us that he has lately been dismissed from the commission of the peace in a county—not surely for preaching righteousness or building churches. This Otway Cave, in his senatorial capacity in the House of Commons, June 14, (see London Courier,) spoke thus:—

"He called upon any lawyer, if he could, to point out to him the statute by which slavery was established in any part of the British dominions, it existed not by law, but by connivance."—"He maintained, that, under the existing law, the West India proprietors possessed no legal property in their slaves."—"To say that the slave had not a right to resist the man who oppressed him, was a doctrine too monstrous for any man of common sense to assert. The right was as clear as the right of resistance in the beasts of the field."—"They would be justified in the eyes of God and man in using their best efforts to shake off the yoke by which they are now oppressed."

The West India proprietors and their slaves not being either oppressors or oppressed, nor "beasts of the field," are guided in their relations to each other by different principles from those which animate Mr Cave, whose reasoning, if it was good for any thing, would entitle every Colonist to knock him on the head like a wild beast, in their "efforts to shake off the yoke by which they are now oppressed" by the real oppressor; but quitting this fiery and senseless legislator, I have to observe, that Otway's language and reasoning have become the prominent matter of every anti-colonial pamphlet since published, and of every anti-colonial meeting since held, while a stiff-necked senator in the British senate, Mr William Smith, a leading lawyer at the Scotch bar, Mr Jeffrey, and a leading divine in the Scotch church, Dr Thomson, have condescended to preach from Otway's text, with inferences, each peculiar to himself.

In the House of Commons, June 16, (I quote from the Mirror of Parliament,) Mr Smith said: "It is one thing to claim a property in a man's person, and another to claim a right to his labour, enforceable by law. The first, I maintain, is FORBIDDEN ALIKE BY THE LAW OF GOD and man—by the former ever since the creation of the world." At the Edinburgh anti-slavery meeting, held in October last, Mr Jeffrey took the same course, thus: "In the courts both of England and Scotland, it had been ruled that man had no right in property of man;" and he confidently asked, "Had he (God) given him a right of property over his fellow man?" It is easy to ask a question with legal quibble, but not so easy or convenient to solve it. Dr Thomson, the divine, takes the same ground, and demands "immediate" emancipation, reckless of the consequences. "They were afraid," said he, "of shedding a little blood. He would deprecate as much as any man the shedding of blood, but he would rather that a GREAT DEAL WAS SHED, if necessary, than that 800,000 individuals should remain in the hopeless bondage of West India slavery, which was an infinitely greater evil than all that COULD BE SUFFERED by their opponents"—"he would break the fetters of the slaves; and if it should be on those who resisted their emancipation, let their blood be upon their own heads."

At a subsequent meeting, the same divine held still more bloodthirsty language; and, as it was gloried in and applauded by ladies and gentlemen in Edinburgh, so your Grace and the ill-fated Colonists may rest assured that the precept and the principle will be acted upon. Let "a great deal" of blood flow to accomplish our object, is the doctrine of a Christian divine, and the recommendation of British legislators, and no one either in the colonies or in this country can possibly misunderstand the object or the import of such declarations.

* In his intemperate course, Dr Thomson has been followed by a minor member of the Scotch church, namely, Dr P. Macfarlane of St Enoch's Church, Glasgow. This gentleman is, I am told, setting his face upon removal to Edinburgh, by way of

The miserable quibble which Mr Smith raises about the right of property in person and the right of property in labour, as if the person could be separated from the labour, or the labour from the person, is utterly contemptible and unworthy of notice. But for the better elucidation of the points at issue, it becomes necessary to shew the course which the Anti-colonists have, during the last thirty years, pursued. First, they laboured to calumniate and to destroy the characters of the Colonists, by falsely charging them with general cruelty to their slaves. This effected, they, secondly, proceeded to inculcate the doctrine, that to be the masters of slaves was contrary to the laws of God, and a crime in his sight. This object effected amongst the credulous and unthinking, they next proceeded, thirdly, to maintain that, by the laws of this country, the Colonists had no right of property in their slaves, and, consequently, that these slaves might be forcibly and lawfully taken from them. This has been the course pursued against the defenceless Colonies, and with what success, let an agitated and a deluded country, and a government intimidated and trembling, as it is at this day, bear witness.

But let us proceed to bring to the test of truth and facts the assertions, that a state of personal slavery is contrary to the laws, "both of God and man," and a crime in the eyes of both.

What God it is whose laws Mr W. Smith refers to, I know not, and leave him to say. Some men never look above or beyond a Prime Minister for any Deity; but the God whose word and whose laws I am about to refer to, is THE GOD who made the world and man upon it; and although the point may not be credited in certain corners of Aldermanbury Street and Downing Street, still I must maintain that these are authorities infinitely superior to either Mr Smith, Dr Thomson, or the Anti-Slavery Report.

Amongst the Hebrews, God's chosen people, personal slavery always existed; while, it may be observed, that the laws of Moses merely regulated a state of society which had previously existed in every country, as may be seen by looking into the history of Abraham, and the people and princes contemporary with him. Slavery amongst the Hebrews was of two kinds, temporary and perpetual. The first state was the servitude of Hebrew to Hebrew, and which was limited to the year of Jubilee following the commencement of his bondage, on which year he was dismissed free; but if his master had given him a female slave to wife, he could not take this wife nor the children by her with him. They remained the property of the master. So strongly did the Hebrew legislator and law guard property in right of inheritance, that the indissoluble ceremony of marriage was, I believe, never performed to slaves: but the union which took place betwixt them was that concubinage which existed amongst the Jews, not in itself immoral, but which, in law, gave no legal right to the children to inherit any property in absolute right.

Let me quote the law, the words and command of JEHOVAH himself from Mount Sinai:—

"If thou buy an Hebrew servant, six years he shall serve: and in the seventh, he shall go out free for nothing. If he came in by himself, he shall go out by himself: if he were married, then his wife shall go out with him. If his master have given him a wife, and she have borne him sons and daughters; the wife and her children shall be her master's, and he shall go out by himself. And if the servant shall plainly say, I love my master, my wife, and my children; I will not go out free: Then his master shall bring him unto the judges; he shall also bring him to the door-post; and his master shall bore his ear through with an awl, and he shall 'וַעֲבַד לְעֹלָם—SERVE HIM FOR EVER!' (Exodus, chap. xii. ver. 2.—6); that is, he shall be his bondman for ever."

Perpetual servitude amongst the Hebrews was restricted to the pur-promotion; and, like others, he pursues the destruction of our colonies as the stepping-stone to popularity, and to Dr Thomson's favour and assistance.

of the heathen around them, and of the children of strangers settled under their government; and which individuals, so purchased, with all their descendants, became, by law, the master's property—"his money," in ABSOLUTE RIGHT—"for ever." Let us adduce the law itself:—

"Both thy 'עַבְדְּךָ (אִשְׁתְּךָ)' bondmen and thy bondmaids, which thou shalt have, shall be of the heathen that are round about you; of them shall ye buy bondmen and bondmaids. Moreover, of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you, of them shall ye buy, and of their families that are with you, which they begat in your land: and they shall be your possession. And ye shall take them as an inheritance for your children after you, to inherit them for a possession; they shall be 'עַלְמֵי בָרִים' YOUR BONDMEN FOR EVER." (Lev. chap. xxv. v. 44—46.) On Mount Sinai, Jehovah said unto Moses, "And if a man smite 'אֶת-עַבְדְּךָ' his servant—(bondman or slave)—or 'אֶת-אִשְׁתְּךָ' his maid—(bondmaid or slave)—with a rod, and he die under his hand, he shall be surely punished. Notwithstanding, if he continue a day or two, he shall not be punished: for he is his 'כֶּסֶם' (silver) MONEY." And again, "if a man smite the eye of 'עַבְדְּךָ' his servant, (bondman,) or the eye of 'אִשְׁתְּךָ' his maid (servant), that it perish, he shall let him go FREE for his eye's sake." (Exodus, chap. xxi. ver. 20, 21, and 26.)

The express law of the Almighty having thus fixed the legal slave as property in absolute right, it follows that such a state of civil society was neither contrary to HIS law, nor morally wrong in HIS sight. The bondman thus legally constituted property, the Decalogue, eternal as its author, unchangeable as its judge, guards, along with every other species of property; and this great and unchangeable moral law applies equally to whatever the laws of any country or people, in any age, constitute property, as it did to the Jews. This law, delivered by JEHOVAH from Sinai, amidst earthquake, thunder, and flame, my Anti-colonial opponents will surely acknowledge was given by the founder of Christianity. Its sublime introduction says so. Let us for a moment attend unto it.

Exodus, chap. xx. ver. 1. "And 'אֱלֹהִים' THE ALMIGHTY spake all these words, (וְהָאֱלֹהִים, with an oath,) saying, I am indeed 'יְהוָה אֱלֹהֶיךָ' Jehovah thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, 'מִבֵּית עַבְדִּים' out of the house of bondage."* Proceeding, in the Fourth Commandment, to prohibit all work on the Sabbath, the great Lawgiver says—"Thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, 'עַבְדְּךָ' thy bondman, (male slave,) nor 'אִשְׁתְּךָ' thy bondmaid, (female slave);" and, after prohibiting straining, the Almighty Lawgiver goes on to state that man shall not covet any thing that is not his own, thus:—"Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house; thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife, 'וְעַבְדְּךָ' nor his bondman, 'וְאִשְׁתּוֹ' nor his bondmaid," &c.

It is considered unnecessary to quote other texts, to shew that the Hebrew words quoted mean slave, and ought to have been so translated. This will be seen by referring to Genesis, chap. xvi. ver. 1—3; chap. xxi. ver. 10—12, and chap. xxx. ver. 3, 4, 9, and 18, and numerous other passages of the sacred volume. The Hebrew verb, עָבַד, signifies to "serve," "to till the ground;" emphatically, "to serve thyself of another;" &c., and is the word used by Jehovah, Gen. chap. iii. ver. 23, when he drove Adam from Eden, "to till the ground"—to be a slave to the ground, which he and all his posterity have been, and will continue to be, except where some sapient British legislators have, contrary to this law, enacted, that no black man shall till the ground in the western world! The Hebrew verb, עָשָׂה, from whence the noun, עֲשָׂוָה, another name for female slave or bondmaid, "woman of a servile condition," as may be seen in Gen. chap. xxx., above referred to, signifies literally "to depress," "humble," "subject;" and, with a reference to two remarkable passages of Scripture, in proof of what has been stated, I shall quit this part of the subject. The first is in Gen. chap. ix. ver. 25, where Noah curses Ham in his youngest son Canaan, thus:—"אָרֹר וְכָנַע עֶבֶד עֲבָדִים", cursed, cursed, (or cursed exceedingly,) Canaan; a bondman of bondmen shall he be unto his brethren." The next is in the cxxiii. Psalm, the expressiveness and beauty of which, every one acquainted with Eastern countries, where the same custom and state of society exist at this day, will readily appreciate. "Behold as the eyes 'עֲבָדִים' of bondmen look unto the hands of their masters, and as the eyes 'שֹׁפְחָה' of a bondmaid unto the hand of her mistress, so our eyes wait upon the Lord our God, until that he have mercy upon us."

* Or out of the place or the "house of bondmen," as the Hebrew words mean, and are so rendered, Jeremiah, c. xxiv. ver. 13; and in the margin of our common Bible, Deuteronomy, chap. vi. ver. 12.

So much for the authority of the Old Testament upon this question; and, in reference to the authority of the New Testament, I may shortly state, that when Christianity was introduced into the world, half the human race were slaves, and yet we nowhere find its great author, nor any one of his inspired apostles, denouncing this state of society as sinful and criminal, either on the part of nations or individuals. On the contrary, we find, in the writings of the latter, numerous injunctions and positive commandments given unto slaves to be obedient to their masters. In almost every part of the New Testament where the words "servant," or "servants," occur, it is, in the original, "doulos," "douloi," slave or slaves; and I must, with these observations, leave my Anti-colonial opponents, more especially the clerical part of them, to shew how they dare assume an authority which neither the Author of Christianity, nor his immediate and inspired apostles, who never refrained from denouncing that as sinful and criminal which, in the eyes of God and of man, was, in reality, sinful and criminal, have ventured to exercise, or to call upon or instruct any one to assume or to exercise after them.

Let me not be mistaken, my Lord Duke; I do not adduce these references because I consider personal slavery in civil society as a preferable state to any other, as my senseless Anti-colonial enemies state and maintain; but I adduce them to prove all that they assert on these points, in reference to the Holy Scriptures, to be wrong, and by which, and at the expense of truth, they seek to assist and to accelerate the march of injustice.

Christianity, my Lord Duke, so often appealed to by these men, is the religion of the soul, of the closet, not of the debating arena—its empire is not of this world, and it reforms, meliorates, and removes the harsher features of civil society, not by violence, injustice, and bloodshed, but by a reformation of the inward man, whether he be high or low, rich or poor, bond or free. Our modern philanthropists cannot see or understand this great truth, but like their predecessors, the Pharisees of old, they proceed, in their system of reformation, to wash "the outside of the bowl and the platter," while they leave the filthy, unwashed inside to concoct and to bring forward laws and regulations to reform distant countries in every quarter of this globe. Misery, mischief, blood, and ruin have, in every age, attended such conduct, and such results will, in every succeeding age, attend the labours of such one-eyed legislators.

With regard to the laws of man, I observe that personal slavery exists by law in all the colonial possessions of Great Britain, of France, of Spain, of Portugal, of Holland, of Sweden, and of Denmark. In Europe, it exists by law in the dominions of Austria, Prussia, and Russia. In Asia, it exists by law in the dominions of Turkey, of Persia, of China; in all Hindostan, and in all the minor states and isles of Asia. It exists by law in ALL AFRICA; for Sierra Leone, planted to teach the rest liberty, is now engaged in carrying on the African Slave Trade! It exists by law in the dominions of the United States of America, of Columbia, and of the Brazils, and other parts of South America. And melancholy as the fact is, still it is the fact, that but a small portion of the habitable globe is free from that state of society; while it is a still more melancholy fact, that more than a moiety of the human race are unfit to be in any other state either with advantage to themselves, or the more civilized portions of mankind.

By the act of Parliament, Geo. II. c. 7, and by the confirmed laws of Jamaica, and of every other British colony, slaves are declared assets and inheritance in like manner as real estates are by the laws of England. They are dealt with as such every day in the supreme courts of this kingdom—in the Court of Session, in the Court of Chancery, and before the Privy Council. The records of both Houses of Parliament, all the offices under the British Government at home and abroad, are filled with official acts, decrees, orders, and proclamations, both as relates to Hindostan and other British transmarine possessions, constituting slaves property in absolute right, while our most able lawyers, Brougham, Denman, Lushington, Bosanquet, Adam, &c. &c., have a large and most important portion of their professional labours engaged before the Court of Chancery, and before the Privy Council, in maintaining that they are so. How monstrous, therefore, is it, my Lord Duke, with all these facts before their eyes, both from divine and human records, for men like Mr Jeffrey, Dr Thomson, William Smith, Mr Buxton, and the Caves and the O'Connells of the day, to proclaim and to maintain the contrary!

I recur with reluctance to the African slave trade; but as the legal title to the right of property in the slaves is denied to the West India Colonists, because it is said that they were procured by force and violence, or, in the words of Sir George Murray in the House of Commons, on the 16th of July last, by "injustice and inhumanity;" and this being the case, it becomes necessary to shew how these slaves were "got" by the colonists, and who they were that brought them unto them; and in doing this, I must have recourse to facts disencumbered from the veil with which feeling without judgment has concealed them.

Every dispassionate person acquainted with the history and state of Africa is aware how African slaves are procured, namely, in wars originating from similar causes to those which induce their civilized European brethren to quarrel with each other, and criminals condemned by the laws of their respective states for crimes, such as adultery, murder, robbery, theft, witchcraft, &c. &c. Lander, a late and unsophisticated traveller, tells us expressly, in this way, and in this way only, slaves for the trade carried on by Europeans are procured in Africa; and whenever those prisoners and culprits cannot be sold, they are murdered by wholesale in sacrifices to their bloody deities, or drowned in bands to get clear of them! The late Keneth Macaulay told us, that all those brought into Sierra Leone and liberated there, were "prisoners taken in war, or the savage natives of barbarous states enslaved for crimes." And a Report, just published by the order of the House of Commons, (Par. Pap. No. 661, Session 1830,) tells us, that the Africans which continue to be landed there, are, upon their arrival, more like "brute beasts" than men! With such the people of Great Britain filled the Antilles, as King William said, "for the advantage of this nation;" and which refuse population, greatly improved and civilized, the penitent children of British slave-merchants seek to snatch away from those to whom they were sold under the sanction of the laws of their country!

Yes, under the sanction of the laws of their country! In the records of every office under the British Government, you will find the legal history of this trade. The Report of the proceedings of the Committee of the Privy Council in 1789, contains in part first, upwards of fourteen closely-printed folio pages, filled with the enumeration of the mere names and dates of the charters, statutes, orders, and resolutions of the Government and the Legislature, extending over a period of 200 years, establishing, encouraging, and protecting this trade; and against any monopoly of it by any particular part, the nation always fought as fiercely as our free traders of the present day do against every thing that they conceive to be monopoly.

Great Britain established the slave trade in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, who personally took a share in it. The colonies did not then exist. Great Britain encouraged it in the successive reigns of Charles I. Charles II. and James II. by every means that could be devised. King Charles I. in the seventh year of his reign, granted to Sir Richard Young, Sir Kenelm Digby, and sundry merchants, the sole enjoyment of the trade to Guinea, Benin, and Angola, between Cape Blanco and the Cape of Good Hope, for thirty-one years; and for that purpose erected them by charter into a company. In 1651, the Parliament granted a charter to carry on this trade for five years, to the EAST INDIA COMPANY, who erected two new forts. In 1662, Charles II. granted, by letters patent, an exclusive right of trade to Queen Catherine, Mary the Queen Dowager, the Duke of York, and several others, as a Company of royal adventurers, to supply the West India planters with 3000 slaves annually! This Company, reduced by war and interloping traders, surrendered their charter, in 1672, for the sum of £34,000. The last charter granted was in the 24th year of Charles II., and which charter extended to the term of 1000 years. The Company was incorporated under the name of the Royal African Company. This Company was supported, shifted, and changed in various ways till our own times, when it was abolished and swallowed by that devourer of every thing, Sierra Leone, in which the slave trade is at present revived, and carried on to a great extent!

But it was William III. who outdid them all. With Lord Somers for his minister, he declared the African slave trade "to be highly beneficial to the nation;" not merely as it connected itself with the Colonies, but as a general trade. For this purpose the Assiento treaty was concluded in 1713, in which Great Britain bound herself to supply the Spanish Colonies with 144,000 slaves, at the rate of 4800 per annum. With this treaty the British Colonies had nothing to do. From that period till our own times the national history is full of grants and measures for the encouragement and protection of this as a national trade, even to the regulation of the tonnage of the vessels employed in carrying it on.

tury, the Colonies, both in the United States of America and in the West Indies, again and again called out for a suppression of the trade, but were, as often as they did so, told, in the most dictatorial language, that the trade, being greatly for the advantage of the nation, must be continued. The land, in almost all the West India islands, was granted by Government to be cultivated by slaves, under the penalty of forfeiture if it was not. Amongst the last acts, if not the very last act, which Mr Huskisson, as colonial secretary, did, was to settle the titles of estates in Trinidad, which was disturbed by the penalty of forfeiture having been threatened, because the terms of the grants had not been complied with, as to the number of slaves placed upon different properties, while, to this hour, the orders of the British Government to the governors of all our Colonial possessions, commanding them to protect and to encourage the slave trade, stand, I believe, unrepealed!

From 1729 to 1788, the Legislature granted £593,113, 2s. 7d. in order to protect and to encourage this trade; and, by act 25 George II., £112,162, 8s. 3d. additional was granted as a compensation to the old company; and the same official authority,—Report Privy Council 1789, Part First,—continues to tell us about the advantages which the nation in general derived from the trade. John Shob-bred, secretary to the African Company, informed the Lords thus: "In its immediate effect it employs about 150 sail of shipping, which carry annually from this country upwards of a million of property, the greatest part of our manufactures." The Bristol delegates, headed by Mr Pennycuik, state: "The African trade constitutes a very important part of the British commerce, annually employing at least 200 ships, with valuable cargoes." The exports from Bristol to Africa were, yearly, £240,000; the imports, £15,000, in 30 ships, 4195 tons. According to a Liverpool advocate, the exports from Liverpool to Africa were, in 1787, £800,000; and the value of negroes purchased by that investment amounted to one million sterling annually, yielding yearly a very large profit. General Tarlton and other Li-

Liverpool delegates stated the trade thus:—

Real value . 436,784 0 0

Imports, exclusive of slaves to the Colonies, L.120,000, in 80 ships, 14,028 tons. Mr. Samuel Taylor, the deputy from Manchester, stated the Manchester African trade to be: Exports, L.200,000 annually; of which L.180,000 "are for the purpose of negroes only. This manufacture employs immediately about 18,000 men, women, and children." In this way, the manufacturers employ L.300,000 capital, besides a still greater capital in furnishing annually L.300,000 exports to the West Indies, which employ "a still greater number of hands" than the trade to Africa. According to the Custom-house returns, the British trade to Africa, in 1786, stood thus: Exports, in 146 ships, 21,483 tons; British manufactures, L.583,025, 12s. 7d.; India goods, L.176,076, 8s. 5d.; and foreign manufactures, L.129,609, 1s. 10d.; total, L.888,736, 14s. 4d.; Imports, L.117,683, 1s. 1d., exclusive of African produce, by way of the Colonies, and of the slaves to the Colonies.

The trade, therefore, was most unquestionably a national trade. It was, moreover, wholly British, not Colonial; and, as nations never die, so the present generation cannot justly get clear of the consequences of the legal acts of their forefathers; nor can they, without being guilty of the most wanton injustice and robbery, take away from the Colonists that property which they and their forefathers sold and guaranteed to them, until they have paid down a full and fair compensation. The quota of Manchester, which purchased about 18,000 annually, will, for a century and a half, amount to no trifle; Liverpool and Bristol still larger sums; and Buxton's purse must refund the value of those sold by Hanbury, and taken as an inheritance by his heirs after him, independent of the compensation to be given to the slaves themselves for the injury which they have sustained by the arbitrary conduct of the people of Great Britain!!

The official report of 1780, already referred to, enables us to fix the compensation which the Colonists ought to receive. The value of Colonial property stood thus:—

450,000 slaves, at
L.50	L.22,500,000 0
Lands, buildings, cattle, &c. &c.	45,000,000 0
Houses in towns, shops in Colonias, &c.	2,500,000 0 0

Total L.70,000,000 0 0

Including the Cape of Good Hope and the Mauritius, and excluding India, the number of slaves now in the Colonies is nearly double, while the value of the property in buildings and machinery is greatly increased; and, therefore, the value of Colonial property now must be double, or L.140,000,000, exclusive of the British shipping employed in the trade, and which, with all property in warehouses, and buildings in harbours here, amounting to many millions more, must sink or swim with the fate of the Colonies. Where is the wildest Anti-colonist who will be bold enough to say, that this nation can either pay this enormous sum, or withstand the shock which would follow the destruction of it?

When the British government, after the revolts in the colonies, first purchased slaves to form the West India regiments, they paid the proprietors at the rate of L.50 sterling for each; and when our government reimbursed the people of the United States, for the slaves encouraged by our naval commanders to leave America, they paid at the rate of L.70 to L.107 sterling for their value, according to the cultivation in the state from which they had been inveigled away. The British public cannot offer to British subjects less for their slaves than the British nation paid a foreign nation for their slaves, encouraged, contrary to the laws of nations, to run away. Paid at this rate, I leave the British Treasury to calculate the cash which would be required.

We are confidently told, that the existence of personal slavery amongst any people, degrades and debases alike the nation and the individuals. Where is the understanding of my countrymen supposed to be fled to? Does history say this? Is the Creslave in our colonies the same stupid and rude being that the newly imported African savage was? Did possession of slaves debase Abraham, and any of the great characters which appeared in the world from his day to the day of the illustrious Washington? Did it degrade and debase the Hebrews—the Egyptians—the Babylonians—the Persians—the intelligent Greek—the manly and noble Roman? Did it degrade and debase the Saracen? Does it debase and degrade France—Great Britain—or the United States of America? History answers, No! The degradation and debasement of all the ancient nations proceeded from other causes; and if ever the degradation and debasement of Great Britain and the United States take place, these will be found to proceed from other causes also.

Naming the United States, brings me properly to notice the opinions of the legislators of that country upon this great question, for the reasoning which applies to them applies equally forcibly to the point at issue between this country and her colonies, as these were delivered by some of their ablest legislators, thus:—

Mr HAYDOTH said, "he would earnestly request, that no member south of the Ohio, and west of the Mississippi, would debate this question; that no one would deign, would condescend, to debate the point which had now arisen, whether persons can or cannot be property; or allow that the Federal Government can at any time, or under any circumstances, touch it directly or indirectly. It was a question with which the Federal Government had nothing to do; for the moment it lays its unhallowed hands on that ark of our safety, it ceases to be a government. The gentleman had said that this question was settled forty years ago. It was settled 200 years ago. It was settled when the first cargo of Africans was sold in our market. And what is the difference between persons and property, as if there was an incompatibility on that point? There is no difference. There can be no difference. PROPERTY IS THE CREATURE OF THE LAW. What the law makes property is property. What it does not, is not property. Here, and here alone, exists the distinction. The point was settled more than half a century ago, at the same time that we threw off our allegiance to Great Britain. Slaves are made property by law, and you cannot make them other than property. We may cavil about religion, but whether Jew or Gentile, we cannot interfere with this property. If ever the time should arrive when those persons shall be considered other than property, our business will not be here, but at home."—Mr STOWAS said, "The United States constitution had nothing to do with this property. We may debate as much as we please upon abstract metaphysical points, but it must at last come to this, what are the rights which the owner has in the slave? It is an absolute right of services, and an uncontrolled and uncontrollable custody of his person, free from all interference by individuals or by the United States government, or any other authority but that of the state on unusual occurrences. On the sacredness of this depends the security of a great portion of our union, and he who would interfere with it, is guilty of a great violation of individual rights. This government cannot touch it. It is not a question to be debated. No man of any reflection in his state, thinks for a moment that the United States government is competent to touch it."—Mr DRAYTON, of South Carolina, said, "What were the doctrines? Why, that the inhabitant of any southern state holds his personal property at the will of the United States—who can take it when they please, allowing no compensation therefore! What security, then, have the inhabitants of the South, that all their property will not be taken from them—that they may not at a breath be reduced to ruin and beggary? And when the inhabitant of the South is brought to this situation, will he sit, and count and calculate whether he is to gain or lose by submission to such invasion of his rights? No, sir, he will not count and calculate upon such a question. He would rather perish, than submit to such degrading vassalage. If I know my countrymen, they would sooner perish with arms in their hands—arms dyed with the blood of those whose oppression shall have brought upon them such calamitous necessity."

My Lord Duke, if the West Indians, at home and abroad, in Parliament and out of Parliament, had adopted similar constitutional, rational, honest, and manly language they would not have stood in so perilous, and apparently helpless, situation that they do this day. John Bull despises the man who is afraid to defend his property; and when the legislators and government of Great Britain adopt the rational and statesmanlike language of Mr Randolph and his fellows, then our country and our colonies will be safe, prosperous, and happy.

Mr Brougham's speech, delivered on the 16th July last, and most extensively circulated over the country, scarcely deserves notice. It is in character—full of unconstitutional invective and foreign insolence. It is made up of falsehood, misrepresentation, and fabrication—of statements which have often been made, and often refuted, and put into his hands, cut and dry, by that great father of lies, the Anti-slavery Reporter, which, as Colonel SIBTHORPE justly observed, had "in five thousand words" hardly one word of truth!

According to his instructions, Mr Brougham made the most that he could of the case of MR AND MRS MOSS of the Bahama islands. This case has afforded the anti-colonists food for a considerable time. It has become one of their "stock stories," with which they work upon the passions of the multitude. I enter upon this case with reluctance. I notice it, not to justify severity or cruelty, but to lay the simple facts concisely before the British public, free from that malignant misrepresentation and exaggeration with which anti-colonial rancour has clothed it.

Mr and Mrs Moss, of the Bahamas, were indicted for murder. The Grand Jury threw out the bill. By a bare majority they afterwards found a true bill for a misdemeanour. They were tried, and convicted, and sentenced; Mr Moss to pay a fine of £300, over and above the costs of the prosecution; and both to imprisonment for five months in the common jail of Nassau, amongst thieves and prostitutes of all grades and colours, but chiefly blacks. The prosecution originated in private malice on the part of a worthless, discarded black driver; and the transmission of the documents connected with the trial to this country, garbled, and mutilated, and imperfect as they are, had the same despicable and dangerous origin. There are two names which appear in the papers, as published by order of the House of Commons, and which now lie before me, namely, John J. Fothergill and President Munnings, whose feelings, when they reflect upon this subject, I do not envy, and shall not attempt to lay open. The cause of the prosecution, or, as I may call it, persecution, was this: Mr and Mrs Moss had a female domestic slave, named Kate, who having been detected in theft, was, as a punishment, sent to labour in the fields. This labour she most obstinately and positively refused to perform. She was, in consequence, ordered into confinement in the stocks, where she remained seventeen days; and though well supplied with food, no threats nor punishment could induce her, during that period, to do the work she was required to do, and which was by no means heavy, no, not even to mend her own clothes. Not even the entreaties, the commands, and punishment inflicted by her own father, could induce her to do so. During the time she was in confinement, she received at different times sixty-four stripes, "all over her clothes," twenty-four of which were by her own father, "of his own accord!" At the end of the period mentioned she was again sent to the field—her obstinacy continued, and on the fifth day she was suddenly seized with a disease in the head, dropped down, and died. This disease was very common, and also fatal to many slaves in the Bahama islands at that time.

It does not appear from the evidence of a single witness adduced, that this woman's death was at all occasioned, or in the remotest degree occasioned, by the punishment which she had received. Nay, the evidence for the prosecution, on examination and cross-examination, decidedly proves the reverse. I shall condense a few of the leading and more material passages of it, for the consideration of your Grace and the public, as follows:—

"Kate was not severely flogged while in the stocks.' 'Never heard Kate,' says James Spencer, witness for the prosecution, 'ask to be forgiven. Witness told her that if she would mend her own clothes, she would be forgiven. She replied she would not, and did not care whether she was let out of the stocks or not. He advised Kate to mend her clothes. She was insolent to him for doing so. It would not have occupied her more than two hours.' 'She would not mend her clothes, nor do any thing,' says another witness. While her father was punishing her 'of his own accord,' says a witness, 'Mr Moss came out and prevented him, saying it was of no use flogging her; it was better to put her in the field;' and he further adds, 'Kate did not mind the flogging.' Once, while in confinement, she had, in order to keep her from sleeping, cayenne pepper rubbed into her eyes, a practice that Africans frequently resort to with their children; but says the witness who rubbed it, 'does not know whether any of the pepper got into her eyes. She shut them when he was going to do it;' and another witness says, 'does not think any got in. It was done to prevent her from sleeping.' A witness for the prosecution says, 'does not think Kate could have died from any ill-treatment she received while in the stocks. Never heard any surmise that such was the case, until three weeks afterwards. Never heard any surmises that the body of Kate exhibited any marks of lacerations, bruises, or injuries.' Any one could have seen the body. 'Does not think she was lacerated by the floggings. There was a fever raging at that time on the island, and particularly on Mr Moss's plantation. The fever was attended with dizziness, that made the patient spin round and fall. Every one of Mr Moss's people had had the fever in the course of two months. Kate's sister, Eliza, died of it after an illness of four days. She was five or six years old. The general conduct of Mr and Mrs Moss towards their slaves, was that of great humanity. They are particularly attentive to them in times of sickness. Mrs Moss personally attends them. He imagines many of the negroes would have fallen victims to the fever, if it had not been for the attention of Mr and Mrs Moss.' Several witnesses of great respectability, and wholly unimpeached and uncontradicted, gave Mr and Mrs Moss the highest character for humanity and attention to their negroes; and one witness, ELIZA CAMERON, who had known them twenty years, states, 'they are very kind to their negroes both in health and sickness; when they are ill, they are as attentive to them as if they were their own children.'

Such are the facts and real merits of the case and trial of Mr and Mrs Moss, except Kate's statement, that she had a slight fever on the day before she died, but which does not appear to have been correct, nor does any other matter elicited in the examination, or the cross-examination of the witnesses, alter the general features of the case, one way or the other; and according to the evidence, the instrument with which Kate was punished, was the mildest in use.

A copy of the proceedings on this trial was sent to this country by VESSEY MUNNINGS, President of the Bahamas, accompanied by a letter to Lord Bathurst, in which that humane functionary informs his Lordship thus:—"I have been solicited to remit or to shorten the term of Mr and Mrs Moss's imprisonment, but I shall in no degree whatever alter the sentence of the general court, by the extension of mercy to those by whom it appears none was exercised!" This was a noble ruler for the purposes of those who, in anti-colonial phraseology, drive Downing Street! Soon after this, however, GENERAL GRANT came to the government of the Bahamas, and that gallant officer readily transmitted to Earl Bathurst two memorials addressed to him, one from Mr and Mrs Moss, and one from the principal inhabitants of New Providence, praying that the Crown would liberate Mr and Mrs Moss. On this subject General Grant, under date 3d July 1827, writes Lord Bathurst as follows:—

"I had the honour to inform your Lordship, that I had every reason to think that the case of cruelty towards Kate from Mr and Mrs Moss, was not in accordance with the general treatment, but an especial exception, which would appear to have resulted from a persevering obstinate disposition on the part of the slave Kate, and an equal determination on the part of her owners, to carry their authority into effect. This I truly believe was the case of Mr and Mrs Moss. I will be candid, and say, my Lord, that I regret the nature of the sentence which has been put on them." And in a letter, dated 16th January, 1828, written to his friend the Honourable CHARLES GRANT, soliciting his friendship to turn aside Mr Huskisson's anger, as will presently be more particularly noticed, the governor says; "I had an opportunity, when going round the several governments of this island, to see Mr Moss's treatment of his slaves, and certainly they appeared to me to have more than ordinary indulgence, and their condition in all that met the eye, seemed particularly comfortable; he gave them as much land on their own account as they could cultivate, and he allowed them a fair proportion of time to work it. Mr Moss bestowed most praise and encouragement on those who were most industrious; and the children, as soon as they were of an age fit to be taken from their mothers, were usually brought up about the family, and in this way acquired a degree of civilisation far beyond that which is to be found on most other properties."

Such are the simple facts of this case, which the anti-colonists have so dreadfully exaggerated and misrepresented. Governor Grant, and the inhabitants of the Bahamas, considered mercy to be due. Mr Huskisson was compelled to think otherwise; and in a letter filled with special pleading, remark, and twisting, (on my conscience, I believe Dr Lushington and Mr Stephen, not Mr Huskisson, were the concoctors of this letter,) severely reprimands the governor for being so stupid as to recommend a white man and woman to mercy! This letter terrified the governor more than the appearance of a regiment of Napoleon's old guard ever did or could, and in alarm he wrote his friend, the Honourable Charles Grant, as has been already adverted to, earnestly soliciting him to express to Mr Huskisson how "much he had been instructed by the contents of the dispatch, as to the manner of viewing both faults and offences," and imploring his friend to procure pardon and forgiveness for him! But had the gallant General merely returned to the jesuitical advisers of the Colonial Secretary, the calm dignified reply that, as the representative of his sovereign, he had only done his duty in recommending to mercy where he conceived mercy was due, he would have required no friend to have interceded for him, nor left himself exposed to the sarcasm and reproach which Mr Brougham, when he mentioned this case in the House of Commons, levelled against him.

When Mr and Mrs Moss were liberated, the respectable inhabitants of the Bahamas welcomed them with satisfaction. The Anti-slavery Reporter sets this conduct down as proceeding from a hardened feeling, and a love of cruelty. Charity and common sense would lead us to believe and to say that it proceeded from better motives, and from a conviction that they had been hardly dealt with. The praise which the Honourable ADMIRAL FLEMING, in his reply to their address, 18th May last, bestows upon the inhabitants of these islands for their treatment of their slaves, bears us out in this view of the subject. He addresses them thus:—

"The local situation of these islands, and their valuable productions, will at all times render them of great importance to the British Empire; while the praiseworthy moralty, sobriety, and industry of the inhabitants will ensure the respect of, and endear them to, their fellow-subjects;" and "the KIND AND HUMANE TREATMENT of the black population, will ever be acceptable and admired by all those whose prejudices do not lead them into those errors which you have dispelled, by raising that class of the inhabitants to an intelligence, probity, and industry, far above that of any of their colour, and equal to those in the same sphere in ANY COUNTRY."

Bitterly and unjustly, however, as our western colonies have been traduced, still the accusations against them have been light, compared to those which have been directed against that important and more distant colony, the Mauritius. The most savage venom of the pen of the Anti-slavery Reporter has been directed against this appendage of the British Empire. The conduct of its free population has been presented to the British public, as exceeding in wickedness and ferocity the conduct and the actions of people the most savage and barbarous. Its late governor, Sir ROBERT FARQUHAR, was long the butt of Buxtonian venom, while the official authorities, who, knowing the truth, ought to have vindicated and defended him, remained silent before his implacable foes, until the persecutions of the latter, and the labour, grief, and anxiety which these persecutions entailed upon him, brought him to an untimely grave! In my former letter, I gave your Grace shocking proofs of the cruel persecution which was directed against Sir Robert. It would therefore be a work of supererogation to advert to them here, simply observing that the Buxtonian accusations were drawn from the testimony of men outcasts from society, as appears from the papers printed by order of the House of Commons, received from Sir LOWRY COLE; but as these convict informers will, in their proper characters, be presently brought before your Grace in another case, it is unnecessary to state any thing more regarding them here.

Two individuals of great respectability in that colony, namely, Mr and Mrs TELFAIR, the owners of an estate called Bel Ombre, stand without cause exposed to the blackest venom of the Anti-slavery Reporter. The author of this vile publication possesses an advantage over every honest man, as he can tell so many lies in a page, as will require a volume on the part of the accused to answer, and hence his wicked works are read, while the defence is neglected. It is impossible for me to enter upon all the atrocious accusations which have been brought against the people of the Mauritius in general, and of Mr and Mrs Telfair in particular; and still less can I go into the clear and manly defence of the latter, occupying, as it does, nearly 300 octavo pages; but I shall endeavour, and as shortly as possible, to bring the leading features of both before your Grace and the public. It would be easy for me to knock the head of Mr Pringle against the brains of Mr Macaulay, and to smash them with their own contradictions; but I prefer giving the worst parts of their charges, and breaking them down with the unimpeachable testimony adduced by Mr Telfair.

The Reporter, No. 43, gives lengthened details respecting Mauritius slavery in general, and this plantation, Bel Ombre, in particular, where the free population are represented as "torturing and murdering inch by inch the cultivators of the soil," in "a regular business-like daily march;" but as my limits render it impossible for me to give all his details, so I must in a condensed form bring, and nearly in his own words, his charges before you thus:

"On Bel Ombre the slaves received over night their food for the following day. This wretched and scanty aliment was manioc cakes.^{*} Even out of crop the daily labour extended from sixteen to nineteen hours. No time was allowed them for breakfast. A great part of the two hours allowed for dinner was taken up in collecting wood or grass. When at work, the slaves were followed by drivers, and were continually receiving blows and lashes. They were occasionally taken out from the line and punished with twenty or thirty lashes, and then sent back to work. These inflictions were merely regarded in the light of discipline. The regular punishments were reserved on Bel Ombre for Sundays. The offenders of the week were reserved in chains (in which they were made to work) for that day, and they were often numerous, generally about thirty, and amounting on one occasion to about fifty. The informant often counted the lashes, and never knew any of the offenders to receive less than one hundred, excepting two youths, who received about seventy each. † Salt and pepper were rubbed into the wounds to prevent them from festering, or to enable the sufferers to return sooner to labour, or to bear a repetition of punishment. The pain of this application is described as excruciating. The instrument of punishment was either a whip or split rattan. Either instrument would make incisions into the flesh, and lacerate it at every blow. The sharp edge of the rattan would divide the flesh like a knife. Military floggings were nothing to these. The whip was a very ponderous instrument. One was seen on Bel Ombre weighing upwards of seven pounds! If the slaves fell asleep during night labour, they were severely flogged, and sometimes their hands were drawn into the mill along with the canes, and completely crushed and mangled. In proof of this, three of the slaves on Bel Ombre are described as 'estropie des deux mains,' mutilated in both hands. Marriage was unknown amongst the slaves. The most open prostitution prevailed universally among the females. Ladies hired out their negroes to the soldiers by the month for this purpose. The slaves were generally excluded from all moral and religious instruction. In July, 1821, an eye-witness saw a Mosambique negro receive 150 lashes when he left the spot, and cannot tell how many more he received. The same person saw two young women who had run away, the one for one month, the other for two years, in the woods, and who were both advanced in pregnancy, receive 160 lashes each. They were made to suffer the more, because one of them had requested that she might not be punished till after her delivery. Collars, with projecting spikes, and attached to each other by an iron chain, were afterwards fastened round their necks, &c."

The Reporter proceeds at great length with a list of what he calls judicial cruelties—one of the most atrocious of which—the case of the woman Nagle—I alluded to in my last, and shewed how horribly he had misrepresented the facts regarding it. Mark his disingenuity. In page 374, he says of the ordinances of 1723 and 1767, that "while they armed the master with absolute power over the slave, they afforded to the slave no effectual protection, scarcely even the shadow of protection, against its abuse;" and yet when he wants to blame the judges of partiality, he finds out that the laws were just and humane, for, in the case of the woman Nagle, he says they refused "to avail themselves of a humane provision of the ordinance of 1723, which authorized them to resort to starve evidence, when white evidence could not be obtained, and when that of slaves was indispensable to the ends of justice!"

With regard to the punishment of the two pregnant females, the malignity with which it is related, is a proof of its falsehood; nor has the jackass of a Reporter condescended to shew us how the trees of "the woods" got a negro wench with child, who had been two years dwelling alone in them. With regard to the whip weighing 7 lbs., (I wonder old Mar did not make it 70 lbs. at once—it would just have been as readily swallowed,) Mr Telfair tells us that he actually had one from thirty to forty feet long, which a waggoner, named William Wilberforce Hulme, had got from the Cape of Good Hope, to direct teams of oxen by its crack, but that this was the only purpose for which it was applied. Moreover, the hands of the negroes that had been mutilated, had not been so by their being put through the mill like sugar canes, but by the leprosy, and an epidemic disease called berri-berri!!

The unmanly charge levelled by this base writer against the free white females in the Mauritius, namely, that they hire their female slaves to the soldiers by the month for the purpose of prostitution, is a most infamous slander, and carries in the face of it its own refutation. The pay of a common soldier is barely sufficient for his absolute necessities, and how then could he procure several dollars a-month to pay for prostitutes to gratify his passions? Such "Ladies" may be in the Mauritius, but they are no doubt of a description similar to those who, in London, under the Reporter's nose, let out their female slaves for prostitution, or such ladies perhaps as that anti-colonial informer, GENERAL HALL, started in his secret rides in the Mauritius. Moreover, my Lord Duke, the charge is an infamous slander on the character and the discipline of the British army. If General Hall has given the Anti-slavery Reporter such information, I would ask him how he dared to disgrace himself as a general officer by permitting such proceedings, and further, if the officer who did so is fit to command a British soldier?*

* General Hall became, I believe, a chum of the Anti-slavery Society, because he could not get the government of the Mauritius. From such jaundiced sources the Reporter draws his information? Speaking of General Hall, his conduct induces me to contrast it with the conduct of that gallant officer, the brave, and the honourable, and the lamented GENERAL DAVID STEWART of Garth. In a letter, amongst the last he ever wrote, dated St Lucia, 20th November, 1829, and addressed to his friend Sir JOHN SINCLAIR, he alludes to the labour and the state of the slave population of that Crown colony thus:

"Looking out of the window this morn'g, I see on a field half a mile distant upwards of 100 men and women, each with a hoe, preparatory to the planting of the cane. Three good ploughs, each with a pair of horses, would do more work than this large body of people. While such a waste of labour is lamentable, it is gratifying to see the appearance of comfort the people exhibit. All the women with white or calico short-gowns and petticoats, and various head coverings, and the men with

With regard to the punishments said to be inflicted on Bel Ombre, Mr Telfair minutely refutes each, and adds, "Of all the punishments on record at Bel Ombre, as far as I know, only one case occurred in which the offender received above twenty-five lashes, and they were inflicted by judicial order, and by the police officers." Speaking of education, he says, "far from neglecting education at Bel Ombre, it was the favourite employment of the family, who never missed the school hours, and who were accompanied in this pleasing avocation by visitors, either of the most respectable inhabitants of the Mauritius, or of the constant stream of travellers who considered this island as a house of call in their journey to and from India and the Cape of Good Hope. The blacks on my estates are regular in their attendance at church, and the Scriptures are explained to them every Sunday. Many, indeed most, of the respectable inhabitants are more like fathers than masters on their estates. Their negroes repay them with a just fidelity and love. The habitation becomes, as I have often seen, an immense family, and the owner resembles a patriarch."

But let us draw the characters of the Anti-slavery Reporter's informants, and the contradiction to his infamous charges, from disinterested and unimpeachable pens.

COLONEL DRAPER, collector of customs of Port Louis, states, p. 184, "that the lower class of informers of the Anti-slavery Reporter, consists of drunken and discarded convict overseers, one of whom, by name Kendrick, deposed in England, that he witnessed an importation of slaves at Bel Ombre, on the very day when he was in prison at Port Louis as a gens-de-arme, for bad conduct."—"The first informant," says COLONEL STAVELEY, deputy quarter-master general, "is a man of the name of Higginson, whom I discharged from the department of roads for gross misconduct as an overseer. He had been in the habit of employing the convicts placed under his charge for the public service, in the cultivation of the habitation of a woman with whom he was living in a state of concubinage!" He was accordingly dismissed. The other is named Kendrick. I met him in a state of filth and nakedness. He had formerly been an overseer in the convict department. He had been more than once discharged, and was finally dismissed for drunkenness. I found his character in that department to be bad. He subsequently entered, and was dismissed from, the Gen-d'armerie, as a worthless vagabond." The Colonel gives Mr Telfair the highest character for humanity, and the "extreme attention paid to the comfort and religious instruction of the blacks" on his estates.

Such are the characters and the witnesses on which the Anti-slavery Reporter has built and directed his gigantic fabric of falsehood and cruelty against Sir Robert Farquhar and Mr and Mrs Telfair. The enormity of the Reporter's guilt will, however, appear more conspicuous when it is shewn, that the falsehood of these statements was known to the Reporter and his associates, and that too from a most unquestionable source of information, several years before they published their catalogue of horrors. On the 24th November, 1820, Mr STEPHEN, upon the authority of some spies in the Mauritius, wrote his friend Judge Smith of that colony, censuring him, it would appear, in no very civil terms, for associating with slave traders and the perpetrators of cruelties. The Judge, trembling at the charge, coming from the quarter from which it did, refutes it blue or light-coloured jackets and trousers. The field at this distance exhibits a gay and enlivening sight with so many moving objects, more especially if within hearing of their jokes, talk, and SINGING."

Here are no whips, no chains, no collars, and no lacerations! But General Stewart was neither the informant nor the slave of the Anti-slavery Reporter, nor can the slanders of that little anti-colonial owl, picked up about the English Channel, and sent to tease, and to calumniate, and oppress British subjects, affect or injure the character and the memory of that excellent man and lamented officer, whose death was, I know, precipitated by the mental torture which the headstrong conduct of the other brought upon him.

* On this infamous conduct and fact the Anti-slavery Reporter grounds his charge of ladies in the Mauritius hiring their female slaves for prostitution.

as far as it applies to himself, telling Mr Stephen, in a letter dated July 1st, 1821, that in the colony he only associated with the "families of the Governor-General Darling and Mr Telfair," adding, with strong marks of terror and alarm, "do for God's sake let me know with whom I am thus associated. As for Telfair, I should think the Missionary Society could vouch in his favour, and I can only further say, that I have made both open and secret enquiries * as to his slave property—and I solemnly declare as a Christian and a gentleman, that I firmly believe him to have been most infamously and wickedly slandered by those who have accused him!"

It might have been supposed that this refutation by the judge of the colony, and that judge, too, Mr Stephen's particular friend, of the slanders against Mr Telfair and the Mauritius, given so far back as 1820 and 1821, would have prevented the publication of calumnies and falsehoods by the Anti-slavery Reporter in January, 1829. But no such thing.

The defence of Mr Telfair and his amiable wife I must continue to draw, not from himself, but, as being more conclusive, from disinterested witnesses.

B. D. SAGE, Esq., page 227, says:—"The chains, hooks, and collars, described by the Anti-slavery Monthly Reporter, are matters of pure invention, and in short, all that he says about himself and Bel Ombre, is a rhapsody of disgusting folly, a tissue of bare-faced falsehoods. He must have had the heart of a demon who, amidst such a scene as your estates exhibit, could have imagined that man alone was starved and wretched, and tortured with unheard-of cruelty, and flogged to death." Mr LE BRUN, missionary, page 189, states, "that Mr Telfair was the first who attempted with success to teach the slaves reading, writing, and moral and religious instruction." And of Mr Telfair's estate, he says, "The little villa we saw in 1828, bore more the resemblance of a country village in England, than to huts for slaves. I admired it, and said to my late friend (Mr Jones), how many country peasants in Europe would feel happy if they had such comfortable dwellings to put their families in, and every family with a Bible, and some among them capable of reading it to them. I could scarcely believe those were dwellings for slaves!" The Rev. Mr DENNY, first civil chaplain, Mauritius, gave equally strong and satisfactory testimony in favour of Mr Telfair, his character and his conduct.

Mr WARWICK, civil engineer, says, page 182, "I had the best possible opportunity of knowing the events of every passing day on the whole of the negroes on Bel Ombre. The instances of cruelty enumerated as having occurred during the years 1821 and 1822, the instruments of cruelty mentioned, and the details relative to the housing, bedding, clothing, over-working, half-starving, and general punishment of the blacks, all ingeniously published for the information of the world, in the 14th number of the Anti-slavery Monthly Reporter, are a tissue of falsehoods!" Colonel DRAFFEN, collector of the customs, 1st Sept. 1822, says, "These assertions in the Anti-slavery Monthly Reporter, are gross violations of truth. Indeed, were I called upon to delineate a character whose clemency would bear the strictest ordeal, the true likeness would be found in the proprietor of Bel Ombre, whom I could present even to the members of the Anti-slavery institution, and particularly to the speakers at its anniversary in 1828, as a philanthropist in whom nature had implanted the best affections of the heart." Captain MACKAY of his Majesty's 82d Regt., thus writes Mr Telfair: "I went over every part of the establishment of Bel Ombre in 1819. This was no cursory view. I walked alone among the people at all times, saw them at their meals, at their work, at their dances, at their devotions, and in their houses. I have never seen more hilarity and abundance in the same number of the labouring class at home. They are well fed, clothed, and sensible of their happiness. Their children are kept clean and neat in dress, and daily schooled for two or three hours in reading, writing, and arithmetic. I never saw any punishment, nor heard the sound of the whip in correction! As for the occupation of Sunday, it was dedicated to devotion in your family, when I often read sermon after you had read the prayers of the Church, surrounded by all your overseers, servants, and house slaves, and the whole of the estate had orders to attend at the school-house every evening, to join in prayers, &c. Such is the statement which I can with truth solemnly give to the anonymous witnesses whom the Anti-slavery Reporter mentions, and no doubt these persons will be found as little entitled to credit as those already brought forward before the select Committee of the House of Commons, whose perjuries were rendered evident by the OATHS of those men in my own regiment, whom they appealed to for corroboration!!"

About four years ago Mr Buxton, with his customary asperity, attacked Mr Telfair's character in the House of Commons. In consequence of this, a lady, named MARY ANNE BERRY, in a letter dated Warrington, 2d April, 1827, wrote Mrs ADMIRAL CHAMBERLAYNE, mother to Mrs Telfair, thus:

"Had I been asked to point out two men in the Colony of Mauritius, against whom such an accusation would have been brought by any person of respectability, Mr FANQUHAR and Mr TELFAIR would have been the last in my mind, they would have been the most remote from any suspicion. Mr Telfair stood amongst the highest, not only for science and general knowledge, but still more so as a man of integrity and philanthropy. Never did I hear him accused of severity towards his slaves, never in one single instance! On the 26th April, 1820, I reached Bel Ombre, on a visit to Mrs Telfair, and I remained her guest till the 7th July following. During that time I never saw nor heard of any act of cruelty, nor even of severity, towards his slaves. On the contrary, I witnessed many instances of his fatherly care and kindness towards them. As much wine was sent to the hospital as Dr Deschamps chose to order, and sometimes I thought profusely. On the 2d May I went to the school, and heard the children, about fifty—spell, read, sing, and pray. The two last exercises were very affecting and gratifying. All seemed to have made a wonderful progress, particularly in their prayers. To hear so many little voices lifted up in praise of their Maker and Redeemer, affected me even to tears. Mrs Telfair was so much afraid of the slaves being overworked, that I frequently thought that she sometimes ran a little into the opposite extreme. I never saw a black household servant in the Isle of France do a tithe of the work done by many female servants in England. There is no starving population in the country; no beggars; would I could say so here!"

J. ALEXANDER, Esq., chief of the ordnance department, Mauritius, on the 17th Oct. 1829, writes Mr Telfair thus:

"If the united wisdom of Willerforce and Buxton had been consulted to make an estate happy, the illustration was to be found at Bel Ombre, which proved the anxiety of the owner to do his duty to God and to his fellow creatures—the slaves. The Anti-slavery Reporter, No. 44, is a pamphlet replete with misrepresentation, and its aim is to libel the constitution of the Mauritius, and to reflect discredit upon the Government at home. The statements made by the said Reporter, of the treatment of slaves in the Mauritius, and upon the Bel Ombre, are false; and rather than become the slave of a faction, the dupe of a party, to give aid and support to publications like No. 44 of the Anti-slavery Monthly Reporter, I would prefer to be a slave on the Bel Ombre estate." PATRICK SALTIR, Esq., acting registrar of slaves in the Mauritius, on the 7th Sept. 1829, writes Mr Telfair thus: "I have perused with horror, indignation, and utter contempt, an attack that is made upon you in the 44th number of the Anti-slavery Reporter. I feel it incumbent on me to declare solemnly my perfect conviction, that never was any individual so deeply injured by an abuse of the liberty of the press. I DECLARE TO GOD I never heard of such cruelties as those alluded to in the Anti-slavery Reporter at Bel Ombre, nor on any other estate of the colony." &c. &c.

To add testimonies to the same effect, is deemed superfluous. Is it possible, my Lord Duke, to conceive any thing more hideous, iniquitous, and reprehensible, than such proceedings on the part of the anti-colonists? No British subject can patiently submit to have his character thus murdered by the most profligate falsehoods, nor can the colonists ever be brought to believe that the government of their country intends to do them justice, or to afford them security and protection, while such proceedings and such libels, on the part of their enemies, are continued uncensured and unpunished. If the Colonial Office did its duty, such things uttered, either in Parliament or out of Parliament, would instantly be noticed, replied to, and refuted. But no such thing is done, and the mischievous lies circulated over this country, consequently, remain uncontradicted, and are left to work the mischief which they were calculated to do.

Yet the authors of such falsehoods and such misrepresentations, are the guides which this country takes, and is called upon to take, and these men are the foremost to cry out calumny, uttered by all those who expose to public reprobation their proceedings and their statements!

The dogmas and orders of the Colonial department direct the authorities, more especially in the Colonies under the immediate orders of the King in Council. The consequences are sometimes as extraordinary as they are reprehensible. Take in proof the following occurrences which have lately taken place in the Mauritius. In that Colony they have no representative government, and the press is completely under the control of the Governor, whose Secretary is its Master and the Censor. This Censor lately prohibited the publication of an article giving an account of two negroes having killed and eaten a man and a boy, their comrades, lest the publication might reflect disgrace upon our African brethren; and by direction of the Governor, he has lately prohibited the publication in the island Gazette of the letters, beyond the middle of the second, which I have addressed to your Grace on the Colonial question. But the arbitrary power of the anti-colonial prompters and directors of the Colonial empire of Great Britain, is still more remarkably and sadly exemplified in some late proceedings, as these have been stated to me in a communication from that island, dated in June last. It is in substance as follows:—

Some time ago, the planters in this island, in consequence of the great difficulty in procuring labourers, and anxious, if possible, to introduce some system, independent of slave cultivation, formed an association for the purpose of introducing free labourers to the island. Accordingly, they entered into arrangements with mercantile houses in Port Louis, having the command of ships, to procure for them the transportation of free labourers from India and the Malay Islands, and they were given to understand, that the scheme would meet with the Governor's support and approbation. Several vessels were, accordingly, fitted out to Singapore and Madras. A number of Chinese and Malay labourers were procured their services, and were hired for periods varying from 3 to 5 years, at a rate of wages somewhat lower than what prevailed in the Mauritius, but considerably higher than what could be obtained in their own country. The scheme was attended with much more difficulty and expense than was at first supposed. The charge of transporting these people came to about L.5 a-head, which, along with other incidental and unforeseen expenses, very nearly counterbalanced the cheapness of the wages at which they had been hired.

After considerable difficulty, about 1500 of these labourers were landed at Port Louis, during the last half of the year 1829. But, to the surprise and mortification of the Mauritius planters, the moment that these people came ashore on the island, the Colonial authorities interfered, and refused to allow them to proceed to the plantations, till security had been found by their employers, at the rate of L.25 a-head, for the good and peaceable behaviour of these foreigners, so long as they should remain on the island. The chief commissary of police, who had shortly before been the pay-master of a regiment in the garrison, was ordered to summon the planters to his office, where the peremptory orders of the authorities were announced to them, and the planters found themselves compelled, though with the greatest possible inconvenience, to lodge the security required, amounting to about L.37,500 sterling!

After the planters had thus complied with the wishes of the government, these Chinese and Malabar labourers were allowed to proceed to the estates of their respective employers; and though they had received two months' wages in advance, they soon became discontented with their situation, chiefly instigated by the bad advice which was given them by some of their countrymen, who were settled in the island as servants, shop-keepers, &c. They told them that they were great fools to work for so low a rate of wages, that even the slaves received more than they did; that they ought to strike work, desert from their employers, and stand out till higher wages were offered. Unfortunately for all parties, these ignorant creatures listened to the advice thus administered. At first, a few only deserted from the plantations where they were settled. These, their employers immediately sought to reclaim by the gentle means of persuasion, but finding them obstinate, they were obliged to request the aid of the police department to compel them to implement their agreement, and continue in service for the period, and at the wages, agreed on.

What, however, was the astonishment of the planters, when in answer to their application, they were informed by the chief commissary of police, that these Chinese and Indians, being free men, had a right to leave their service if they pleased, and that government could not interfere to enforce the performance of their stipulated service! The planters felt astonished and disappointed at the conduct of the local authorities in thus thwarting their honest endeavours to fulfil the wishes of the British nation, by trying to eradicate the system of slavery, by the introduction of free and voluntary labour in the Colony. But what was their indignation and disgust, when they found that their runaway workmen were receiving every possible protection, supplied daily with 1½ lbs. of rice for each man, with plenty of wood to cook it, and in this manner befriended and encouraged by government, in the unlawful dereliction of their services and engagements.

Intelligence of these circumstances soon spread through the island, and the disastrous effects were only such as might easily have been foreseen. All the plantations to which the news had reached, were speedily abandoned by their Indian cultivators, who resorted, in crowds, to the police-office in Port Louis, where they met with the most ample protection. The bounty of the government even went so far, as to grant them permission to build huts in the neighbourhood of the town, on a piece of ground belonging to the harbour-master, and immediately adjoining his villa. In an incredibly short time, between 500 and 600 of these idlers encamped on this spot, under the immediate auspices of the government, scorning any attempt on the part of their masters, to compel them to fulfil their reement. But the unfortunate planters were not the only persons doomed to suffer from the protection thus given to these Indian miscreants. Freed from control, and following no regular employment, they soon turned their thoughts to the commission of every sort of aggression; they began to prowl about the neighbourhood, seeking for plunder, robbing poultry yards, stealing sheep, calves, and pigs, and attacking black servants on the high-ways. In vain did those who suffered from such depredations, endeavour to represent the lawless violence of these savages. No complaint was listened to by the local authorities.

After this state of things had continued for some time, a government notice appeared in the official Gazette, calling on the respective planters to shew cause why all Indian labourers should not be sent back to their native country, and the rations given them by the police paid for at the expense of the planters. Some of the planters, rather more bold than the rest, ventured humbly to represent, in written memorials to the governor, the intolerable hardship of being saddled with the expense of maintaining them, and of transporting them back to their own country, after the dreadful loss they had sustained by the advance of wages and the expense of bringing them to the island. To this temperate and legitimate address no reply was given, and, immediately after, a peremptory order was issued to the chief commissioner of police to have all the Indians embarked forthwith. The order was, of course, instantaneously obeyed. Three vessels were got ready for the purpose; and the tumultuous host of these lawless vagrants, who seemed to glory in the impunity with which they had been able to perpetrate so much mischief, embarked with banners flying, and such shouts of malicious triumph, as at first spread consternation through the whole town.

Thus terminated the attempt to establish free labour in the Mauritius; but its results, at the date of the last accounts, had not terminated. The government advocate had received instructions to institute legal proceedings against nineteen of the principal planters, in order to draw from them payment of the expenses incurred in the maintenance and passage of these Indians! On the subject of this prosecution will depend the adoption of similar measures against the rest of the planters who have had the misfortune to be concerned in this abortive scheme of introducing free agricultural labour into the Mauritius. What the result will be it is not difficult to anticipate. The ill-fated colonial planter is a being whom every colonial authority may trample in the dust at pleasure, certain that the harsher he treats them, the more he will be praised in the mother country, and the higher he will be rewarded by the directors who direct the heads of the Colonial Office. But enquiry must come; and when it does come, the results cannot be pleasant to those more immediately interested. The colonial government of the Mauritius would not have ventured to have acted in the manner that has been described, unless they had had higher authority, and unless they had been certain that they would, against the planters in the Mauritius, have the support of Aldermanbury Street, which, on any day it chooses, can make Downing Street tremble.*

Is there, my Lord Duke, an honest and right-thinking Briton, who can contemplate the proceedings I have noticed without a feeling of alarm and indignation? Is there an independent mind in the British empire who can look at them, and yet not blush for his country?

Before I conclude, permit me for a moment to advert to that den of pestilence and vice, Sierra Leone. Official shame and concealment can no longer deny the complete failure of this senseless experiment. During the last session of Parliament, two important reports have been published regarding this place by order of the House of Commons. The first, paper No. 37, was made up of papers selected to defend it; the last, paper No. 661, containing the evidence of naval officers and others employed on the coast, showing the horrid nature of the place, the total want of improvement of the population collected in it, and the vast superiority of Fernando Po, in salubrity, fertility, and eligibility, over it. In the first report, Du Barry describes the climate as terrific. Owing to the great heat during the rains, and owing to "the sand and porous red sandstone which forms the stratum on which the town is erected, we are," says he, "for more than six months in the year, living in an ocean of vapour!" So thick is this steam vapour, as Commodore Britton in his evidence informs us, that when ashore at the governor's house, but which he was as seldom as possible, he has seen his excellency "get on his horse, at his own door, in the morning, and shortly afterwards I have merely seen tails or muzzles—I have not seen his horse at all!" No European constitution,

* Mauritius is one of those colonies which is arbitrarily governed by the regulations and laws of those who govern the official heads in Downing Street. How it improves under these, the following list of sentences, passed upon slaves in the criminal court of the colony, particularly since the application of the orders in council of 1824, will shew:—

nor any constitution, can stand this steam-bath. Colonel NICHOLS gives us a dreadful picture of the pestilence of the place. In his passage out to Fernando Po he was a few days at Sierra Leone. The ship's crew caught the fever. "In their way down," says he, "a seaman, a marine, and a midshipman, died. They had a most extraordinary eruption upon them. I said, 'This is not a fever of the West Indies, but a malignant yellow fever; therefore do not dissect them.' The surgeons dissected them, and EVERY ONE of the surgeons were taken ill, and ALL OF THEM died but one; two of them died just as we had got to Fernando Po, and the third died afterward."

Regarding the character of the black population, and the improvement of that population which we have collected in Sierra Leone, let the following short extracts, taken from the last-mentioned official report, testify and show:—

GEORGE JACKSON, Esq. one of the Judges of the Mixed Commission Court, examined by the Committee, states — "Quest. Their joy at first landing properly?" Ans. One can hardly make of any feeling they have; they are more like BATTLE BLASTS than any thing else, when they come ashore. Quest. You have made use of the expression that the slaves landed were more like brutes than human beings; does that refer to their habits of life, or their understanding? Ans. Those who come from the country north of Serra Leone, I should not so describe; but those from the Right of Benin and from the south, I should. Quest. They are lower in the class of intelligence, taking them together? Ans. Yes. Quest. Could you get any satisfactory information from them on the topics on which you examine them? Ans. With the greatest difficulty. Quest. Did that arise from want of power of expression, or want of capacity? Ans. BOTH THE ONE AND THE OTHER!"

Mr GEORGE CLARK, Second Clerk of the Ordnance Works, and who had been five years at Sierra Leone, questioned by the Committee, states:—" Ans. They are scarcely half clothed in the villages. Quest. What is your opinion as to the opportunities, on the part of liberated Africans, to pursue useful occupations? Ans. I do not think they are capable of it. Quest. From want of industry? Ans. FROM WANT OF CAPACITY. Quest. Is there any want of industry? Ans. No, I think not. Quest. Did you perceive any advance in intelligence in the liberated Africans who had been there any length of time? Ans. No, I DID NOT! Quest. Do you think there have been no improvements in their houses? Ans. No, not among the liberated Africans." Colonel NICHOLS examined, states:—" Quest. Are the Committee to understand that the blacks resident in Fernando Po generally abstain from liquor? Ans. The blacks we take in slave vessels do not like liquor, but those fellows in Sierra Leone are the biggest drunkards I ever met with in my life, and the biggest rascals too, they are also great thieves."

A communication, dated Freetown, July, 1830, (see Morning Post, 11th October,) describes the character of the population thus: "You would be astonished to see the prevalence of vice in this wretched place. All the great landmarks of civilisation are noticed only with the view of drawing fresh supplies from the Northern Country. They are never dwelt on as being conducive to happiness, or practised in the search of it. Here the European and the African, with some few exceptions, know but the resemblance of virtue, and that only as the means of ENABLING THEM TO INDULGE IN VICE." But this is not all. The reports referred to, and the communication just alluded to, tell us decidedly, that "the slave trade is carried on to a considerable extent in this very colony!" JUDGE JEFFCOTE, lately sent from this country, in an address to a jury, told them, however "appalling the fact may be, and incredible as it must appear to many," still that in this Colony persons are "found who aid and abet the abominable traffic in slaves." "Vessels are purchased, after their condemnation by the Mixed Commission Courts, to make a second and a third experiment in the slave trade, to be perhaps again captured by our cruisers, and again bought up by the skulking foreigners who prowl about this place as the one best calculated for their iniquitous purposes!" At that sitting he sentenced to five years' imprisonment in the house of correction, THOMAS EDWARD COWAN, a missionary schoolmaster, for having stolen in order "to sell into slavery," a liberated African, and one of his

All the officers examined by the Committee, condemn Sierra Leone as unfit for any useful purpose, and give the most unqualified and decided testimony in favour of the salubrity and fertility of Fernando Po, and of its superiority over Sierra Leone in every respect, for any purpose that this country can require in its future connexion with Africa. The delusive tales of free labour on the coast of Africa are also completely set at rest by the reports in question, but more particularly so from the following extract from a letter, dated 1st May, 1829, from Lieut.-Colonel FINLAY to R. W. HAY, Esq.:

‘ I beg leave to state to you, for the information of the Right Honourable the Secretary of State, that a great portion of the inhabitants of St Mary’s, in the Gambia, are composed of SLAVES belonging to the French of Goree and Senegal, who resort to the British settlement for employment; and although many of them have resided on the settlement for years, they are strongly attached to their owners, and regularly remit to them the produce of their labours, which draws a large sum of money out of the settlement annually.’

This, my Lord Duke, is a new and a remarkable fact, but what is more remarkable is, that while French slaves are permitted to labour in this manner in British settlements on the Coast of Africa, French slaves, who come from French colonies to any British colony in the West Indies, are confiscated and liberated. Whence comes this African partiality?

The official report last alluded to confirms, in the fullest manner, the fact, that the slave trade is actually, at this moment, carrying on in Sierra Leone, almost openly, and with approbation. But this is not all. Is your Grace aware that MAJOR RICKETTS, lately governor of the place, has brought with him to the Colonial Office a petition, signed by almost all the Nova Scotians and Maroons in the place, PRAYING, in the most earnest manner, that they may be carried away from it, and sent to Jamaica, and placed upon any estate that Government may choose in that island!! What can the advocates of this wretched place say to these facts, or where is the minister or the legislator who will, after such disclosures, stand forward and defend this infamous den of deception, delusion, extravagance, waste, pestilence, and death, or the system for which it was established? He must be a bold man indeed who will do so.

National insanity, my Lord Duke, was never before exhibited to the world in more striking and in more remarkable characters, than it has been in the conduct pursued by this country in whatever concerns our settlements on the coast of Africa, and whatever relates to our West India Colonies. In the former we have, after repeated violations of the law of nations, and in the face of all rational counsel and advice, spent millions, many millions of money, not only to no purpose, but absolutely, after a labour of forty years, left things where we found them, and have, at last, been compelled to acknowledge, not only that the Africans, whom we have, at such a vast expense, collected in Sierra Leone, have not improved in character, industry, and civilisation, but that they never can improve, (see MR MACORMICK’S evidence, a friend to the place, in the official report already referred to,) unless we cease to bring any more of their brutal and barbarous countrymen amongst them! This is the result of forty years’ labour, and the expenditure of upwards of ten millions of money! With regard to the latter, the West India Colonies, we have, in order to benefit the former quarter, pursued and pursue a system, which paralyzes, crushes, and destroys that vast branch of British capital, trade, and industry, which had been planted in them, and not only so, but while thus forcing on the ruin of British subjects and British property in these possessions, we are driving British capital, withdrawn from them, into the cultivation of foreign countries, thereby giving employment to the population of those countries instead of our own, and also creating wealth, capital, and trade to those countries, at the expense of our own. My Lord Duke, the fact is notorious, that great London capitalists have lately been, and are at this moment, investing large sums of money, on the security of slave-cultivated sugar estates in Louisiana and in the Brazils. How humiliating must it be to British statesmen to have it thus shewn unto them, that British subjects consider their capital, when fixed and employed in distant foreign countries, more secure than it is, or can be, under the dominion of their own country !

It might have been prudent and politic in this country never to have had any thing to do with colonies so peopled and so cultivated, as our tropical colonies are, and it may now be politic and prudent to abandon them. The first point I am not called upon to discuss, neither am I called upon to discuss or to determine the latter, further than to observe and to maintain, that having established these colonies, the property in them can neither be destroyed nor taken away without a fatal departure from true national policy, and the most profligate violation of national character, honour, and justice.

The government recommended and called for by all the Anti-colonists for our Colonies is a pure and unmixed despotism. Mr Twiss, late Under Secretary for the Colonies, when lately writing to Mr STEWART, of the Treasury, about the liberated Africans, who swarm idle in our Colonies, stated, that if they did not forthwith become industrious and independent, "the Crown would RESUME ITS ARBITRARY DISPOSAL of them," in order, as Sir George Murray, in a circular letter, states, that they might be "constrained to labour." If these British pets, the free blacks, are to be thus governed, what are the white Colonists to expect from the sway of a country, the ears of which are every hour poisoned against them ?—What are they to expect—but that which they feel—namely, degradation, insult, and ruin ?

I observe, with regret, that Mr HORTON's first, and otherwise able and excellent letter, addressed to the Electors of Yorkshire, is disfigured by such anti-British and anti-constitutional principles and sentiments. He boasts how the Orders in Council had been enforced in the Crown Colonies, although these orders, by their direct interference with private property, violated the capitulations on which the colonies surrendered, and also the resolutions of the House of Commons of 1823, which both alike guaranteed the inviolability of private property. Having done this, Mr HORTON proceeds in a tone wholly unbecoming the statesman of a free country, to inform his readers, that unless the old British Colonies surrender their birthright and privileges as Britons, and submit to be ruled as the conquered colonies are ruled, that "their ruin would be as inevitable as the case of the infatuated Ministry of Charles the Tenth ;" and, moreover, "that they might depend upon it, they will neither have success nor pity," if they perish in their attempts to resist such authority.

Mr HORTON never attempts to shew the justice of the application of this authority. On the contrary, he tells us, that "they are not called upon to approve of the change" which its application will create, but, nevertheless, that it must be obeyed. No act of Polignac or his colleagues, or of any other ministry, however "infatuated," ever can be compared, in danger and folly, to Mr HORTON's threatenings. The framers of the Orders in Council were, in fact, the Polignacs and "infatuated" ministry, and not the ill-treated and ill-ruled colonies.

In order that the colonists "may have the country with them, to secure them equitable compensation for loss," Mr HORTON requires of them—for such is the real meaning of the words, when the declarations are stripped of the veil thrown over them by the jargon, "public opinion"—that, after having denuded themselves of a large portion of their property, they should in future, and in order to make African savages industrious, moral, and civilized, apply their time, their talents, their industry, their capital, and their credit, to enforce such regulations as the arbitrary will of the mother-country, and a prejudiced party in it, may think necessary to accomplish their objects ;—in other, and in a few words, that, politically speaking, the slaves should be emancipated, and the masters constituted slaves ! Such would be the results ; but such doctrines are not yet become "public opinion" in Great Britain, and I trust they never will.

"Who are the West Indians," said a limb of office, "that they should complain of the proceedings of goverment, or consider themselves entitled to dwell in streets and squares in the West-end of London? In early life, they were only accustomed to receive bread and beer, and they never ought to have any thing better." Such is the language of men who, if we had not colonies and offices to govern them, would never have had any thing but bread and beer, and never seen either the West-end or the East-end of London. Their country disowns men who trample in this manner upon the feelings of their industrious countrymen, and it would be well for such individuals to remember that insult from public servants is worse to bear than injustice and oppression.

Such feelings and such principles having obtained a seat in high places in the mother-country, they quickly, and in every shape, and on every occasion, find their way into the colonies, where they are acted upon without shame and without compassion. The colonies are thus for every valuable purpose abandoned by the mother-country. They are oppressed and fleeced at the will and pleasure of every theorist and hypocrite. Complaint is unavailing, remonstrance is set down as "contumacy;" and on which ever side we turn our eyes upon our colonial possessions, we find injustice and oppression the order of the day, and capital, industry, and character in despair, languishing, and becoming heartbroken, and extinguished under the galling rod which is permitted to rule them. Law and justice are prostituted and trampled upon, until there is no longer any security for character, liberty, or property. Look, my Lord Duke, at the desperate and unblushing proceedings of open violence which go on without restraint, censure, or punishment, in Tortola; and look at St Lucia, where proceedings are going on which are an indelible stigma to a British Government, and which continued must bring ruin on the colony. Look at what was done by a Judge in Grenada, and at what was attempted by an Attorney-General in Tobago! Look at the important colony of Jamaica, connected with which the Colonial Secretary of Great Britain is compelled to insult the constitutional understanding of the British empire, by placing the fables of the anonymous informer, and the irresponsible and unconstitutional authority of the upstarts of Aldermaubury Street, above and before the enquiry, and the decisions by the laws and the legal tribunals of that colony! Good God, my Lord Duke, are such proceedings to be permitted to continue, without check or control, to degrade our country, and, by oppressing parts of our dominions, produce a mischief which will go to dismember our empire? Impossible!

From the slavery to, from the galling chains of, that ambitious party which has brought my country to this contemptible and degraded state, by "SAYING HIS MAJESTY'S MINISTERS THE TROUBLE OF THINKING," I pray, and most sincerely, my Lord Duke, in the language of the Liturgy, "Good Lord deliver us," this country, your Grace, and every Statesman who may in future be called upon and appointed to direct the affairs, and to watch over the interests, of this country!

I am, &c.

IGNORAMUS ON THE FINE ARTS.

"PAINTING is a mystery." Strange that an art which addresses the most perfect of the senses should not be plain as daylight. Yet the more pictures I see, the more I read, and hear, and reflect about painters and their works, the more I am convinced that Pompey the clown is right in his observation. The more I seem to know, the nearer I approach the Socratic conviction, "that I know nothing!"

I speak not of the mystery of making pictures, but of that which involves their merits and demerits, when made. That there should be technical secrets, mysteries of the craft, is no more than might be expected. I can easily conceive, that to paint air, may be as difficult as to raise the wind, and that I never could do by whistling—that middle tint, like other happy middles, is hard to hit, and harder to keep—that a true carnation is as skilful a compound as a haggis—that to group a picture successfully may be as delicate a concern as to marshal a country dance at a country assembly, (and that would puzzle a modern herald, or seneschal of the olden time,)—that the inner light of the Venetian colourists may be as unaccountable as the inward illumination of the elect—nay, I apprehend and appreciate the science and dexterity which can distinguish a horse from a crocodile, and a tree from a birch-broom. As for chiaroscuro, tone, keeping, contour, repose, &c. they are words which I venerate and understand as well as your worthy preceptor doth Selah, Michtham, Negonoth, or Hallelujah. Yet I doubt not they have a meaning, as precise and categorical as the polarity of moral truth. Of the executive-difficulties of art I may be allowed to judge—inasmuch as, after many years' self-instruction, and six lessons from an itinerant drawing-master, I never could represent a joint stool in just perspective, or delineate the correct profile of a gibbet. As for colouring, though I was early aware that light and shade in nature do not lie in jagged patches like the skin of a spotted negro, nor resemble London snow, or a damsel in a white gown newly emerged from the embraces of a chimney-sweeper—that Spring, the lightsome lassie, does not wear green gingham, nor Autumn invest her maturer charms in a red and yellow Manchester print—I was totally unable to make any practical use of the knowledge, except indeed to convince myself, that a precocious passion for pencils and colour-boxes is no infallible sign of a genius for the fine arts.

In truth, I am well contented to be ignorant of the mechanical arcana of art. Secrets of practice are profitable to none but practitioners. When I look on a fine picture, I would gladly forget the laborious, greasy, dirty-handed process that produced so much beauty, and believe it a living emanation of the inspired intellect—a magic mirror of the artist's mind. What youthful poet, wooing his Fancy's Queen with tender poesy, would choose to have her witness to his "poetic pains"—the blots, the erasures, the gnawing of his pen—his stolen glances at the rhyming dictionary, his furtive forays into the "Elegant Extracts," and the "Beauties of the Living Poets?" What extempore preacher would expose his note-book to his congregation? For my own part I like a good beef-steak, but have no desire to follow it from the stall to the gridiron. I dearly love a Christmas pantomime. Old Prynn and Jeremy Collier, if their hearts were in the right place, (and Jeremy was a sound nonjuring Tory,) would have uncursed the stage, had they seen the bliss of wonderment, the bright, round, rosy, innocent faces of the children, the smug, rustic, half-childish delight of country cousins, and the glorious independence of the one-shilling gallery, at these silent dramas. But I would not, like the gallants of Shakspeare's days, place my stool on the stage during the performance, for fear of slipping through a trap-door, nor venture behind the scenes, lest I should forget to give Columbine her title, or mistake some venerable Peer for Pantaloon.

But there is a mystery in art which I would fain dive into—a mystery of grace, of grandeur, of harmony—a power in lines and colours, which I cannot explain, and only half enjoy.

It never was my fortune to visit the foreign seats of art, and my acquaintance with English collections is neither intimate nor extensive; of course, therefore, my notions of the grand style are vague, metaphysical, or at least poetical, for engravings of epic or tragic pictures, are as unsatisfactory as prose versions of epic poems. They shew what the work is about, not what it is. The temples of Greece and Italy, sublime in desolation, lovely in widow's weeds, are to me unreal as the hidden bowers of Izem. I never trode the long galleries of the Escorial, where the Titians slumber in peaceful beauty, ripening with mellow years. The Louvre and the Luxembourg are hard words, which I dare not pronounce, and scarce can spell. The Vatican, the Sistine Chapel, the Florentine Gallery, are fair imaginations, or rather indistinct yearnings, not so definite or vivid as the hall of Valhalla. Michael Angelo is like Demogorgon, an awful name, and that is all,—Raphael, Titian, Salvator Rosa, I have heard and read of. I believe in them—love them—but what are they to me? Were Raphael's miracles of grace decayed—if nought remained to shew where they had been, but such quaint mockeries of shapes as mouldy damp describe on the walls of a deserted mansion, I could dream of him still—still could I dream of faces whose beauty was no formal symmetry of outline, no bloom that Time bestows and takes away—but a permanent law and generative principle of loveliness, a visible efflux of divinity—still would I believe that what to me was but a dream, the fashion whereof I strove in vain to recall, was to Raphael a waking intuition, a clear idea, distinct in part and lineament, informing his skill, and ruling his hand, and substantiated in his "human forms divine." Had Titian's colours been evanescent as the rainbow, I could yet believe (and alas! the time must come, when none can more than believe it) that his canvass glowed with the gorgeous light of prophetic vision, and melted with the voluptuous hues of lovers' fancy—that he clothed his naked goddesses with beauty as a garment—revealed young seraphs trailing clouds of glory, and shed immortal sunshine on Elysian plains. Salvator Rosa—never was man so blessed in a name!—But I once did see a landscape of Salvator's, which taught me what an imaginative thing a landscape may be, when drawn by a painter, not a land-surveyor—by a poet-painter, not a mere portrait-maker of wood, earth, and water (Nature's three flat notes, as Sir William Chambers* called them, like a flat as he was.) That shall positively be the last pun—this page—Such shaggy rocks—such dark and ruinous caves—such spectre-eyed, serpent-headed trees, wreathed and contorted into hideous mimicry of human shape, as if by the struggles of evil spirits incarcerated in their trunks—such horrid depths of shade—such fearful visitations of strange light—such horrid likenesses

"Of all the mishaped half-human thoughts That solitary nature feeds," were surely never congregated in any local spot, assuredly not in merry England, nor Scotland either, for Robin Hood and "brave Rob Roy" were outlaws of another vein than Salvator's banditti, whose men of women born, nor fed with mother's milk, "nor ever dandled on a father's knee," but natural kindred of the murderous woods and unholy dens they lurk in. They are no more sib to the free dwellers of Sherwood, than to the gentlemen of the Beggar's Opera. And then, such women! horribly beautiful! It is pleasant to talk of Corregio, Caravaggio, Julio Romano, Carlo Dolci, Domenichino, Parmegiano, and the rest of the Roman, Venetian, and Bolognese schools, their names are so musical. I have a superstitious reverence for

* See the "Heroic Epistle," attributed to Mason, one of the most vigorous satires of latter times. One should hardly have expected it from so grave and reverend a gentleman. Yet who more grave and proper than Virgil, and he has displayed a strong satiric vein in more than one passage.

"Qui Baviu non edit—amet tua carmina, Mævi."

is worth a wilderness of Baviads and Mæviads. Gray, too, precise as he was, could wield the knot with a knowing spirit. See his lines upon Tophet.

Albert Durer, a sort of bowing and speaking acquaintance with Teniers; I should like to be introduced to that pleasant, good-for-nothing Frenchman, Watteau, his pictures are such smooth, well-bred pieces of court scandal, as good as Grammont or Horace Walpole. I often quote Thomson's lines about "learned Poussin;" and am heartily tired of hearing English sun-sets always called Claude-like scenes. As for Beck, Bolawert, Bischof, Sceldt, Rottenhammer, Heere, Helmskirk, Houdekötter, Hoskins, Howbraken, Ketel, Ralf, Cock, Block, Mengs, and Hink, I perfectly abhor their names, and am determined never to mention them in a sonnet as long as I live.

With respect to Sculpture, my faith is great, and my knowledge very small. It is, however, much easier to conceive a statue than a painting, because the relation of parts to the whole is much simpler, and more obvious. Casts and prints give a very tolerable idea of what sort of excellence can be attained in marble or bronze. I have seen a copy of the Medicean Venus, and thought it an exceedingly clever model of a pretty lovable little woman. But I was neither "dazzled" nor "drunk with beauty," and must be excused if I doubt whether Byron was either. In Don Juan he speaks out, sensibly and plainly—

"I've seen far finer women, plump and raw,

Than all the creations of their stone ideal."

"Loving in stone" must needs be Platonic love with a vengeance. Venus and common sense defend me from falling in love with a statue, either literal or metaphorical! In soft, fascinating, sexual loveliness, marble is a very inadequate representative of flesh and blood; and in bodying forth the beauties of the mind, the inexplicable combinations of thought, and feeling, Sculpture is almost as inferior to Painting, as Painting to Poetry,—all are poor in comparison of Nature, who is true Poetry. Still the Venus de Medici is all it can or ought to be; it is more glorious to have given a title to such a work, than to have reigned over the vale of Arno. There is another Venus, known by the untranslatable epithet Kallipyga, which I have also seen in little—concerning which I shall borrow the rapture of that amiable cockney, Janus Weathercock, whilom connoisseur in ordinary to that dear defunct—the London—(Taylor and Hessey.) "Where shall we find a light sufficiently pervading for my exquisite coquette, my alluring bashfulness, that with such ravishing affectation gathers sidelong the thin robes high from her blooming limbs long-stepping—

Thou beauteous-ankled nameless one, what country gave thee birth?

Who was the god, or godlike youth, made blessed with thy love?

What thrilling fingers

Drew o'er the rounded wrist the elastic

• Ring of gold?

Is Nature now worn out? Or wert thou always as now, a vision of desire, the flower of a mind burning with the Idea of Beauty never to be realized, but by its own faint reflection?" Well done—now were I to try all night, I could not put myself into such an ecstasy. It is a very pretty figure, however, but my frigid barbarism has been far more affected by the sight of a rosy Westmoreland lassie, tripping over a swollen brook, with her basket on her head, looking behind and around her, to see if she were unobserved, and bursting out in a half-pleased, half-alarmed laugh at the rustle of the copse hard by—than with any dim reflection of even Greek ideas. There is, methinks, a pravity of taste, a positive moral disproportion, in lavishing so much fond foolishness on an unsympathising block, a toy of mere mechanic craft. The legitimate pleasure to be derived from works of art is calm, austere, intellectual. The true object of admiration, is the intellect, that can so enshrine itself in passive matter, and fix a thought for perpetuity, awake the sense of beauty in a thousand minds through countless generations, and make us venerate the godlike in our possible selves.*

* Since writing the above, I have seen another Venus, a copy from the antique, in the most immaculate marble. It is a crouching figure, supported on one knee, with exquisite gracefulness, half concealing the face and bosom with the round flexile

I confess I suspect the Apollo to be of a higher style of excellence than even the Venus; perhaps because Milman's prize verses have taught me how to admire it. But is not masculine beauty more truly statuesque, more coldly and correctly ideal, than the charin of womanhood? It addresses itself purely to the understanding, through the eye; it is a matter of measurement—a geometric diagram. Theory and Nature are not there at strife. Men, to be sure, such as one sees of a market-day, or in the Serpentine river on a Sunday, are not Apollos; their visage must be seen in their mind before they can be loved; but this is all to the advantage of the sculptor. His work is the less liable to suffer by a comparison with Nature's. At any rate, I have seen much sweeter women than the Venus—I never saw a man half so handsome as the Apollo. One great merit of this statue is, that it is not effeminate. With all the showery luxuriance of unshorn locks, the smooth and radiant aspect, the rounded limbs, that lead the eye unchecked along the undulating maze of beauty—it is every inch a god, instinct with immortal youth and masculine divinity. Now, common-place artists, and poets too, seem to copy the modern practice of the theatres—when they want to shew a nice young man, they put a buxom female into male attire. Who, that ever has seen, can forget the Vestris in Giovanni? and more than one pretty little lady has made her musical debut in Macbeth. To see how the dear creatures play with the pistols! It were a pleasure to be robbed by such highway-women. However, the device serves to unrealize the play, which, delightful as its just and powerful satire makes it in perusal, is a great deal too real for decorous representation. By the way, the Beggar's Opera is far above the customary pitch of Gay—Swift had surely a hand in it. But this is depressing.

The Farnese Hercules—a huge mass of muscle, sullenly reclining on a knotty club—is a terrible personification of animal power—a sort of animated oak-tree. Nothing, compact of bone and fibre, could withstand the explosive force of its sinews; yet it is as sluggish, and apparently as unthinking, as powder in a mine, before the train is ignited. It is said to be admirable in its anatomy; and being a genuine antique, is free from that disgusting pedantry which some modern muscle-mongers have brought from the dissecting-room—a school in which it is as vain to seek for the grace of the body, as for the seat of the soul. Better that a statue should not be quite correct in anatomy, than that it should look like a mummy, and smell of putrefaction. Let the surgeons make casts and preparations for themselves. Contrasted with the Apollo, this gnarled protuberant heap of iron flesh happily illustrates the difference between corporeal strength and spiritual energy—between Charles and Orlando. Still, it is an ugly monster; and I like it the worse, because I wrote fifty lines in its praise, which did not obtain the Newdigate prize.*

I have gazed for hours at the Elgin arms. The face, as usual in Grecian statues, has little expression. It is not the crafty, laughter-loving goddess of wiles and witcheries; but Aphrodite, fresh from the pure ocean, a being mature in beauty, with the soul of new-born infancy, simply conscious of its own sweet life, and the light of Heaven. It has not the holiness of Eve, but scarce less innocence. The man who could be offended at its nudity, must have the imagination of a monk, or a French atheist, and should read none but the Family Dramatists. I should not like to see a lady looking grave at it. It is as fine an illustration of the infinite unity of beauty, as ever I saw in art. You cannot point out where a single line begins or ends. It is the property of James Branker, Esq., a worthy citizen of a state whose "merchants are princes," who will make Winander merry and musical as in days of yore.

* Considering the wide circulation of Maga, not only in every part of the British dominions, but in the United States, and wherever the English language is spoken, (to say nothing of the German, Swedish, and Slavonic versions,) it is possible that some of her readers may not know what the Newdigate prize is. Sir Roger Newdigate, a wealthy nabob, bequeathed £20 per annum for ever, to the University of marbles—"the importation whereof constitutes an era in British art;" and having read in Hogarth's Analysis that Michael Angelo discovered the line of beauty in a Torso, was not without hopes of eliciting a

Oxford, for the best copy of verses, not exceeding fifty lines, on some subject of ancient painting, sculpture, or architecture. Professor Wilson was the first winner, and he has been followed by Milman, Chinnery, and others of minor note; for a University which is continually stocking the country with scholars and divines, cannot be expected to produce a great poet every year.

Not for so vain and impertinent a purpose as to arraign the decision of the Vice-Chancellor, both the Proctors, the Poetry Professor, and Public Orator, in my own case, but simply to warn future aspirants against injudicious borrowing from the ancients, I mention a little circumstance attending my lines on the Farnese Hercules. Speaking of the protuberance of the muscles, I wrote as follows.

Those starting sinews, which thick-ranged appear,
Like the broad pebbles in a river clear.

This couplet excited considerable ridicule, was pronounced "lakisht," (a term as opprobrious at Oxford, in respect of poetry, as Whiggish, applied to politics, and, as my flatterers insinuated, caused the rejection of my fifty lines. Now, in fact, the obnoxious simile originated, not on the banks of Windermere or Derwent, but by the classic fount of Arethusa. In Theocritus's description of the Athlete Amycus, Idyll 22, we read thus

Στήθε δι-Φαίρωτε πλάσμα, καὶ πλάτυ ἰώτον, Σαρκὶ σιδάρεη σφυρηλατος, δια κλοστος.
Εὖ θμίμεις στερεῖς τε βραχίονες ἀπὸ ὕψους
Εἰσάται, ἥντι πίτροι οὐλοῖτοχοί εἰσι κολινδῶν
Χιμαῖρος ποταμός μεγαλαῖς περιζέει δίκαις.

Literally, "His breasts enormous, and expansive back, were covered with iron flesh—as a colossus fashioned with the hammer; and in his stalwart arms, beneath his shoulders' tip, the muscles stood, like round rolling stones, which a river, swollen with winter rains, tumbles along with it, and boils about in mighty eddies." On which passage Coplestone ("Prælectiones Academicæ," p. 79) observes, "Amyci Athletæ forma ad exemplum statue alicujus insignis aut tabule videtur exprimi," perhaps, if chronology permit, Theocritus might be thinking of the Farnese Hercules at the very time. I hate chronology, and love Shakspeare for his anachronisms as much as for his puns. Seriously—I mean not to murmur at the criticisms of my academical superiors, or contemporaries. There is an idle fashion of disparaging prize poems, as if the tamest, tritest compositions had the best chance of success—as if Heber's Palestine had not been a prize poem—as if Porteus, and Lowth, and Wilson, and Milman, had not been prize men. It is neither likely nor fit that academic judges should authorize daring innovations on established models, or encourage the audacity of empiric geniuses. Nor does English poetry properly belong to the course of college studies. I am not sure that prizes for English verse are necessary or advantageous in an University at all. They certainly withdraw the attention from the regular course of studies, and sometimes gain a temporary eclat for clever idle men, which is not desirable. Surely, then, the rulers of public instruction are right in patronising that cast of poetry which is most strictly academical—which indicates most care, study, and self-possession—though it should not always be the most promising. Whatever political economists may think of bounties upon exportation, bounties upon genius are little needed in this generation. After all, of the number of rejected prize poems which their authors have thought proper to print, is there one, which does not justify the award of the Dons?

Talking of lakishness—the Southrons, and some of you Northerns too, have a strange idea of the Lakes—as if they constituted a sort of rural Grub-street—as if rhyme, rhythm, blank verse, and English hexameter, were the vernacular dialect of the hills—as if Windermere were a huge puddle of ink, and the wild-geese, when they fly over our vales, dropped ready-made pens out of their pinions. Tout au contraire, I assure you, gentlemen. The Lake Poets are aliens to a man; they brought their disease with them, and not a single native has caught the infection.

I cannot conclude this inordinately egotistical note, without a word of just praise theory from the headless Iliuss, while in the Theseus, whose features have not suffered much more punishment than would have befallen a successful pugilist in the best days of the prize-ring, I fain would have imagined an Olympic victor, reposing after the strife of the Cestus—only there were no marks of body blows. I conjured up a legion of fauncies, each attended with a note of admiration for its squire—outline ecstasies, raptures in chiaroscuro—but it would not do. In vain I culled the finest words in English, Greek, Latin, French, and what Italian I had picked out of music-books—and tried to talk myself into a taste, by explaining their superlative excellence to whomsoever I could get to seem to listen. I was as cold as the marbles themselves; and all my imaginations were like the silent practice in which a cathedral organist exercises his fingers during the lessons and sermon, which only wants the puff of the bellows to be eloquent music. I tried the antiquarian tack—bethought me how these shattered relics grew beneath the hand of Phidias—how joyously he marked the approximation of the rude block to his preconceived idea—how quickly and thankfully he availed himself of every hint which the grain of the marble, a slip of the chisel, any passing object or accident, suggested to his quick-conceiving fancy—how Pericles, Sophocles, Socrates, watched his progress, and young Plato stood by musing on the quiddity of the εἶδος—how often he was interrupted by the freaks of that mischievous urchin Alcibiades—and how divinely drunk the whole city of Athens got at the housewarming of the Parthenon, anticipating the Dionysia, and seeing every grace and perfection of the consummate divinities double. I wonder whether a drunk Athenian was as assinine as a drunk Englishman—how many generations of fair, and wise, and wicked citizens gazed upon them—on those very statues then before me, till they became like the dim blue Hymettus, and the dark blue sea, the natural inheritance of Athenian eyes, the pride of Athenian prosperity, the prouder solace of Athens in decay. But this also was vanity, and worse—it was a sore vexation. Better that Britain had remained, as in the days of Chaucer, of Spenser, even of Milton, a land where thought alone reflected or consummated the beauty of nature, than that we should learn the mechanism and trick of the cunning artificer, by plundering the helpless and the fallen. If it please Heaven that we should have painters and sculptors, they will rise in due time; and the same power that made Homer a poet, without antique models—that in every art has made the makers of models with no model but Nature, will teach our artists to realize their own ideal, and to equal, not resemble, the masters of brighter climes, and ages of historic fame. The Elgin marbles may make sculptors of lads who ought to be carpenters—they may possibly humanise the bodiless cherubs on our churchyard stones; but they will not conjure the soul of Phidias into John Bull. The coward Philistine, who bribed a harlot to deprive Samson of his strength, was none the stronger for his treachery.

Such were my reflections in the year 18—, when I last visited the British Museum. If I erred, at least I erred in good company; for the Duke of Wellington, who restored the works of art to Italy, and Felicia Hemans, who sang so sweet a song of triumph for their return, were manifestly of my opinion. Lord Byron's maledictions on "the scoundrel Scot," are too well known to be quoted, and far too anti-patriotic to be quoted in this Magazine. Let us rather suppose that Lord Elgin was incited, like Brutus, by the love to the excellent work I have quoted in my own justification; but perhaps it is enough to say that it is the work of Copland. Whoever would form a right judgment of the characteristic excellence of ancient poetry, unbiassed by mere veneration for ancient names, will find himself improved by its perusal. It is to be regretted, that the rules of his office (that of Poetry Professor) prevented his illustrating his position by the collation of modern examples with the antique prototypes. But English was to him a forbidden speech, and French, Spanish, German, Italian, unholy as wizard's spells.

of his country—by pure love of the arts—like the man that stole the sacramental plate out of pure religion, because he did not approve of the churchwardens. No more, probably, does Lord Elgin of the modern Athenians; he thought, perhaps, that statues were of no more use to them than books to a man who cannot read—that Britain is now the true Greece, and London “the city of the soul.” At any rate, he bought the statues, and paid for them, and sold them again at a loss; and were I a sculptor, the chance is, that I should feel truly grateful to him. As it is, I do not think I will vote for sending them back, at least till the Government of Greece is settled on a firm basis. Is it not enough that we were willing to have given the Greeks a king if we could have found any body to accept the honour? Alas! they are much in the situation of the trees in Jotham’s parable, and I fear the thorn will reign over them at last.

“To fall to somewhat of a slower method,” as King Dick says, it must be allowed that pictures and statues lose some portion of their sentimental interest, though not of their intrinsic worth, by expatriation. It is, moreover, an injury to the mighty dead—to the memory of their authors, who bequeathed them to their countries for an everlasting possession. Poetry floats on the wind, it is as communicable as fire, and all are gainers by its diffusion. But the genius of the painter, the sculptor, the architect, is embodied in matter circumscribed by locality. The temple must stand or fall beneath the same point of heaven that shone propitious on its erection. The picture, the carved image, though in some sort appertaining to the universal intellect, do yet partake of the nature of property, of national property; and though it may plausibly be argued that the fee-simple ought to reside in the nation that can make the best use of them,—such a line of reasoning would prove too much—at least for the security of vested interests in general. What would the Courts think, if it were advanced as a plea for appropriating another man’s horse, that the said owner was a bad jockey?

There is one purpose to which sculpture has immemorially been applied—wherein I think Gothic ignorance has stumbled on the right way, and modern skill “overleaps itself.” I mean in sepulchral effigies. The old recumbent figures with hands joined over the bosom, as if they had died praying, with the quaint black-letter inscriptions, accord far better with the repose of death, than the most artful imitation of life which even a Chantrey would execute. Death will still be death, and the bare skull will look ghastly, though you crown it with roses. Faith makes our departure joyful; but the best that sense can shew of death is peace, marble stillness. Unseemly is the cold, unmoving mimicry of life, in the holy neighbourhood of dust that hath lived.

But why did I speak of British art as of an unborn contingency? Ages rolled away before a real painter stepped on British ground; and long after England became a resort of foreign artists, and a shrine for their choicest relics, when poets and sages had consecrated our language to immortality, the silent universal language of lines and colours was graced with no English composition above the grade of a plain prose epitaph or obituary notice! For to what else can a mere portrait or deathlike bust be compared? But art, though late, has come to us at last, and like a Lapland summer, fairer and more perfect for its long delay.

Why were we not earlier blest with native artists? Many reasons have been assigned, but none completely satisfactory. Winkelman wrote an essay, which Barry thought worthy of serious confutation, to shew, that unless England could be towed some degrees farther south, her sons must toil after the classic style in vain. But Winkelman, I believe, was never in England, perhaps never saw an English woman—or, more probably, saw no beauty in the works of nature, and only one kind of beauty in works of design. Besides, he died in 1768. Yet, if he were acquainted with English literature and English mechanism, he ought to have known, that we possessed, in no stinted measure, the two grand requisites of art—poetical conception, and manual dexterity. The fault, therefore, is not in our climate, bad as it is for asthmatical and consumptive subjects, not in our stars, or in our physical constitution, or craniological conformation—for all these are much in statu quo;—yet England is pre-eminently the country of living Art. Wars and factions are very wicked things, but it is doubtful whether they do not rather foster than repress the growth of intellect. Invention is a tree that droops in the sunshine, and expands its proud blossoms to the storm. What have been the times, and what the regions, which science, art, imagination, have most renowned? The eras of revolution, the habitations of discord—Athens, Syracuse, Republican and Papal Rome, Florence, Venice, Northern Germany, England—names habitually associated with sedition, persecution, tumults, battles, and sieges. And what periods in the world's history have produced more intellectual excellence, more ornamental skill, than those of the Peloponnesian war, of the Roman Triumvirates, when the minds which adorned the Augustan age, were formed and instructed—of the Guelph and Ghibelline contests—of the Reformation, the Puritan rebellion, and the French revolution?

But it may be argued—the fine arts of painting and sculpture are less independent than their sisters. They require an expensive material, and much leisure, and ample space, to develop their beauties. The minstrel could convey his harp, the modern bard his inkhorn, from town to town—over hill and dale—could exercise their faculties beneath the green forest, in the camp or the prison, wherever the vocal air or the silence of thought can enter—needing no patronage but what suffices to preserve them from starving.

Not so the poet of the pencil or the chisel. This is an undertaking that requires capital. His employers can only be the opulent, and they are little disposed to purchase pictures or statues, which an invader may carry away to grace his triumph, a bullet pierce, or a bomb-shell crush to atoms—a drunken mob deface, or a fanatic multitude burn, with the mass of abominable things. Nor are men's minds, in troubled times, much given to produce quiet grace, or silent expression, by slow and patient touches. David himself had little leisure for painting, while he sat upon Robespierre's committee. There is some plausibility in this. But it will not account for the dearth of art in England. It is sufficient to observe, that there was room, leisure, and magnificence, to erect some of the grandest works of architecture, the slowest, bulkiest, and most expensive, of all art's operations—the least capable of escape, and the most exposed to hostile aggression. For never since the Temple was levelled on Mount Moriah, has the patient toil and beautiful genius of mankind upreared a house of prayer, so reverend, so fitted to a sacred purpose, so fair with the beauty of holiness, as those aged cathedrals, those abbeys and minsters, which solemnize our ancient cities, or lift their grey heads amid the stillness of deep, umbrageous, winding vales, by lulling streams, or dark embowered with "old contemporary trees," from whence, in elder times, the sacred bell and the slow midnight psalm fell sweetly on the ear of wood-bewildered pilgrim—fabrics, so admirable in their perfection, that we could scarce deem charitably of their destroyers, were they less holy in their hallowed ruins. Yet, even were they deprived of the sublimity of age and association, and considered merely as efforts of architectural skill, they would still be the glory of our isle. To execute so great a variety of minute and curious parts, requires a masterly hand, and a pregnant fancy—to combine them in one massy and stupendous whole, was the achievement of a mighty imagination. In the multitude and delicate elaboration of the Gothic ornaments, we are reminded of the fragile pencilling of frost, or the vegetation of mosses—yet the total effect is immensity, and eternity. We scarce believe them feats of mechanic agency, or think a time has been, when yet they were not. We are always pleased with discovering analogies between the sister arts, but the only thing to which we can assimilate, or parallel, the British sacred architecture, is the music of Handel. The Grecian orders, like pictures, are to be seen and comprehended at once—the whole and the parts are viewed together, and their coinherence is judged by the eye. But our cathedrals, from their screens, side-aisles, transepts, and subsidiary chapels, can never be seen altogether; there is always, as when you are listening to a solemn, rich, and varied harmony, employment at once for memory and anticipation. The whole is not objected to the senses, but must be constructed by the imagination—always implied—but never present.

Now, the music of Handel, though multitudinous as the ocean, possesses as complete an unity as the simplest air—with the high excellence, that each part is prophetic, as it were, of the parts that are successively to be unfolded. But I'm afraid I don't make myself quite understood. Revenons à nos moutons.

Surely the wealth, zeal, and genius that erected those sacred fanes, might have adorned them with semblances of natural or ideal beauty, at less expense than went to fill them with gilded monsters and gorgeous deformity. There was plenty of occupation, and probably sufficient pay, for carvers and limners, when our churches were populous with idols, gleaming with saints, burning with martyrs, grinning with devils, and staring with miracles. The shafted windows, so curiously elegant with wirelike tracery, shed "dim religious light" through prophets and apostles, radiant with gold and purple, sapphire and emerald—heraldic griffins and monsters stained the lettered pavement with transmitted lustre—the clustering pillars were hung with festival array of legends woven in tapestry, and not a font nor altar, stall or pulpit, screen or "buttress, or coigne of vantage," that was not as industriously flourished over as an Oriental manuscript. Grotesque and graceless as all this "antique imagerie" would probably appear in Protestant daylight, it doubtless was fearfully impressive in Catholic eyes, when seen by the faint flickering of yellow tapers, which, struggling with the discoloured gleam of painted glass, produce by their very number an aggravating indistinctness. The colouring was brilliant and expensive, and profusely bestowed on the statues, busts, and reliefs, after the Grecian fashion. If we may judge from the few remnants of church-limnery that have escaped the fanatics and the modernizers, there was no lack of manual cleverness of inventive ingenuity about the idol-makers. They wanted not hands or wits to have done better. And if, as is most probable, they were monks and ecclesiastics, they must many of them have visited Italy, and seen the antiquities. But they seem not to have aimed at grace or beauty. Scientific composition of course was out of the question. All they attempted, they did well, and that was to dazzle the eye, and tell their story. Single figures are sometimes powerfully designed; the features, though harsh, expressive, and the attitudes, though any thing but elegant, and not always possible, are not without a purpose; they do help to tell a tale. All is hard, awkward, quaint, exaggerated—but nothing unmeaning. Their ends were wonder and faith—and doubtless they worked well. In style, merit, and purport, the religious paintings of the dark ages closely resembled the wood prints to be found in popular Dutch, German, and English books of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries—such as Quarles' Emblems, the Book of Martyrs, the Nuremberg Chronicle, Reynard the Fox, and others, which have perhaps given more pleasure, certainly have pleased a greater number, than the finest productions of Italian genius.

Antiquarians may lament the destruction of carved virgins, and legends gay with gold and purple; but the loss is not to art, but to history. Whatever cleverness may have been in the contrivance or execution of these things—and there was no little—they involved not the idea of legitimate art, and therefore contained no germ of improvement. Had the skill that wrought them been cultivated to the exactest nicety, it could never have excelled the indefatigable idleness of a Chinese toy-maker. Still they prove that it was not for want of pay or patronage, that England was not as early a land of painters as of poets.

Most nations exhibit the rudiments of design—all appear to be delighted with gaudy colours. Savages, of every tribe and climate, paint their huts, their canoes, their weapons, or their skins. Such as are a little raised above animal life discover the instinct of imitation—are amused with casual resemblances of dissimilar objects, and set about producing them. If a stump of wood, or fragment of shattered rock, present a hideous similitude to human forms or features, the likeness is helped out with a few finishing touches, and, lo, it is a God. Children have almost invariably a turn for drawing and colouring, as the fly-leaves of their copies, the white-washed walls of the nursery, and many a poor print defaced with lake, gamboge, and ochre, abundantly testify. But notwithstanding the universality of these graphic impulses, it is to the especial endowments of a few—it may be, of a single soul—that all the genuine art on earth is owing. To a few—a very few—has the good seed been intrusted. When once that seed is sown, it has seldom perished for want of fostering hands, or withered in the blasts of stormy politics. It sends its roots far away under the earth; and grows up, in many a goodly grove, with flowers of diverse hue, and fruits of various savour.

In a word, I conceive the reason why we had not a school of art before the days of Hogarth and Reynolds, to be, that it had not pleased Heaven to send us any one great master. Our want of ancient models prevented talent from developing itself; but it will not account for the absence of genius; and where that is not, to erect academies, and propose prizes, is as vain as to water a garden, wherein nothing is planted, or to set up burning-glasses and reflectors, where the sun hath never shone. True—the painter has a mechanical craft to learn, and is dependent on mechanic, scientific, and chemical inventions, for the full display of his powers; but these appliances and means were as cheap—these menial faculties as easy to be hired—in England as elsewhere. But our day was not come. Let us be thankful that it has come at last.

In the age of Dryden, a list of native artists had been but an inventory of poverty, like the schedule of an insolvent—a catalogue of the illustrious obscure. Now we have already three volumes of the "Lives of British Painters, Sculptors, and Architects," from the pen of Allan Cunningham, and hope to have more.

It was once my intention to have launched a criticism on this delightful little book, under the colours of Christopher North. Little imports it to the world to know what contrary winds, what blockade or embargo has so long detained my reviewatory bark from sailing. But, alas! sero nunquam is not the motto of my muse. The very morning that I put the finishing touch to my long-promised prologue to my friend —'s Farce, I received intelligence that the farce was damned. The consolatory exhortation, which I culled with such care from the fathers and philosophers, and addressed to the young and wealthy widow, was all but finished, when she married her second husband. Now a review is not one of those compositions, which Horace counsels to be kept nine years. It is very well upon a work, which either ought, or ought not, to be read; but very absurd on one which nobody will read, or every body has read. In the latter case, if it be good for any thing, it ceases to be a review, and becomes a commentary, as the best possible dinner, if deferred to the eleventh hour, could only be a good supper. As a commentator, then, I proceed to communicate such reflections as Mr Cunningham's work has suggested to me; to which I am the rather encouraged, inasmuch as he appears from choice and judgment, as I from ignorance and necessity, rather to appreciate the intellectual than the technical, the poetic power than the executive mastery of art. He considers form and colour rather as exponents of thought, than as capable of distinct and final excellence, and treats his subject less like an artist than a philosopher. It is, indeed, to be regretted, that he so seldom ventures upon the critic's ground; and is for the most part contented to be the biographer of artists, when he appears so fully qualified to be the historian of art—But, dearest Kit, let the First Part of the Article of Ignoramus conclude here—and the Second illumine the March Number.

THE STORY OF AZIMANTIUM.

We are weary of the present—Let us turn and rest our minds for a while upon a tale of the past.

THERE was a dreamy stillness in the air—there was a golden glory over the sky—there was a music in the far-off hum of distant nature sinking to repose—there was a fragrance in the soft breath of the valley, as it stole timidly through the multitude of drowsy flowers, as if afraid to wake them from their evening sleep; all told of one of those few days which last in loveliness from their dawning to their close—so full of every fine essence of joy, that we tremble to see them pass, lest we should never find any thing so beautiful upon earth again. The whispering murmur of the small long waves, as they woo'd the quiet sands upon the sea-shore—the pale and timid lustre of the stars, as they shone out, one by one, through the still purple heaven—the slow changes of a rosy cloud, as it dallied with an unseen wind—spoke peace!—Peace, the first, last, great blessing—the mightiest of promises—the object of virtue, of wisdom, of knowledge—the only desire that experience leaves—the hope beyond our life—the glory of eternity—Peace!

High-eried on the rocky eminence, where now the overthrown stones of a massy wall tell of cities and their dwellers, passed like shadows down the dim vista of the gone, stood the fair town of Azimantium, with its long-disused battlements, its temples, and its columns, marked in fine lines of shadowy purple, high upon the broad expanse of the rich evening sky. The mountain on which it stood, clothed in the splendid robe of the setting day's calm violet-colour, hung over the valleys and the plains around, with an air of protecting majesty. On one side a gentle slope, covered with green pastures, and clumps of high trees, with ever and anon a temple or a villa in their shade, declined softly towards the fair land of Greece—the country of poetry and song—to which Azimantium had long belonged. Two other sides, that towards the Euxine,* and that which looked over Thrace, were rough and steep, broken with gigantic crags; and though many a piece of smooth short turf intervened between the masses of cold grey stone—though many a tree waved its leafy arms, as if in sport; above each rugged cliff, and many a green parasite trailed its fantastic garlanding of verdure over the harsh and stony limbs of the mountain—no footing was there for things of mortal mould. The goat, the sure-footed goat, looked down, with sidelong glance, from the flat summit above, but tempted not the descent; the fox earthed himself at the foot; and but the eagle, of all living things, in his kingly loneliness, chose it for his dwelling, from its very solitude. The fourth side turned towards the barbarian eunuchs of the Grecian name, and frowned defiance in one savage, dark, unbroken precipice.

But now all was peace around. Splendour, and feasting, and music, reigned through the Grecian empire. The brow of every man was calm and joyful, the voice of every one was rich in poetry and song; and it would have seemed that nothing but a smile had ever curled the lip, or danced in the eye. Oh fatal softness! Oh hard lot of man! that peace can never rest without power! that enjoyment can never continue without strength! that the shield, and the glave, and the javelin, should be the only safeguards of tranquillity!

All was peace. Many a century of decaying years had swept over the proud fabric of the Roman Empire, and what had been mighty, was now hastening towards a name. The men who had conquered a world, mouldered in the dust; and their children were contented to enjoy. The arms which should have wielded the sword, or braced on the shield, now only raised the cup, or struck the lyre. Voices which, in former days, would have breathed the soul of freedom to the swelling hearts of a mighty people, or pleaded for the laws before that senate which should have been immortal, now sung the loose and ribald song, in the halls of luxury and the resorts of intemperance, or urged some vain and subtle theme, in schools that had become schools of folly. Honour was no longer to the brave, or to the good; and, though peace spread over the whole eastern realm, it was peace bought by tributary gold, won by degradation, and spent in effeminacy, indulgence, and vice.

One small city alone of the whole empire, still held within its walls the nobler spirit of Rome's ancient days. One small city alone, like an altar to some sublime but nearly forgotten deity, upheld the flame of virtuous courage—simple, grand, noble, independent—enjoyed the smile of peace, but feared not the frown of war; reposed without softness, and rejoiced without debauchery. That city was Azimantium. Its youth, trained to the nobler amusements, only descended from the free mountain-air of their sky-surrounded dwelling, to war with the wild beasts of the forests around, or to chase the swift deer over the Thracian plains. Such were their sports of peace; and if a lingering influence of the genius-breathing climate taught the Pentellican marble to start into life, woke the Achaian flute, or struck the Teian lyre, the godlike spirit of a purer age gave fire to the song, and vigour to the statue. The mighty and majestic scenes amidst which they bent, raised and dignified the hearts of Azimantium; and though the passions of humanity were there in all their force, the better soul, the nobler purpose of the mind, linked those passions to all that is grand and dignified in nature. The aspirations of the spirit, and the desires of the body, were not waging the horrid struggle mutually to destroy each other; but, joined together in thrilling fellowship, like the immortal twins of Lacedæmon, they strove alone to guide, and elevate each other. Love dwelt in Azimantium; but it was that brighter love, wherein the radiant share of the deathless soul invests the earthly portion with a blaze of light.

I have said that it was the evening of a summer's day—a day such as is hardly known to more northern climates—a day on which the kingly charioteer of heaven seems to hold some high festival, and robe himself in more majestic lustre. The sunshine had passed, and it was evening—but an evening full of rays. It seemed as if some mysterious power had robbed the daylight of half its beams, to weave them into purple with the dark-blue woof of night, and then had studded it over with golden stars; to curtain the cradle of the sleeping earth.

Through the still calm valleys at the foot of the mountain of Azimantium—by the side of the living stream that sparkled onward on its brief gay course—amidst tall and scattered trees, where the nightingale raised his glorious anthem to the first star—wandered two of the children of that city, who had seen no other dwelling, and never desired to do so. They had risen from infancy in scenes which had every day grown dearer; and as years had flown, mutual love, uncrossed, unopposed, untainted, had given those scenes a light, whose spring was in their own hearts, a charm wrought by that potent magician, Affection. They loved as fully as mortal things can love; and from all external nature, from every song, from every sight, a sweet communion of thrilling enjoyments gathered itself round their mutual hearts. The memory of all their past was together; the joy of the present was tasted together; the future—misty and vague as that dim profound must ever be—they never dreamed could be otherwise than together. One month had yet to fly ere the dearest, because the most durable, tie was to bind Honoria to Menenius for ever; and now they wandered alone through those sweet valleys, and amidst those soft scenes, unwatched, undoubted, by those whose duty was to guard and to protect, because there was not one heart within the bounds of the city, who dared to think that Honoria was unsafe with Menenius.

They talked of love and hope; and those bright visions that, in the summer-morning of our youth, dance before our dazzled and untaught eyes, came thick upon them: and they lent each other willing aid to raise fabric after fabric, out of thin air alone, till the unsubstantial architecture reached to the very sky. Oh how they dreamt! and though a sultry and unheaving air grew up, one knew not whence, casting a sort of doubtful faintness on Honoria's frame; and though vague rumours of dangers to the state, and new demands from the pensioned enemies of the Eastern Empire, had reached the ears of Menenius, an atmosphere of their own hope surrounded them, in which joy seemed to breathe secure.

They had wandered long, pouring their souls into each other's bosom, till at length they turned to mount the gentle ascent that led them to their home. And yet they lingered, and yet they paused to take another look over the twilight-world which spread out beneath, wider and wider at every step as they ascended; and to say, "How fair!" and still to speak one kind word more. As thus they paused beneath a group of tall trees, near which an ancient tower marked the burial-place of the great of other days, and stretched their eyes over the darkening landscape, a sudden feeling of terror shot through Honoria's breast—she knew not why. She heard nothing, she felt nothing, she saw nothing, which could awaken fear; and yet with a sudden and instinctive impulse, she clung to Menenius, exclaiming, "What is coming?" The horses that were feeding on the slope, with a shrill cry broke in madness down the hill; an eagle started from the rock below, and screaming, soared into the sky; while the lover cast his strong arm round her he loved, and unconsciously laid his hand upon his sword. All felt the dreadful coming of some great change. It came—with a roar like the accumulated thunder of a thousand storms! The lightning, burning from no visible cloud, swept over the clear blue sky, and shone amongst the stars; and in the livid glare, the towers of Azimantium, with their fine dark and clear on the bright air, were seen to quiver, and reel, and fall; while beneath the feet, the earth heaved and trembled, and the globe were rent with winged agonies. The air was one wild scream—the sky, from pole to pole, was all on fire—the ground refused its footing. Then came a moment of dead calm. All was silent! all was still! and Menenius felt Honoria's arms relax the terrified clasp in which they held him. "It is over, beloved," whispered he, as if afraid to break the restored tranquillity even by his voice: "It is over; thank God, the earthquake has passed by!"

But before the words were well pronounced, a fitful gleam, a broader flash, another roar, swept through the air; the ground yawned and quivered; the tottering tower beside them was hurled in crashing ruins over the brink. Menenius caught at a tree for support; but it, too, shaking like a willow bough in a storm, swayed to and fro, and staggered as if plucked up by some gigantic force. Its boughs crashed; its centuried roots gave way, and rushing on those who had sought support in its strength, it overwhelmed them in its descent. What was the lover's only thought as he fell? To save her he loved; and by a sudden, scarcely conscious, effort of all his natural vigour, he kept her off, while the uprooted tree was dashed upon himself.

The earthquake had passed by, and become a thing of memory. Nineteen of the towers of Constantinople had fallen; the walls of Azimantium lay broken and destroyed; and on the day which was to have lighted the marriage torch for Honoria and Menenius, the lover lay, slowly recovering from the evening of the earthquake, and the beautiful girl watched him with glad, yet anxious eyes. The father of Menenius, too, stood beside him, and marked the reviving glow in his son's cheek with joy, although there was a deep and thoughtful shadow on his brow, which brightened into something of triumph and of hope, as his eye ran over the bold and swelling muscles of his frame, and thought that but a few days more would restore that frame to all its pristine vigour. The triumph and the hope were those of a true son of ancient Greece, for they were kindled and inspired by the proud thought that the energetic strength of mind and body which were no longer united in himself, would, in his son, prove the safeguard of his country. He had news to tell which might well have quelled the feeble spirits of that degenerate age, but Menenius was a child of Azimantium, and knew not fear, even though crushed, and sick, and wounded. He had borne the cautions of the leech, and the restraint of a sick-chamber, with somewhat of impatience and disdain; but when his father told him that the false Bishop of Margus had opened the gates of that city to the barbarian Attila, the destroyer of arts, the waster of empires, the scourge of God; that unnumbered myriads of the Huns were pouring over the frontier barriers of the Eastern Empire; that Sirnium and Sardica, Ratiaria and Naissus, had fallen, and that but a few days more would see the blood-gorged savages beneath the rocks of Azimantium, Menenius became docile as a lamb to all that might hasten his recovery. Honoria's cheek grew pale, and her lip forgot its smile, but not a word of fear was breathed upon the air, and her dark dark eye shot out rays of more intense and brilliant light, as she gazed on each piece of her lover's armour, and scanned them jealously for fault or flaw.

There was a cry through the whole of Greece, "They come! They come!" Over the fields, through the valleys, on the mountains; from voice to voice, and castle to castle, and city to city, the cry went forth, "Death to the nations! They come! They come! Vultures, prepare to feast! They come! They come!"

All fell down before them or fled, and those who timidly spoke but the name of war, died by their own hearths. Fortress after fortress, town after town, was attacked and taken, and plundered and destroyed; not one stone was left upon another, and captivity and the sword shared the children of the land between them; and still went on the cry, "They come! They come! Vultures, prepare! They come! They come!"

The weak luxurious Romans of that degenerate day, knew not the very arms with which to oppose their barbarous enemies. What did the song avail them? What the dance? What the wine-cup and the feast? Could the soft-tongued sophist cheat the dark Hun from his destined prey? Or the skillful lawyer show Attila the code which forbade the strong to plunder and subject the weak? No, no! After three disgraceful scenes of defeat, all fled, or yielded, or died, or were made slaves, and the whole land was red with flaming cities, and with blood-stained fields.

At length, the watchers on the steep of Azimantium beheld a dim cloud sweeping over the distant prospect, so vast, so mighty, that the whole land seemed teeming with a fearful birth. "They come! They come!" was all the cry; "They come! They come! The Myriads of the north! Warriors, prepare your swords! They come! They come!"

On they swept, like the wind of the desert. The ruined walls of Azimantium, rifted by the earthquake, offered nothing to oppose their progress. Three sides, indeed, were defended by Nature herself, but the fourth was free, and up the soft slope they rushed, tribe upon tribe, nation upon nation, flushed with conquest, hardened to massacre, eager for spoil, contemptuous of danger and death.

Across the narrowest part of the approach—where the steep natural rock on one side, and the chasm left by the overthrown tower on the other, impeded all passage but by the smooth ascent—in long bright line, with casque, and buckler, and blade, stood the youth of Azimantium, between their dear familiar homes and the dark enemy. On rushed the Huns, with glad eyes gleaming in the fierce thirst for blood. The horsemen came first, their harness loaded with the golden ornaments of plundered cities, and hanging at each knee the bleeding head of a fresh slain Greek, while myriads of foot swarmed up behind them, so that, to the eyes above, the whole steep appeared alive with a dark mass of rushing enemies. An ocean of grim faces was raised to the devoted city, and glared upon the young band of Azimantines, as the first-prepared sacrifice to the god of victory.

Nearer and more near they came. Forth flew the Scythian javelins, and, repelled from a thousand shields, turned innocent away, and then, the gazers from the house-tops of Azimantium might see the closer fight engaged. The unbroken line of gallant champions still maintained the strife against the swelling multitude that rushed like a tremendous sea upon them. Barbarian after barbarian fell stricken from his horse, and still they saw the battle rage, and swarms of fresh enemies pour up to the assault. Still waved the swords, still advanced the spears, and still the bands of Azimantium held their narrow pass, while behind them stood the old men of the town, to encourage them by the presence of their fathers—to carry them fresh arms—to bear away the dead.

But oh what a sight it was, when first the gazers beheld four of the parents separate from the rest of the wavering crowd, and, bearing a heavy burden, come back towards the city! Oh, with what terrified speed did mothers, and sisters, and wives, and the beloved, rush forth to meet the ghastly spectacle, and learn the dreadful truth! And oh, how they crowded round, when the old men laid down their load, and the cloak cast back, shewed the fair boy stricken in his spring of beauty, the red blood clotted in his golden hair, the energy of being passed from his young eyes, and the "pale flag of death advanced" where the joy of life had reigned.

His sister wrung her hands and tore her hair, and wept, but his mother gazed calmly, proudly, painfully, upon the clay. Then bending down to take one kiss of his cold cheek, "Weep not," she cried, "weep not, Eudocia, for your brother! He, the first, died for his country! My child is in heaven!"

"They come! They come!" was shouted from below: "Fly to the altars! Lo, they come! they come!" and breaking through the line of brave defenders, on rushed a body of the Huns. On, up the steep they urged their horses, reeking with blood and battle—on, on, towards the city. The women fled to the churches and to the shrines, but there was none to defend the town; the streets were vacant; the youths and the old men and alike gone forth to the battle—the Huns were at the gate, and all was lost.

It was then that Menenius, red from the brow to the heel with the blood of his enemies, shouted to his brave companions to follow him, and, leading a gigantic Scythian down the steep, with one bound he passed the church, and lighted on a point of rock where the foot of man had never stood before—another brought him to a higher crag, whence a small green ridge ran round the steepest of the precipice under the city walls. One after another his bravest comrades followed. Some missed their footing and were dashed to atoms on the rocks below; but still another and another succeeded, for Azimantium knew not fear. The Huns were on their threshold, and who dared hesitate? A hundred of the most agile passed the depth, pursued the green path, cleared another and another spring, reached the city wall, climbed over its ruined stones, and in the narrow entrance street met the victorious Huns, who had paused to plunder the first shrine they found.

No words were spoken: nor javelins nor arrows were now used; brow to brow, and sword to sword, the struggle was renewed. But who can conquer men who combat for their hearths? The Huns fell, died, or were driven back, for that narrow way had no outlet but by the gate through which they had entered, and the close street where fought the youth of Azimantium. Not a Grecian glaive fell in vain, and at every step Menenius trod upon a slain barbarian. Like a reaper, each sweep of his unceasing arm made a hollow vacancy in the rank before him, and death grew so fearfully busy amongst the Huns, that vague imaginings of some supernatural power being armed to their encounter, took possession of their bosoms. The form of the young hero swelled to the eyes of their fancy. "It is a god!" they cried, "it is a god!" They shrank from his blows—they turned—they fled. Those who were behind knew not the cause of terror, but caught it as it came. Each saw his fellow flying, and, touched by the same disconcerting influence, sought but to fly. "A god! a god!" they cried, and rushed forth tumultuously on those who followed towards the city.

The broken line of Azimantium through which they had forced their way, now divided into two by the barbarian multitude, still waged terrific warfare on either side, while Menenius, pressing on with his companions, drove the ferocious Huns from the gate. The contagious terror of the fugitives spread to those without, and all were hurrying down the descent, when one chief rushed through the struggling crowd. "A god!" cried he. "This hand shall try his immortality!" and on he urged his steed against Menenius. For an instant the Greeks paused in their pursuit, and the barbarians rallied from their flight, and all eyes turned upon the Hun and his opponent. The fate of Azimantium—the last relic of Grecian and of Roman glory—hung upon that brief moment. An instant decided all, for before fear could become hope in the hearts of the Huns, the charger of the barbarian chief was wild upon the plain, and he himself, cleft to the jaws, lay motionless before Menenius. A thousand souls seemed in the hero's bosom, and, plunging in the midst of the enemies, he drove them down the steep. All Azimantium followed, and their footsteps were upon the necks of the dying. The rout was complete, and terror and dismay hung upon the flank of the defeated Huns; but still Menenius urged the furious pursuit. On, on he cleft his way. He marked not, he saw not who was near, he heeded not, he felt not what opposed him. His eye was fixed upon a white and fluttering object which was borne along amidst the brown masses of the flying barbarians, and towards it he rent his way, while his unwearied arm smote down all things that impeded his progress, as if but to make a path to that.

As long as the rout and the pursuit were confined by the narrow sides of the ascent to Azimantium, he kept that one spot in view; but afterwards, when the path of the flyers opened out upon the plains, the horse which bore it, carried it away from his straining eyes, while the grey falling of the evening gave every distant thing a vague shadowy uncertain form, like the objects of the past seen through the twilight memory of many years—he followed it to the last—night fell, and it was lost.

With triumph and with song the children of Azimantium wound up towards the city. Joy! joy! joy! was in their hearts, and victory upon their brows. They had overcome the myriads, they had conquered the invincible! they had rolled back the barbarian torrent from the gates of their glad city, and every step that they took among the unburied dead of the enemy told they had won for themselves both victory and peace. With a quick step, but with a cast-down eye and a knitted brow, Menenius, the hero of the triumph, followed the path up the hill. Every voice was glad, every heart seemed joyful, but his; but there was a fear, a dread, a conviction in his bosom, that his was the home that had been plundered of its treasure, his was the hearth to be for ever desolate. He strode on to the town, and joy and glory hailed him; and gratitude and admiration proclaimed his name to the skies. They called him the deliverer of his country, the saviour of his native place—they saluted him as victor—they acknowledged him as chief.

"Honoria?" he asked, "Honoria?" but no one answered. Honoria was gone. Since the entrance of the Huns into the city, Honoria had not been seen: and casting himself down upon a couch, he hid his eyes in his cloak, while gladness and rejoicing filled the midnight air, and all Azimantium was one high festival.

'Twas strange, 'twas wonderfully strange! that one small city of the greatest empire in the world—while an inundation of barbarians poured over the land—while fortress and town were cast down and levelled with the earth—while legions fled dismayed, and nations bowed the head—and while the very suburbs of Constantinople, the imperial city, beheld the fearful faces of the Huns,—'twas strange, 'twas wonderfully strange, that one small city should stand in its solitary freedom, bold, fearless, and unconquered. 'Twas strange, 'twas wonderfully strange! Yet the deeds of the children of Azimantium are recorded in an immortal page, wherein we read, that "they attacked, in frequent and successful sallies, the troops of the Huns, who gradually declined their dangerous neighbourhood; they rescued from their hands the spoil and the captives, and recruited their domestic force by the voluntary association of fugitives and deserters."*

In every sally, in every irruption made by the Azimantines into the vast tract of country now covered with the Huns, Menenius was the leader; and in the fierce incessant warfare thus carried on, he seemed to find his only consolation, his only enjoyment. At other times, he would sit sad and gloomy, his vacant eye fixed unobserving upon space, and his heart meditating sad dreams. In the visions of the night, too, when weariness dimmed the fire in his heart, and suffered his eyes to close, the white and fluttering object he had pursued in the fight of Azimantium would again be carried off, while imagination would fill up all that sight had not been able to ascertain, and the form of Honoria, torn away from him by the barbarian, would hold forth its phantom arms, and implore aid and succour in vain. Then his vigorous and manly limbs would writhe with the agony of his dreaming soul, till horror and despair would burst the bands of sleep, and he would start again upon his feet to wreak his great revenge upon the enemy. And yet there was a quality in his soul which—although while an adverse sword was drawn, or a threatening bow was bent, his step was through blood and carnage, his path was terror and death,—yet there was a quality in his soul which suspended the uplifted blow when the suppliant and the conquered clasped his knee; and many was the train of captives which he sent home to the city; the pledges of future security and respect to Azimantium.

At length when seventy cities had fallen before the Scythian hordes, and nought but ruins were left to say where they had been, and to point to after ages the sad moral of an empire's decay, the weak Theodosius, unable to protect his subjects, or defend himself, agreed to treat with the mighty Barbarian, and to buy precarious peace with gold and concession, when he dared not purchase true security by the sword. Attila dictated the conditions, and Theodosius yielded to all his demands, but one, with which the emperor had no power to comply; and that was, that the city of Azimantium should restore the captives taken from the Huns. Attila felt how little power a feeble and degenerate monarch could have over a fearless, noble, unconquerable race; and he felt, too, that all his own power, great and battle-born as it was, could scarcely suffice to crush the hearts of Azimantium. The monarch of all the Eastern empire confessed his inability to compel the restoration of the captives; and Attila, the terror of the world, the scourge of God, the conqueror of nations, treated on equal terms with the small city of Thrace.

Oh how the heart of Menenius beat, when the monarch of the Huns, by the mouth of his envoys, proposed that all prisoners taken between his myriads and the city of Azimantium should be mutually restored! And oh how his bosom heaved, when, surrounded by the Hunnish cavalry, the little knot of Azimantine captives were conducted up the hill! But where was Honoria? where was the beloved?

The Huns declared they had delivered all, and Honoria was not there—Honoria, without whom all was nothing. Ten of the principal barbarian chiefs were detained as hostages for the safety of her who had not returned; while the envoys of Attila were sent back to learn the savage monarch's will. The reply soon came, that if any of the chiefs of Azimantium dared to trust himself in the dominions of Attila, he should have free means and aid in making every search for the captive said to be detained. Maximin and Priscus, the messengers added, were then on their journey as ambassadors from the imperial court to the king of the Huns, and if the Azimantine chief would join them at Sardica, he would be conducted to the presence of Attila, who loved the brave, even when his enemies.

Menenius sprang upon his horse, and, followed by a scanty train, took the way to Sardica, his heart torn with the eternal struggle of those two indefatigable athletes, Hope and Fear. Still, as he went, his eye roamed over the landscape—for even the absorbing sorrow of his own breast had not obliterated his love for his country—and how painful was the sight upon which the eye rested! Desolation—the vacant cottage, the extinguished hearth, the threshold stained with blood, the raven and the vulture gorged and gorging, the mangled and unburied slain, the overthrown cities, the deserted streets through which the speedy grass was already growing up, where multitudes had trod—the grass—the verdant and the speedy grass, which, like the fresh joys of this idle world, soon covers over the place that we have held when once we are passed away—ruin, destruction, death—such was the aspect of the land. And as he gazed and saw, the thought of all the broken ties and torn fellowships, the sweet associations and dear thrilling sympathies dissolved, the wreck of every noble art, the scattering of every finer feeling, which the blasting, withering, consuming lightning of war had there accomplished, found an answering voice deep in the recesses of his own wrung and agonized heart. At the ruins of Naisus—for one stone of the city scarcely remained upon the other—he joined the legates of the emperor, and with them pursued his way. His mind was not attuned to much commune with his fellows; and though Priscus, with learned lore, tempted him to speak of science, and arts, and philosophy; and Maximin, with courtly urbanity, which softened and ornamented the sterner firmness of his character, and Vigilius, the interpreter, with subtle and persuasive art, strove to win the Asimantine chief to unbend from his deep gloom, Menenius could neither forget nor forgive, and sadness was at once in his heart, and upon his brow.

Over high mountains, through brown woods, across dark and turbulent rivers, the ambassadors were led on by that part of the barbarian army, which was destined to be both their protection and guide. They saw but few of the inhabitants of the country, and little cultivated ground. Drove of oxen and sheep seemed the riches of the land. Pasture appeared to be the employment of the people, and war their sport.

Their march was regulated by the Huns who accompanied them, and by them also was each day's journey limited. The spot for pitching their tents was exactly pointed out, and the hour for departure was not only named, but enforced. Each day, long before that hour came, Menenius was on foot, and he would wander forth in the morning sunshine, and gaze through the deep vacuities in the woods, or let his eyes rest upon the misty and uncertain mountains, while the vast wild wideness of the land would force upon his heart the madness of hoping that his search would prove successful. Thus had he gone forth one morning, when, in the glade of the forest where their tents were raised, he saw before him one of the barbarians whom he had never beheld before. The cold stern eye of Menenius rested on him for an instant, and then turned to the dim woods again. There was nothing pleasing in his form or in his countenance, and Menenius was passing on. He was short in stature, but broad as a giant, and with each muscular limb swelling with vigour and energy. His head was large and disproportioned, his face flat, his brow prominent, his colour swarthy. A few long and straggling hairs upon his chin, and deep lines of powerful thought, told that he had long reached manhood, while his white and shining teeth, and his bright keen speckless eye, spoke vigour undecayed by one year too many.

"Whither stray'st thou, stranger?" said the barbarian; "can a Greek enjoy the aspect of solitary nature; can the dweller in cities—the pitiful imitator of the meanest of insects, the ant—can he look with pleasure on the wilds that were given man for his best, and original home?"

"Thou art ignorant, Hun!" replied Menenius, "and with the pride of ignorance, despise that which thou dost not comprehend. Man, in raising cities and ornamenting them with art, only follows the dictates of nature herself. To the brutes she gave the wild world, but added no intellect to her gift, for the world, in its wildest state, was sufficient. To man she gave intellect, and the whole universe, full of materials, on which to employ it. He who is most elevated by nature herself, will use her gifts in the most diversified ways, and he who least uses them, approaches nearest to the brute.—Nay, barbarian, roll not thy furious eyes on me; I sought thee not, and he who speaks to me must hear the truth."

For several minutes, however, the Hun did roll his eyes with an expression of fury that strangely contrasted with his perfect silence. Not a word did he speak—not a quiver of the lip betrayed the suppression of any angry tone, and it was not till the fierce glance of his wrath was completely subdued, that he replied, "Vainson of a feeble race, upon whose necks Attila, my lord and thine, has trod, boast not the use of arts which have reduced thy people to what they are, and made them alike unfit for war and peace. Look at their bones whitening in the fields; look at their cities levelled with the plains; look at their manifold and wicked laws, which protect the strong and oppress the weak; look at their silken and luxurious habits, which effeminate their bodies and corrupt their minds. This is the product of the arts thou praisest. This is the degrading civilisation that thou huggest to thy heart."

"Not so, Hun," replied Menenius; "the corruption which thou hast seen with too sure an eye, springs not from art, or knowledge, or civilisation. It springs from the abuse of wealth and power. The Roman empire was as a man who, covered with impenetrable armour, had conquered all his enemies, and finding none other to struggle with, had cast away his shield and breastplate, and lay down on a sunny bank to sleep. In his slumber, new adversaries came upon him, his armour was gone, and he was overthrown. The armour of the empire was courage, decision, and patriotism, the slumber was luxury, and thus it was that the myriads of thy Lord penetrated to Constantinople, and destroyed the cities. The arts thou deapest, because thou knowest them not, had no share in bringing on the slumber which has proved so destructive; but let the Huns beware, for the giant may awake."

"Ha!" cried the barbarian, with a triumphant smile, "what is the city that could stand an hour, if Attila bade it fall?"

"Azimantium!" replied Menenius.

The Hun threw back his broad shoulders, and glared upon the Thracian chief, with a glance more of surprise than anger—then gazed at him from head to foot, visited each particular feature with his eye, and marked every vigorous and well-turned limb with a look of scrutinizing enquiry. "Thou art Menenius!" he exclaimed abruptly, after he had satisfied himself, "Thou art Menenius! 'Tis well! 'Tis well!—I deemed thou hadst been Maximin."

"And had I been so," asked Menenius, "would that have made a difference in thy language?"

"Son of a free and noble race," replied the Hun, "ask me no farther. That which may well become thee to speak, would ill befit the suppliant messenger of a conquered king; and that which I would say to the vanquished and the crouching, could not be applied to the brave and the independent. Happy had it been for thy country had she possessed many like to thee, for then she would have fallen with honour: and happy, too, had it been for Attila my Lord, for then his triumph would have been more glorious."

Menenius was silent. The tone of the Hun was changed. The rudeness of his manner was gone; and though he spoke with the dignity of one whose nation was rich in conquests, there was no longer in his language the assumption of haughty superiority which he had at first displayed.

"And thou," said Menenius at last—"Who am I to fancy thee?"

"I am Onagesius, the servant of Attila the King," replied the Hun; "and mark me, chieftain of a brave people. Hold but little communion with the slaves of Theodosius as they pass through the dominions of the Huns. The lion may be stung by the viper, if he lie down where he be coiled. Now, farewell;" and thus speaking, the Hun turned, and with a proud firm step, each fall of which seem planted as for a combat, he took his path away from the Grecian tents.

* * * * *

The ambassadors pursued their way, and, after some days, encamped late at night upon the banks of the dark and rushing Tebisous.

The heavens were obscured by heavy leaden clouds driven by the wind into large masses, through the breaks of which, a dull and sickly moon glared forth with a fitful and a watery light upon the misty earth. The dim shapes of shadowy mountains, too, were vaguely sketched upon the sky, covered with quick passing shades, while ever and anon the winds howled forth their melancholy song, a wild and sombre anthem to the grim genius of the scene around.

The tents were pitched, the plain meal was over, the mead had passed round, and sleep had relaxed every weary muscle of the travellers' limbs, when suddenly a hurricane rushed over the whole scene, the river rose, the rain came down in torrents, and the temporary encampment was in a moment overthrown. Drenched and terrified, the legates of the Emperor disengaged themselves with difficulty from their falling pavilions, and called loudly for help. Noise and confusion spread around, and the roaring stream rising quickly over the meadow in which they had been sleeping, the howling of the overpowering wind, and the heavy pattering of the rain, added to the disturbance and fear of the scene.

A moment after, a blazing light upon the nearest hill rose like a beacon to direct their steps, and thither the ambassadors were led by the Huns.

Menenius, after he had provided for the safety of his horses and attendants, followed the rest. As he approached the light, he saw, by the figures of several Huns supplying a large fire of dry reeds with fresh fuel, that it had been raised on purpose to guide any travellers overtaken by the storm, to a place of shelter and repose. Attention and a welcome awaited him, and he was instantly led into a large wooden house, where Priscus and Maximin were already seated by a cheerful hearth, at which a young widow, the wife of Attila's dead brother Bleda, was busy in the gentle cares of hospitality. Along the extreme side of the apartment was drawn a line of Scythian slaves, armed as became those who waited on the widow of a king; and as Menenius entered, their rank was just closing, after having given exit to a form which made the Thracian chief start forward, as his eye caught the last flutter of her retiring robes. "Who passed?"—he exclaimed abruptly, forgetting, in the anxious haste of the moment, all idle ceremony. "Who passed but now?"—"Ella, the daughter of the King, and her maidens," was the reply. The heart of Menenius sunk, and his eye lost its eager fire. In a few brief words he excused his abruptness; but the widow of Bleda was one of those whose kind hearts find excuses better than we can urge them. "The maiden is fair," she said, "and well merits a stranger's glance. In truth, she knew not that there was another guest of such a mien about to be added to our hearth, or she would have staid to pour the canis and the mead. Much would she grieve were she not here to show that part of hospitality." And Bleda's widow sent a maiden to tell her niece that Menenius, the Azimantine chief, sat by the fire untended.

She came—a dark-haired girl, with a splendid brow, and eyes as pure and bright as if a thousand diamonds had been melted to furnish forth their deep and flashing light. A rose as glorious as that upon the brow of morning warmed her cheek, and a quick untaught grace moved in her full and easy limbs, like those of a wild deer. But she was not Honoria; and the eye of Menenius rested on her, as on a fair statue, which, in its cold difference of being, however lovely, however it may call upon admiration, wakens no sympathy within our warmer bosoms. She, however, gazed on him, as on something new and strange, and bright; and there was in her glance both the untutored fire of artless nature, and the fearless pride of kingly race, and early acquaintance with power. For a moment she stood and contemplated the Thracian chief, with her sandalled foot advanced, and her head thrown back, and her lustrous eye full of wild pleasure; but then suddenly a red flush rose in her cheek, and spread over her brow, and, with a trembling hand, she filled a cup of mead, touched it with her lips, gave it to Menenius, and again retired.

Menenius lay down to rest, but his dreams were not of her. Gay visions of the former time rose up and visited his brain. From out the dreary tomb of the past, long-perished moments of joy and hope were called, as by an angel's voice, to bless his slumber—Honor!—Asimantium—happiness.

Pass we over the onward journey. After a long and tedious march, the ambassadors arrived at the royal village of the Huus, which was then surrounded by uncultured woods, though at present the rich vineyards of Tokay spread round the land in which it stood. Houses of wood were the only structures which were boasted by the chief city of the monarch of one half the earth; and to the eye of the Greeks, every thing seemed poor and barbarous in the simplicity of the Hun. Yet, even lowly as were their cottage palaces, they had contrived to bestow much art on their construction. Fantastic trellis-work, and rich carved screens, and wreathed columns, cut of polished and variegated woods, were scattered in every direction; and while the first faint efforts of an approach to taste were to be found in the taller buildings and more correct proportions of the royal dwellings, the idea of war—the national sport and habitual passion of the people—was to be seen in the imitative towers and castles with which they had decorated their dwellings of peace.

Attila himself had not yet returned from his last excursion; but a day did not elapse before his coming was announced by warrior after warrior who arrived, their horses covered with gold, and their followers loaded with spoil. All his subjects went forth to gratulate their conquering monarch; and the Greeks, standing on a little eminence, beheld his approach. First came innumerable soldiers, in dark irregular masses, and then appeared, chieftain after chieftain, all the various nations that he ruled. Then was seen a long train of maidens, in white robes, walking in two lines, each bearing aloft in her hand one end of a fine white veil, which, stretching across to the other side, canopied a row of younger girls, who scattered flowers upon the path. Behind these, mounted on a strong black horse, clothed in one uniform dark robe, without jewel, or gold, or ornament whatever, came the monarch whose sway stretched over all the northern world. As he advanced, he paused a moment, while his attendants raised a small silver table, on which the wife of one of his favourite chiefs offered him refreshments on his return. He was still at some distance, but the Greeks could behold him bend courteously to the giver, and raise the cup to his lips. The table was then removed, and onward came the king—nearer—more near—till Menenius might distinguish the features of the dark Hun he had met in the forest.

It would now be very unprofitable to enquire whether the House of Commons ought to be reformed; the die is cast; Reform is resolved on by both the Ministry and the Country, therefore the question for beneficial discussion is—what change ought to be adopted? In devoting this paper to it, our object is less to propose a plan, than to throw light on the present system, and the changes advocated by certain of the reformers. Plans, we fear, abound far more than the knowledge which is essential for preventing them from being ruinous.

All parties have been long the avowed friends of Reform; even the Tories, who profess the most decided opposition to it, have still their own plan, to which they give its name; on their declarations, they, as well as the Radicals, are Reformers. These men, for many of whom we entertain the highest respect, have therefore small right to cast censure on us, because our "pet system" does not happen to correspond with theirs; if they do not err in principle, we do not; and if we differ from them in measure, they are as liable to err in it as ourselves. We are, as we stated several months ago, the friends of such reform as may be cautious, gradual, and practical; but this avowal only makes us such reformers in principle as they profess to be; and it forms no proof that our views are more pernicious than theirs.

The system of reform, which has been for some time as warmly supported by Tory as by Whig, always appeared to us excessively objectionable in respect of both justice and policy. We of course allude to the transferring of the franchise from boroughs, proved to be corrupt, to other places. There is scarcely a principle of reason and equity which it does not violate. The right of sending members to Parliament belongs to the place, but not to the individuals who exercise it for life; posterity, however, is robbed of its inheritance, solely on the guilt of the life-tenant. If a place ought to possess the franchise, to disfranchise it from the corruption of the electors, is to punish private guilt by the production of public wrong; if it ought not, the franchise should be taken from it without reference to the manner in which it is used. The system punishes the innocent for the misdeeds of the criminal. It is notorious that almost all open boroughs, large as well as small, are equally corrupt; therefore, according to it, almost all ought to be disfranchised: of course, if its application were co-extensive with the corruption it professes to punish, it would deprive various of the most important interests and places in the empire of representatives.

There are at this moment two cases—the Evesham one and that of Liverpool, before Parliament. In the former, only a very trifling proportion of the electors are represented to have been bribed; in the latter, nearly three-fourths are accused; while this is the case at present, the one place has at the least been quite as corrupt in past times as the other. Steps have been taken to disfranchise Evesham; and if this be done, Liverpool can only be spared through the most gross injustice on the part of the Legislature. Yet who will venture to say that a place like the latter ought to be deprived of representatives? Thus the Legislature must either trample on justice, or produce a great public evil.

Many of the close boroughs are regularly sold; that is, the owners at every election sell their votes for a sum of money,—as the corrupt burgesses of open boroughs do. Yet these, the system of reform in question does not attempt to touch, although the bribe of the borough-owner is not a whit more defensible than that of the burgess. Thus the same conduct is legalized in one man as innocence, and punished in another as guilt; moral law is made a matter of political expediency.

Most of the members for open boroughs, as well as those for close ones, are elected through bribery; it therefore follows, that the men who sit in judgment on a borough charged with corruption, are, with their guilty of precisely similar corruption. The country knows this—it knows that the shameless fellow who inveighs against the guilt of one place, has produced the same guilt in another; and that he represents burgesses who have been made as corrupt through him as those are whom he seeks to punish. The proceedings, therefore, in disfranchising a borough, only excite public scorn and disgust; and they are rather serviceable to the cause of general bribery, than the contrary. They fix no stigma, and promote no virtue; the great example and source are spared; and the principal effects are, the House of Commons is covered with public odium on the one hand, and corruption is taught how to make itself more secure and extensive on the other.

The system asserts that boroughs which are corrupt ought to be disfranchised, yet it makes not the smallest effort to detect them. In general, at elections the candidates and their committees are all equally guilty of bribery, and they give pledges to each other against bringing it under the notice of Parliament; it is in consequence scarcely possible for sufficient evidence of corruption to be voluntarily tendered against any place. Thus one solitary case is about all that flows from a general election. While it is matter of notorious fact that nearly all boroughs are as guilty as the few which are punished, it is matter of proof that the system punishes hardly any, and is wholly incapable of producing that reform which it declares to be necessary. It follows that the principal fruits of the system are comprised in this—it feeds and justifies the cry for reform, and the distrust with which the country regards the House of Commons.

This alone is amply sufficient for demonstrating, that, on the doctrines of the most violent of the anti-reformers, a far more efficient system of reform than their own is imperiously called for by public good. It is aided by an overwhelming mass of other evidence. Their system does not attempt to remove many evils of the first magnitude, which either exist in defiance of the constitution and laws, or could be removed without speculative change and improve-tion. Some of them we will enumerate.

1. To a large extent, a single individual regularly sells both the seats of a borough to whomsoever he pleases; and through his power to do so, he regularly sells himself and his members to the Ministry or Opposition. No one will venture to say that the constitution ever intended an enormity like this to have existence, or that it is sanctioned by the laws.

2. A man, no matter what his talent and virtue may be, can only obtain a seat in the House of Commons by making himself a party slave, or throwing away a pretty large fortune. He must at the door of this House sacrifice his independence, or plunge himself into debt, and rob his family, if he be not very rich, else he can never enter it. In consequence, the best qualified men are excluded, and the House is composed of the least trustworthy and capable. This is just as much at variance with the spirit and intention of the constitution, as with the letter of the laws; and it is equally at variance with the public weal.

3. The power to elect members is in the majority confined to the aristocracy and the lower orders; it is virtually withheld from the middle classes. For example, Liverpool, it is said, contains somewhat more than four thousand electors; the overwhelming majority of them consists of mechanics, labourers, &c., and the respectable, intelligent part of the inhabitants are in a great measure destitute of votes. The case is the same in all open boroughs, and, under the present system, it must continually get worse. Thus, while disqualification gives the seat to the representative, it also gives the vote to the elector. Because the power to elect is mainly vested in the ignorant and corrupt, the member is chosen without regard to fitness, and on the ground of destructive creed, or willingness to distribute liquor and bribes. It follows, that members for open boroughs can only hope to retain their seats by sacrificing duty to the passions and prejudices of the populace. The constitution never intended this to be the case, and a remedy could not be other than beneficial.

4. The election of every open borough is, to a large extent, under the control of electors who live at a distance from it, take no interest in its welfare, and sell their votes to the highest bidder, without regard to any thing but price. These hired strangers often throw out the best, and elect the worst representatives, in spite of the majority of the inhabitants; practically, they disfranchise the latter. Farther, they form a leading cause in preventing all but the most incompetent men from becoming candidates. Remedy here is called for by the constitution, to remove innovation.

5. Bribery prevails to an enormous extent in almost every open borough. The Constitution and laws, of course, are opposed to it.

We could add largely to the list, but it is wholly needless. The defence of all this rests chiefly on two assertions; the first is—It works well; and the second is—Reform must produce revolution.

Touching the first, it is really the odious doctrine—the end sanctifies the means: the constitution is trampled on, the law is violated, and gross crime is committed, but it works well, ergo, it must continue. The assertion, however, is totally untrue; the present system has long worked in the most baleful manner possible. When the Catholic Question was carried, it was proved that a coalition of the great borough interests could make almost any change of law and institution, in defiance of the public voice, and the solemn engagements of the Legislature. No upright man can say that this ought to remain without remedy. For several years the House of Commons has treated the sentiments and petitions of the community with the utmost disregard; and it has never even attempted to remove the unexampled public suffering which has prevailed without intermission. At present the House proclaims the population to be in great distress, yet it takes no statesmanlike view of causes, and proposes no adequate remedies; it contents itself with repeating, parrot-like, the vulgar, ignorant, factious cry for retrenchment and reduction of taxes, although every schoolboy knows that, in the nature of things, it is impossible for the latter to yield any relief worthy of notice to national loss and want. Thus it is proved by experience, that the present system forms a House of Commons which neither supplies proper security for public possessions, nor possesses the ability required for the discharge of its ordinary duties.

This system is so far from preventing change in the distribution of election power, that it is hourly making it. It is an argument with the anti-reformers, that reform would, of necessity, be revolution, because it would place power in new hands: now that which they defend, is continually producing the revolution they profess to oppose; it is constantly transferring power from the Aristocracy to the Democracy, and giving effect to the schemes of the Radicals. We need only point to late elections, and particularly the last one, for proof that in many open boroughs it has given the populace as complete an ascendancy as universal suffrage could do; and that in various counties it has placed both the Aristocracy and Agriculture in the minority. These anti-reformers bewailed the issue of the last election, and yet it was produced by change of interest and person, but not of sentiment and conduct, in the elector; it was the natural and certain fruit of the system they defend. In the nature of things, the latter must regularly extend what is tantamount to universal suffrage amidst the boroughs, and enlarge the command of manufactures and trade over counties. If it make no direct change in the close boroughs, it makes a very sweeping indirect one; it destroys the means by which they work for good, combines them and degrades them into engines of vicious private gain.

This system causes an election war between the Aristocracy and the Democracy, which reform only can terminate. The lower orders, so far as principle is concerned, elect none but professed enemies of the former; and manufacturing and trading freeholders act in the same manner in counties. While it thus makes it the great object of the elector to return the most unfitting representative—to elect the demagogue and profligate, it of necessity carries the same war into the House of Commons, and makes it the great object of a large part of this House to sacrifice public interests for the sake of aspersing and trampling on the Aristocracy. The system, therefore, fills the mass of the people with disaffection, leads them to embrace the most pernicious principles of policy, and renders the popular branch of the Legislature an engine of discord and public ruin!

Having shewn that the first defensive assertion is of no value, we will now look at the second. To say that reform must necessarily be revolution, is to say what is not only groundless but ridiculous; it is demonstrable that it may be revolution or preservation; a loss to the Aristocracy or a gain, according to kind and degree. Is there, then, any danger that none but ruinous reform will be adopted? The passion of the lower classes for reform has greatly abated—the middle and upper ones wish for such only as will be cautious, practical, and moderate.—Ministers have pledged themselves to stop too soon rather than proceed too far;—the honest part of the reformers ask only such as will disfranchise the corrupt democrat as well as aristocrat, and base the representation on property—and a majority of the Legislature is at least strongly opposed to all that may be speculative and dangerous. It seems to be scarcely possible for any pernicious scheme of reform to be carried in the teeth of all this.

We, of course, conclude from what we have stated, that a general reform ought to be no longer delayed; but in saying this, we must disavow all participation in the opinions which the reformers have lately put forth at public meetings. Whatever may have been the case with others, the intellect of these men has not "marched" an hair's breadth, and they have never been visited by the "schoolmaster." They can only repeat the silly, senseless, factious trash which was current amidst the lowest of the Radicals ten years ago. Exceptions there are, but the body of them have proved that they are profoundly ignorant of the question they pretend to decide on. If we consent to have reforms, we must have nothing more; we must have no change of principle—no innovation—nothing which is not reform in reality as well as name; and farther, we must have no partial and corrupt reform. We are willing to repair dilapidation, supply defect, and remove abuse, on substantial proof, but not on controverted opinion; and also to dispense impartial justice to Aristocrat and Democrat, Anti-reformer and Radical, without regard to person, and solely with reference to public interests; beyond this we cannot go.

The close boroughs form the great object of contention between the reformers and their opponents; the former attack, and the latter defend them, on the ground that they are possessed by the Aristocracy. Both sides are egregiously wrong. The Aristocracy, as a whole, does not possess, and it draws little exclusive benefit from them. They belong to a few Peers and Commoners, who use them as individuals for private gain; and the great body of the Peers have no boroughs. On all matters which more directly affect the Aristocracy, for example, the Game and Corn Laws, it finds the close-borough members divided; and at the best, it has only the few votes which one division possesses more than the other. With the exception of a number too small to have any material effect on the general decisions of the House of Commons, the close boroughs practically belong as much to the Democracy as to the Aristocracy; their members act like those of the open ones.

When the history of late years is looked at, it seems a most ludicrous absurdity to argue that the close boroughs form a source of exclusive benefit to the Aristocracy as a body. The men who have regularly attacked the latter—who have continually taken the lead in depriving it of its possessions—who have made it the object of popular animosity—and who have, as even its enemies assert, placed it on the brink of destruction, have been the members of these close boroughs. It has found in these very boroughs the most bitter of its foes; it has suffered infinitely more from them than the rest of the community, and there is the best reason for believing that its situation would have been far better than it is, had they not been in existence.

The truth is, in general the Aris-ocrat who possesses a certain number attaches himself for private gain to the Ministry or Opposition; in consequence, they are not used for the benefit of the Aristocracy, but for that of party; they are made to operate like the open ones. In these days, when the popular side has gained the ascendancy and the Ministry follow it, the close boroughs are in the majority used as a tremendous weapon against the Aristocracy.

The assertion that they give to the latter a monopoly of place, is not true; they only give it to a few individual aristocrats, to the prejudice of the Aristocracy as a body. Because the vicious and imbecile exception possesses them, the great mass of virtuous and talented Peers are as much excluded from office, as unimportant commoners.

It may be said that the members of these boroughs might in an urgent case be made to act in a body for the benefit of the Aristocracy. History pronounces this to be scarcely possible; but however, if the interests of the Aristocracy cannot be protected without, they cannot be with such union; it would create an opposite union against which it would be powerless, and which would be destructive to all.

Our deliberate conviction, therefore, is, that if the close boroughs were abolished, and the members of them were transferred to the lauded interest generally, the Aristocracy would be a great gainer from the change.

But how would the abolition affect the community at large? In looking at this question, we must disregard the silly assertions of the reformers. Whatever these boroughs may be in ownership, they have always supplied the most effective bulwark of the popular cause. By the latter we mean the real cause of the people—that of their interests, but not of their passions and delusions—the cause which in the nature of things must eternally exist as one distinct from, jealous of, and in a certain degree opposed to, that of the government. An Opposition, that is a party in the Legislature to watch vigilantly, and when needful to withstand, the acts and policy of the Ministry, is as necessary for public good as a Ministry; to make it beneficial, it ought not only to be highly endowed with talent and knowledge, but to be almost as independent of the people, as of the government. Such independence is essential, because the people commonly support Ministers the most warmly when their interests call for opposition; and it is necessary for their party in Parliament to lead, rather than follow them. The close boroughs have furnished such an Opposition—they have placed in the Legislature a powerful body of men, having a deep personal interest in scrutinizing the conduct of government, qualified in every way to fight the battles of the community with the greatest effect, and alike independent of both the Ministry and the People.

The abolition would necessarily destroy this Opposition. We grant that it would raise up another in its place, but what would be its character? A question of greater moment could not be propounded. It is well known that the lights and leaders of the House of Commons must, in general, enter it free of expense, or be excluded; whatever may be the case with the Pitts, Burkes, Canning, and Broughams, in mature life, they cannot gain an introduction by popular favour, or the money of others. Without these boroughs, the Ministry might have as much leading talent in the House as ever, but the Opposition could not calculate on any; the former would be supported by the ascendant party in the country, therefore, the leaders of the latter could scarcely be elected in any quarter through popular favour. If there were now no such boroughs, the heads of the existing Opposition could scarcely hope for seats, save through weight of purse; and if the Lord Chancellor had to sustain a contest with Mr Hunt, the latter, in all probability, would triumph. Then it would be impossible for untried and rising young men, possessed only of ability, to gain seats on the side of Opposition. Under the proper working of the Constitution, the case would always be the same, because the Opposition would have only the minority of electors.

Thus, in the first place, the new Opposition would be destitute of leading talent and knowledge. In the second, it would be almost powerless in numbers; and in the third, it would be compelled to pander to the passions of the populace, feed popular delusion, and betray the cause of the people in important matters, as the only means of securing the re-election of its members. If one of the latter should, however, conscientiously and justly, oppose or advocate measures in hostility to popular clamour, where could he afterwards gain a seat?

England forms the only great nation, in which liberty ever could regularly flourish, reach perfection, and take the character of perpetuity. In all others, it could only obtain partial and transient existence. We ascribe the difference, in a large degree, to the circumstance that England hitherto has placed in the popular branch of her legislature, a powerful body of men, highly gifted, and alike independent of government and people, to inspect and check the former, on the one hand, and lead and restrain the latter, on the other. It must be observed, that in addition to its effects on the Ministry, this body keeps in order the democratic party; the Humes and O'Connells are rendered insignificant and powerless in Parliament, not by Ministers, but by the regular Opposition.

We, therefore, conscientiously believe, that these maligned close boroughs enter largely into the root and aliment of British liberty; and that their abolition would inflict infinitely more injury on the democratic cause, than on the aristocratic one.

The example of America is of no value. She is yet so much an infant, that she has not reached the divisions between poor and rich, or the age of demagogues and popular discontent. Besides, she has no aristocracy for the passions of the multitude to act against.

The honest part of the Reformers are willing to spare a certain number of these boroughs as a means of admitting talent into the House of Commons. We apprehend there will be infinite difficulty in making this a matter of legal arrangement. The talent must not only be admitted, but it must be divided, and a full share of it must always be in opposition. The number might easily be fixed, but not the ownership. Although they are at present filled by the choice of party, they belong to individuals who very frequently change sides. The Marquis of Cleveland is, we believe, a pretty large proprietor; this man has been, for some years, constantly leaping from side to side, with all the agility of a mountebank; and by extraordinary accident, some piece of personal benefit has fallen on himself at almost every leap. The Marquis of Hertford is, we think, another; he supported, in succession, the Liverpoos, Canning, and Goderich cabinets, and he is now in opposition. Various of the great borough owners have, in late years, changed sides more than once, in violation of principle, and apparently from the base motive of private benefit. Mr Canning, by the formation of his Ministry, and the Duke of Wellington and Sir R. Peel, by their conduct on the Catholic Question, wellnigh destroyed integrity amidst public men; and these borough owners have since taken the first place in exhibiting sordid and shameless disregard of it. A number of ministerial and opposition boroughs might be spared, but it would be neither practicable nor proper to bind individual owners of them constantly to the same side. What Cleveland, or Hertford, or Bedford, or Rutland, could, in these liberal times, be always restricted to the bread and water of opposition? Without bonds, the opposition boroughs would, probably, be nearly all ministerial ones, a month after the passing of the Reform law.

It is thus evident, that if a portion of the close boroughs should be retained, they ought to be no longer individual property. Should they remain such property, the reduction of the number would tend to range them all on one side, and give them the most mischievous character. It is because they are so numerous that they are beneficial; that however the owners may change sides, there must still be a formidable part of them in opposition. Diminish the number sufficiently, and it will make them all the instruments of government. Where then ought the ownership to be vested? With regard to the ministerial ones, there would be little difficulty. Every man who seeks nothing beyond reform and public good, will say that Ministers ought to have seats in the House of Commons; and if this be true, the country ought to provide them with seats. A number of boroughs might be given to them without any danger of their being improperly used. A Minister ought not to represent any populous place; he ought not to be exposed to election unpopularity and defeat, or to be enabled to employ the mighty means given him by office in intimidating and corrupting electors; he ought to be wholly independent of every place and interest. The connexion of Mr Canning and Mr Huskisson with Liverpool had the most baleful effects on the councils of the empire, and it frequently caused great embarrassment to government by the disclosures they made, in public and private, to their constituents; we do not say how far it produced the scandalous corruption which the people of Liverpool have just displayed. It would be a gain to public convenience and benefit, if Ministers had seats in virtue of their offices, were restricted from becoming candidates for populous places, and had a limited number of seats for promising young men as subordinates or supporters. This would exempt them in a considerable degree from the pernicious influences which, not the Aristocracy, but a few individual Peers, exercise over them; and it would remove the things which so often deprive the leading Peers of virtue and patriotism. Practically a Minister might as well sit in virtue of his office, as of the votes of the electors he nominally represents. The object in retaining the boroughs is to retain the seats, without giving any power of choice to the ostensible electors.

The difficulty would rest with the Opposition boroughs. It is essential for the Opposition to have as many of these boroughs or free seats as the Ministry. But then the perplexing question shews itself—How is it to be defined and distinguished? The Ministry is a duly appointed and recognised body; but the Opposition, although quite as necessary, is not. The world knows who form the latter, but the constitution knows nothing of it save in suffering. The heads of it, like the Ministry, ought to dispose of its seats. Assuming that these heads at present consist of Sir R. Peel and his friends, how long will they continue to do so? Only, we suspect, until Ministers will take Sir Robert and certain of his colleagues into office. If afterwards the heads of Opposition be found in Mr Hume, Mr O'Connell, Mr W. Harvey, &c., it will scarcely be said that they ought to be intrusted with the filling of the free seats. If the parties which, until lately, bore the names of Whig and Tory, were perpetually separated, the matter might be arranged; but they are not. For some time before the change of Ministry, there were two great hostile parties in opposition—the old Tories and Whigs—the one of which had at least quite as much right to be deemed the constitutional Opposition as the other. Thus we know not how the difficulty could be surmounted of naming proper men to dispose of the seats in question.

There has often been, and there ought always to be, an independent party—one not seeking office, and holding the balance between the Ministry and Opposition. This party is quite as necessary, and needs talent as much, as the others. It, therefore, ought to have a small share of these seats.

If the close boroughs be wholly abolished, and no provision be made for securing to talent admission into the House of Commons without cost, and exempted from the caprice and control of popular electors, we are confident that the abolition will inflict infinitely more injury on the cause of the People than on that of the Aristocracy—will be chiefly a gain to arbitrary power—and will give a deadly blow to the best interests of the empire. If the plan of the reformers we have mentioned do not secure half of the boroughs it may retain to the constitutional Opposition, its retention of a part will be more pernicious than the abolition of the whole would be: it will destroy the portion which is invaluable to the country, and give the worst operation to the other. Talent will only be able to gain the free seats by ranging itself with the Ministry; and the heads of Opposition, or, in other words, its ability, knowledge, and integrity, must make themselves the slaves of popular passion and delusion, or be expelled Parliament.

Every Whig reformer will declare that it would have been a great public evil, if when the Whigs were in opposition, such men as Fox, Burke, Brougham, Tierney, &c., had been excluded from the House of Commons. Yet they would have been in danger of exclusion at every election, and they could only have escaped it through the money of others, had it not been for the close boroughs. If such men ought always to have seats, it needs no proof to shew that seats ought always to be provided for them; they could place no dependence on popular favour, and their election through it would be rather injurious than beneficial; it of course follows that they ought to have seats given them in some other manner. The man who would replace a system which secures them constant admission into the House with one which would generally exclude them when in opposition—that is, when their presence in it would be the most necessary for public good—is not a friend to popular liberty and privilege.

We do not speak thus for the sake of the Aristocracy; the distinction of the boroughs might, we believe, be effected without injuring its interests. We are anxious to see the abomination they form in principle removed; but, seeking nothing beyond reform, we are also anxious to retain the benefits they yield in operation. We cannot consent to sweep away good with evil. It is an easy matter to generalize, and if it were only necessary to look at the elector, reform might be understood by the factious dunces who decide on it so rashly. But impartial men who love their country will not be satisfied with merely glancing at the surface; they will not be moved by assertion and calumny; they will examine deeply and widely, and sanction such change alone as will be improvement. Either substitute for these boroughs something which will secure to the great leaders of opposition the easy and certain entrance into Parliament they have hitherto had, or, for the sake of liberty and the empire, preserve them with all their iniquity!

If they, or any part of them, be abolished, the question arises—to whom are their seats to be transferred? Putting out of sight the Aristocracy, they have always, in the most flourishing part of English history, belonged to the landed interest; and if nothing beyond reform be attempted, they must, after the abolition, belong to it. The name of this interest has, in late years, been as studiously suppressed, as though it had been without existence. The newspaper scribes and gin-shop reviewers have always spoken from motives alike guilty and obvious, as though the whole land of the country were held by the great Aristocrats. Placing the latter and their laud entirely out of the question, there is a landed interest, which in wealth and numbers is of far greater importance than any other; and according to the constitution, justice and equity, it has as much right as any other to be represented in the House of Commons. Every honest reformer will say, that on the score of public good, the seats which are now its own, must not be taken from it by reform; how to secure them to it, requires much consideration.

This great interest in late years has been far more inefficiently represented than any other, the causes of this are continually enlarged, and without reform, the distress which has so long sat on it must soon become ruin.

In circumstance and system of election, other interests have a destructive superiority over it; and this is utterly indefensible, even on the uniformity doctrines of the Radicals. In the first place, while it has no influence in filling the seats of other interests, the latter have almost as much as itself in filling the only seats it possesses. The landowners have no share in electing the members of manufacturing and trading places; but the manufacturers and traders have a vast share in electing the members of counties; and they have lately gained the support of various borough owners. Small country towns which are open, are about as free from the influence of the landed interest as London and Liverpool; and their inhabitants are as hostile to it, as those of the manufacturing districts.

It follows that the members of manufactures and trade represent them only, and therefore they zealously promote their interests at the cost of agriculture, as the best means of securing their own re-election; but those of agriculture represent manufactures and trade likewise; in consequence they cannot, in many cases, even defend its interests, without ensuring their expulsion from their seats; probably of two county members, one regularly acts with its enemies, while the other opposes them with nothing better than compromise.

This state of things rapidly grows worse. The cities and boroughs continually become more independent of, and hostile to, the landed interest; and manufacturing and trading freeholders increase very greatly, while agricultural ones remain almost stationary. This interest has already been stripped of the county members in Middlesex and Surrey, and if no reform take place, it will soon share the same fate in various other counties. Its members are losing the seats for boroughs they formerly possessed; and not many of them can now afford to contest either borough or county. Not only manufacturers and merchants, but even trading lawyers and party empirics, aspire at present to county seats.

In the second place, the elective franchise in manufactures and trade is gained not only by purchase, but by birth, servitude, occupancy, and we think marriage: in agriculture it is gained only by property. In the former, mechanics, labourers, and petty tradesmen, to an enormous extent, have votes, independently of property of any kind; and in the latter, neither labourer nor farmer has a vote, if he have not a freehold of a certain value. In manufactures and trade, the poor voters go with the rich ones, and surpass them in hostility to agriculture; but the small and middling freeholders of country towns, are as much opposed to the latter, as those of large manufacturing places.

In the third place, a borough can be contested at far less cost than a county, and the latter cannot be contested on the side of agriculture, with any hope of success, without the support of certain great families. It follows that the borough has greater choice of members, and is represented with more ability and independence, than the county.

In the fourth place, the members of the landed interest are connected with the party Aristocracy; but those of other interests are not. If, therefore, Ministers decide on sacrificing it, they, by their influence with this Aristocracy, are enabled to array almost half its own members against it, and neutralize the whole. Although this interest has a great number of members, it is little better than nominally represented; it is at the mercy of government; on every emergency, one party of them by their dependence on trade and manufactures, on the one hand, and the party Aristocrats on the other, make the whole powerless in its favour. If trade and manufactures be attacked, their members act unanimously and independently in their defence.

And in the fifth place, government has been for some time acting on the policy of basing itself more and more on trade and manufactures, and conciliating them by inroads on agriculture—the great party aristocrats are ranging themselves more and more with trade and manufactures—the latter are carrying on a war of extermination against agriculture, and both the Ministry and Opposition have embraced the doctrine, that its continual, though gradual, sacrifice to them, is necessary for the common good.

From all this, our own most carefully formed and conscientious opinion is, that the Landed Interest and Aristocracy, as a whole, have only this choice before them—Reform or ruin. It is demonstrated by experience, and the nature of things, that the present system will soon virtually drive them out of the House of Commons, and render them defenceless against the mighty enemies who seek to plunge them into destruction.

It is asserted by the constitution, right and public good, that the landed interest ought, in respect of representation in Parliament, to be placed on an equality with every other; and he who denies it, is not a reformer, but a revolutionist. We care not for the Peers; it would be far better for this interest if the more influential of them had nothing to do with the choice of its members; we will throw them out of the question, and then we may safely affirm, that the landowners who are not Peers, farmers, and husbandry labourers, have as much right to be directly represented in the House of Commons, as the manufacturing and trading part of the population.

To produce the equality, it is manifestly essential that manufactures and trade should have as little to do with electing the members of agriculture, as it has to do with electing theirs. Let the large towns have members, but restrict their inhabitants from voting for county ones. For example, let the freeholders of Liverpool, Manchester, or Leeds, vote for its members, instead of those of the county. This would be so far from being unjust, that it is necessary to remove indefensible injustice. The town freeholder in general has as much connexion with trade, and as little with agriculture, as the burgess; yet he is prohibited from voting for the members of the town who represent the trade to which he belongs, and allowed to vote for the county ones who represent an interest he has nothing to do with, and is hostile to. In numberless cases, he votes for both the town and county ones—he votes for four, while the agricultural freeholder can rarely vote for more than those of the county. The inhabitants of Westminster, Southwark, and their suburbs, elect not only their own members, but the county ones also; they thus usurp a double portion of the franchise, and practically disfranchise the landowners. The unconstitutional and flagitious character of this must be obvious to every one.

The freeholder of the town too small for members ought still to vote for county ones.

Having thus in a great measure separated the electors of the landed interest from others, it must next be considered which would be the best mode of giving them the members of the abolished close boroughs. If these members be given to country towns, they will either be elected on the same grounds as those of manufacturing places—they will in effect be given to manufactures and trade, or they will again become the property of borough owners.

These objects must be kept in view—the vote must be principally confined to those who are interested in agriculture—a large number of landowners must share in the election—and the expense must be greatly reduced. They would perhaps be the best attained by a modification of Mr Pitt's plan for increasing the number of county members. It is objected that the experiment has failed in Yorkshire; but we imagine matters would have been quite as bad in this county as they are, if no change had been made. The four-member system might, we think, work as well in a county as it does in the city of London; perhaps more might be said in its favour; it might break the power of the great landowners, and cause—which is a thing much to be desired—many of the county members to owe their election to middling and small ones. We of course say this on the assumption, that manufacturing freeholders would not be permitted to vote for counties.

A county might be divided into two parts, for the purpose of giving two members to each; or a number of its existing divisions might be formed into a whole, and receive two members. The system of attaching the adjoining hundred to a country town is objectionable, because it gives the turn of the election, either to men who are hostile to agriculture, or to one great landowner. Nothing less than a district ought to have members.

To reduce the pernicious ascendancy of the great landowners, the number of electors ought to be enlarged. The vote should be given to copyholders. The principle of giving it to occupancy is recognised, and the reformers intend to make it the leading one in bestowing members on the large towns; why then cannot it be adopted in agricultural elections? The great landowners let cheap farms, and in consequence their tenants are to a wide extent freeholders; the middling and small ones demand high rents, therefore their tenants have few votes; thus in proportion to quantity of land, the former have a great advantage over the latter. If every occupier of land worth annually twenty pounds and upwards, had a vote, the effects we think would be greatly in favour of the middling and small landowners. This vote for occupancy should, however, be confined to the occupiers of land, and withheld from every freeholder; its object should be to put the respectable occupier on a level with the latter.

For the same purpose the expenses of election ought to be reduced. We do not wish to substitute one extreme for another; on the contrary, we are convinced that a system which should elect the members of the House of Commons free of cost would be a very ruinous one. The existing law of qualification can be, and often is, evaded; if there were no election expenses, men without a shilling could easily gain seats; and it is evident enough, that, in every quarter, such men would be amidst the first in seeking them. What business has a man without fortune in the House? He must live, and his seat will yield him no honest income; he must, therefore, either follow some employment which will disqualify him for discharging his public duties, or become a hireling; in truth, he must at once be a slave to gain his nominal property. Such a system would be in effect an extension of the close borough one; and it would increase the corrupt power of the leading Peers and Ministers. This of course does not apply to what we have said respecting the free admission of talent, because it is to be confined to talent only, not elected by popular choice.

We wish to see agriculture still represented by reasonably rich country gentlemen; but we also wish to see that practical disqualification removed which now rests on them. Our plan would be to reduce the expenses of a seat for a county or agricultural district so far as to put it within the reach of any of them, in order that the candidate might offer on ability only—the middling and small landowners might have a proper share in choosing their representatives—and the members of the landed interest might be duly dependent on the mass of their constituents.

We will observe, that if the members of the abolished boroughs be given to counties, without taking from manufacturing and trading freeholders the power of voting for county members, it will be virtually to the landed interest much the same as though they were given to the large towns. If Middlesex and Surrey get each two additional members, who will elect them? The manufacturing parts of Yorkshire already boast that they return two of the county members; and it is evident enough, that in the space of seven or fourteen years, they will be able to return all the four. In most counties, the additional members must fall into the hands of the freeholders we have named; who besides must neutralize the others to the landed interest.

It matters not whether the close boroughs in question, or an equal number of the small independent ones, be secured to agriculture; it is however evident, that if the proposed change transfer seats from the latter to hostile interests, it will be the reverse of reform.

Of these small boroughs we need say little; their members might be given to the large towns; although they are in many cases called agricultural ones, they are generally in both feeling and representatives the contrary. Should they be retained for agriculture in lieu of the close ones, the combining of them with a large track of surrounding country will not be sufficient; the vote in them ought also to be taken from the trading and given to the agricultural part of the inhabitants.

What will reform do with the large boroughs? They are the most corrupt and dangerous of the whole; and if it do not operate on them with an unsparing hand, it will produce small benefit. The system under which the franchise is gained by apprenticeship and birth, is not more false in principle than pernicious in effects. A petty tradesman is free, but a rich one is not; from this alone the apprentices and children of the former gain the vote; and those of the latter are denied it. Because a labourer is free, his children are; because a merchant or professional man is not free, his children are not. This system confines the increase of freemen in a great measure to shopmen, mechanics, and labourers, and scatters them through the country. It has already established in these boroughs what is equivalent in effect to universal suffrage.

If in each borough the manufacturing and trading freeholders, and all housekeepers paying more than a certain rent, be allowed to vote; this will do something towards forming a balance to the poorer burgesses at present; but it will be very insufficient for the future. Such burgesses must necessarily multiply far more rapidly than freeholders and housekeepers; consequently in a comparatively short period of time they must bear the same proportion to the respectable electors they do now—they must gain the complete control of the election. A burgess gives the vote to his apprentices and sons—we think he even in some places gives it to the husbands of his daughters; if freeholders and housekeepers be allowed to vote, they must do the same, for the injustice cannot be tolerated of conceding the privilege to one set of electors, and refusing it to another far more worthy of it. We need not shew how this would operate in multiplying electors; particularly non-resident ones. At present the bought outvoters are so numerous, that it requires a fortune to bring them to the poll, and they hold the turn of the election; their power is so formidable, that a candidate frequently canvasses them the first, as the best means of discovering how far he can hope for success. We could name several places in which at the last election the candidates who had a majority of the inhabitants were thrown out, and the sitting members were elected by the outvoters. The latter continually increase largely in numbers and power, and if no change be made, they will soon in most places virtually disfranchise the inhabitants.

The evil fruits of this system extend much farther. The same men who elect members of Parliament also elect the mayors and aldermen—the magistrates—the local rulers of the place. Thus the selection of the magistracy is, in the majority, confined to the corrupt and prejudiced ignorant; while respectable merchants, tradesmen, professional men, and housekeepers, have no voice in it. It is therefore a matter of bribery also. If our memory do not mislead us, the Liverpool papers stated, not long ago, that as much money had been expended in this most pure place, in a contest for the office of mayor, as is often expended elsewhere for a seat in the House of Commons. In addition, the Magistrates must be taken from the burgesses.

It must be observed, that this monstrous system is in the highest degree destructive to public and private morals; it strips both representative and constituent of patriotism and integrity.

Those who would spare it, and yet destroy the comparatively beneficial close boroughs, are not reformers, but men whose schemes would hasten the arrival of public ruin. We have no wish to take the franchise from any one who already possesses it; but, however, we would not suffer it to be gained any longer by apprenticeship and birth. This would gradually extinguish the poor, corrupt, and non-resident electors. A boy from the country goes to any borough—for example, to Hull—as an apprentice, and in consequence he becomes one of its electors. At the expiration of his apprenticeship, he removes to London or Liverpool, and fixes himself there for life. What stake has he in the welfare of Hull? None; it is not the place of his birth or residence; he has no vote during the period he is really interested in it, he only gains one when he becomes to it a stranger. Yet he votes for its members, while its respectable inhabitants are restricted from doing so; and he, and men like him, hold the turn of the election, in spite of the inhabitants. He is more accessible to bribery than the resident electors, and he almost always sells himself, without regard to any thing but price. Either this is thoroughly indefensible, or the members of a place ought to be chosen by corrupt strangers and enemies to it. As the vote is given for the good of the place, and not of the individual, we cannot see why a man should not forfeit his freedom by removing from the place, of which he is free; but, however, we would at once permit every freeman to vote in that of his residence, borough or county, and prohibit him from voting in any other. A distinction must be made between burghs and freeholder; the latter has the same stake in the county from which he draws his vote, whether he reside in or out of it; therefore his vote ought not to be affected by non-residence. The county freeman is at present disfranchised as soon as he parts with his stake in the interest of the county.

* If reform do not extend to those matters, and be successful in putting an end to bribery and the influence of superiors, what will be its leading fruits? The seats of these boroughs will be monopolized, not by the Whigs—not even by the democrats of Greek-Ian renown—but by the Cobbetts, Hunts, and O'Connells. The great cause why better men now possess them, is, such men monopolize the means of bribery and intimidation; remove this cause, without changing the majority of electors, and every seat will pass to demagogues and traitors.

Notwithstanding the faults and impurities of the scot and lot places, we are inclined to spare some of the larger of them. We even think that a very small corner of the House of Commons should be given to the Woods, Hunts, and O'Connells—to the members of the very table. We are aware that these members are always the most incapable, and the most hostile to the interests of the people, but still they have their use. They form the means by which the multitude can always bring its grievances and politics before Parliament; and also be made acquainted with the want of sense, truth, and honesty of the demagogues who delude it.

All seem to be agreed, that in giving members to the large manufacturing towns, the franchise ought to be limited to property; we will therefore only observe, that a low qualification will operate much like universal suffrage.

We will now offer some general observations. Reform is not to create a new system; it is cautiously to remove what is bad and supply what is defective; but it is also to preserve what is valuable, without regard to theory and speculation. What does the elective franchise exist for? Solely to provide the best possible House of Commons. To set up individual right to it against general good is absurd; the right can exist in the good only. Each interest and class must be duly represented, this is essential for enabling the individual to be so; and to compass it, the existing system gives a number of seats to each. In some places the lower, in others the middle, and in a third portion the upper classes elect the members. In those places the agriculturists, and in these the manufacturers, are the electors; the seats of this place belong to one trade, and of that, to another. The effect is what it would be if the labourers of the whole country were to elect a certain number of members exclusively, and the other classes, and each of the different interests, were to do the same.

This is perfect in principle; it is the only mode which can ensure proper equality of representation, individual and collective. It is, however, railed against by the reformers as an intolerable evil. They must look at the elector, but not at the House of Commons—at the individual right, but not at the general good. They must have the same system in every place without regard to consequences.

This is false in principle, and it would be radical change, but not reform. If the lower classes had the same proportion of power in every place, they would elect all the House, or none of it: the case would be similar with the upper classes. Uniformity would give to some interests a destructive command over others: thus it is now in freehold votes giving many of the seats of agriculture to manufactures and trade. The House of Commons affords abundant proof, that to make a man the representative of conflicting classes and interests, is to make him no representative—is to render him a cipher or betrayer; and that to give him efficiency, he must represent one only.

Reform, therefore, ought to retain the principle of the existing system, and give to each interest and class the number of seats required by common good: by this it ought to regulate its distribution of members and the franchise. We speak not of minute calculation, but, in portioning out the House of Commons, it must disregard individuals, and give proper portions of it to proper and distinct portions of the community; or it will create an intestine enemy to destroy the empire. With reference to the larger divisions, manufactures and trade may be regarded as one; but they are opposed to agriculture, therefore care must be taken to preserve a proper balance of power between them and it: the lower and middle classes have many feelings in common which are adverse to the upper ones; of course the latter must have a sufficiency of seats for their defence. It is self-evident that the prosperity and happiness of the individual depend on those of the class and interest to which he belongs; consequently it is preposterous to look at him only in distributing the franchise without paying any regard to the class and interest.

We are not friendly to the principle advocated here and adopted in France, of exalting professional men into privileged electors. The civil part of them would be, in general, entitled to vote as housekeepers; and with respect to the naval and military part, we think they have no more right to the franchise than custom-house and police officers. Professional men would make the least independent of all electors. In most places their vote would be little felt, but in some it would have great effect; in Westminster, naval and military officers, medical men, &c. would almost hold the turn of the election. When the incessant fierceness with which half-pay and other officers hunt employment and promotion is looked at, it may easily be conceived that their votes would be generally at the command of government.

On reducing the expense and length of elections, we will not speak; it excites no difference of opinion. We will, however, repeat, that we have no wish to substitute one extreme for another. Public good, and even purity in the elector, do not require that an election should be wholly divested of expense. Every Englishman who has been accustomed to the humours and festivities of a popular one, will be loath to see them replaced with the sombre, moody, hungry, sanctimonious characteristics of a Ranter camp-meeting. It is part of the Englishman's nature to dine on his political solemnities—to remove their gloom and asperities with refreshing viands and generous beverage; let not reform do violence to it. *Prohibit the vote from being sold—get rid of outvoters—let county electors vote as near home as possible—confine the duration of an election to one day—let there be no treating until the close—but still let poor and rich have the means of drinking in moderation the health of the members. A man who cannot afford to expend a thousand or two at an election, is not a fitting one to be a representative; woe to the purity and independence of the House of Commons if it be taken possession of by the poor and needy! The reduction of expense must bring into the field a host of new candidates; reform must therefore be careful to exclude improper ones. By the constitution and law, every member is bound to be a burgess of the borough, or freeholder of the county he represents. What is the intention of this? Clearly that he shall be a real and regular inhabitant of the borough or county. What would be the fruits if duly enforced? Each borough and county would be represented by men of business, fully acquainted with its interests, and having a deep stake in them. The House of Commons would be composed of men minutely informed touching the circumstances, habits, and feelings of their constituents—little liable to be swayed by the temptations of power and party—largely interested in honesty and independence—free from the spirit of Cockneyism—and filled with the sentiments of the whole population of the country. It would more frequently change its members, and gain new spirit and ability; the members would be infinitely more under the proper control of their constituents, than in the case at present.

The law here is constantly evaded. A man who has never even seen a borough or county wishes to offer for it at an election; therefore at the moment he buys his freedom or a petty freehold, or he has a mock freehold given him, he is elected, and perhaps he never sees it again. This gross violation of the constitution and law, in respect of their spirit, has the most baleful consequences. The boroughs at least are generally represented by utter strangers to them—by men who are divided from them in sentiment and interest, who are incapable of representing them, and who seek their seats as a means of corrupt gain to themselves. It is a fertile source of corruption to the elector, as well as the candidate; it fills the place with factious politics, and causes the election to turn on them. It forms the great engine by which government and party fill the House of Commons with their profligate menials.

Southwark has been for some time represented by a party military officer. At the last two or three elections, Hull was infested by strange Irishmen and government clerks as candidates; and on one occasion an Irishman was elected. The members for Nottingham now are a Scotch soldier and a Cockney lawyer. A Scotch placeman sits for Norwich. One of the York members is an officer in the Guards. A London merchant and a military Colonel represent Worcester. At the last election for Yorkshire, a practising barrister, wholly unconnected with the county, was returned; and when he vacated his seat, the party which elected him wished, according to the newspapers, to replace him with Sir T. Denman. The boroughs generally are represented in this manner. What could an Irish stranger, like Mr O'Neil, know of the interests and feelings of Hull? How can those of Norwich be known to Mr R. Grant; or those of Nottingham to Sir R. Ferguson and Sir T. Denman? What possibility was there that a man like Lord Brougham could represent the sentiments, or attend to the weal of Yorkshire? Such men are destitute of the knowledge of business, local information, and provincial feeling, requisite for enabling them to discharge their duties. They may present petitions, but they cannot even be depended on for supporting them. They have little hope of being again elected, therefore they use their seats to serve the Ministry or Opposition, in utter contempt of their constituents. It is notorious that many of the individuals we have named, were invited to stand by ignorant profligate factions, without the least reference to the good of the places or the empire, and to prevent the intelligent and patriotic part of the electors from returning proper representatives.

The House of Commons is in consequence composed mainly of men whose lives are spent in London, Paris, and the watering places, and who all move in the same kind of society. Instead of being, as it ought, an epitome of the whole population—an assemblage selected from the real inhabitants of every part of the United Kingdom, it is little better than a body of fashionable Londoners. Its members, of course, are in the highest degree incompetent. Are laws made or altered which affect agriculture and trade—they do not understand them: is the population distressed—they know nothing of circumstance and fact, cause and remedy: is it necessary for them to speak the opinion of the country—they are only acquainted with the opinion of the London newspapers. They enter it to push their own fortunes, or follow party leaders only: many of them are furnished with money and influence, and sent to the places they represent, by the Ministry, Opposition, or some great family, solely that they may be its instruments.

All honest men will admit that it is essential for the electors of a place to have due knowledge of a candidate before they elect him; they ought to know his political creed from better authority than his own declarations; and to have correct information touching his private, as well as public character. Yet, through the practical violation of law in question, the electors of most open places, save counties, return men of whom they know nothing; the candidate may be, as he too often is, a demagogue, gamester, turncoat, profligate, or party slave, and still they elect him in utter ignorance of it. Let elections be divested of expense, and then, not the itinerant Broughams, Denmans, and Grants, but the itinerant Hunts and Cobbetts, will gain the borough seats.

There is not a single point on which reform is more necessary than it is on this. To fill the House of Commons with men of the best morals, creed, and heart—patriotically independent—duly acquainted with the affairs and circumstances of the community—animated with the feelings of the population at large—free from the passions and chains of party leaders—and bound to make a right use of their trust it, is essential that the members of every place should be elected from amidst its real inhabitants.

What is there to prevent this? If Reform give, as it is intended to do, members to populous places only, each will contain a sufficient number of duly qualified men to select from; no place, in truth, ought to have members, which does not contain men capable of representing it. A great change would be made in the composition of the House—so much the better. Who would be expelled? A host of party minions, adventurers, slaves of faction, officers, lawyers, &c., who only occupy their seats to disgrace and ruin their country. Every upright, able man, who now sits in the House, could still sit in it; nay, his chance for a seat would be better than it is. The free seats would admit the talented members. The Aristocracy would have for its connexions the agricultural seats, which are about all it can hope for, or even now obtain: in many respects it would be a great gainer.

We would therefore make the existing plan properly operative. No man should be permitted to offer for a place, who had not resided a certain number of years in, or within a small number of miles of it. If this number were ten or twelve, it might enable smaller places to elect from inhabitants of large ones, and country gentlemen, as well acquainted with, and known to them, as their own inhabitants. In counties, this would make scarcely any practical change.

We must now bestow a brief notice on voting by ballot. It might be very properly put out of the question by the fact, that it is not reform—that it is a radical change of mode, advocated avowedly for the purpose of making a radical change in the majority of electors—that its express object is, to deprive that of election power, which has always exercised it with the sanction of the first authorities.

Waiving this, the ballot places before us the following question—Is it beneficial, or the contrary, for property to have influence beyond the vote it gives to its owner? The question affects the manufacturer and tradesman as much as the landowner, the borough as much as the county. We have already supported change, for taking the control of seats from the property of one individual, or a very small number; therefore the question may be stated thus—If the influence acquired through property, in a county or borough, be divided amidst a considerable number of men, ought it to be destroyed, or preserved?

How is such influence always exercised? The owners are intelligent, honourable men, having a deep stake in the interests of the place they dwell in, and the public weal; they are pretty equally divided in politics; their party feelings are pure from corrupt motives; they wish to elect only respectable candidates, and they combine to exclude demagogues and traitors. If particular individuals among them act from personal reasons, the body does not. Now suppose that, in a county or borough, forty or fifty such men control the votes of the tenants, workmen, &c.; the worst which can be said is, they really elect the members. Is there the smallest ground for believing, that if the case were different, the electors at large would have better qualified candidates to choose from, or would make a better choice? No; but there is proof for producing an opposite conviction.

But these men do not really control the election. The turn of the latter—the casting vote, is still held by electors who possess no property-influence. Assuming that, in the county of York, twenty great landowners are on one side, and twenty are on another, their votes neutralize each other to a very large extent; the middling and small independent landowners hold the turn of the election, therefore they really elect the members, and the influence of the great ones is chiefly felt in the exclusion of improper candidates. Such influence is now carried too far in exclusion; but this arises from, and of course may be corrected by abolishing, the great expense.

If the influence of property were entirely destroyed, what would follow? The philosophers—the men of abstract principle—reply triumphantly,—Every elector would vote independently! Is independence in them all that is necessary? The electors who returned O'Connell, who have just elected Hunt, and who on various occasions voted for Cobbett, were no doubt perfectly independent; but their usage of independence is sufficient to convince most people that they ought not to possess it, if the constitution and public welfare be of any value.

The most conclusive demonstration exists, that under such destruction, the lower classes of electors throughout the country would all vote on one side. On what grounds would they vote? Opposition to, and hatred of, their superiors—prejudice, passion, and delusion—factious motives and objects—the wish for ruinous changes of law and institution. For whom would they vote? Projectors, innovators, demagogues, and traitors. The truth of this is put out of question by the conduct they have so long exhibited.

If the elector be not qualified to give his vote wisely as well as independently, he must be guided by the intelligent, virtuous superior, who has a deep interest in guiding him aright, or he will servilely follow the unprincipled demagogue.

The choice before us, therefore, is this. We must have the majority of electors ranged on one side as a whole, actuated by the most dangerous feelings, and supporting the worst candidates; or we must have them broken into parties combined with their superiors, voting on principles of public good, and supporting the best candidates. The evils on one side are so trifling compared with those on the other, that no honest man can hesitate. The history of this country proves, that the influence of property, when duly divided, is of the most necessary and beneficial character. It will not do to tell us that reform will lop off the bad part of the electors, for we know better. The middling housekeepers in towns, small freeholders and farmers, are infected to a fearful extent with the doctrines of Radicalism. Cobbett's influence lies chiefly amidst farmers. The Irish electors, if free from the influence of property, would return only such members as O'Connell.

Our decided conviction, as we have stated on other occasions, is, that the influence of the landlord over the tenant, the master over the servant, the superior over the inferior, enters into the essence of free and good government; that there can be no harmony, liberty, and prosperity without it; and that it is a matter of state necessity for that part of the population which has a deep stake on the right side of things, to be able to combine with it, or at least to restrain the other. It must be remarked, that this influence differs widely from absolute control; dissatisfaction in those subject to it, aided by public feeling, commonly prevents it from being improperly exercised.

As the ballot is advocated chiefly for the sake of destroying the influence of landowners, we will observe that, in our judgment, so far as concerns England and Scotland, it would injure the county landowner far less than the borough master and freeholder.

We might safely leave the matter here, but we will not do so. It is evident that the ballot does not, and cannot, ensure secrecy; in regard, therefore, to its great object, it is of no material value.

With it, the tenant or workman would be asked by his landlord or master for his vote, or who he intended to vote for; a refusal to promise or disclose, would be equivalent to, and punished as, an open vote given against his landlord or master. Thus he would be compelled to vote as he does at present, or to be guilty of deliberate falsehood; the ballot would only exempt him from the influence of property by destroying his morals.

It would rather promote than prevent bribery and corruption. The committees can easily ascertain how far the promise of an elector, from his politics and character, can be relied on: they would, therefore, on his solemn promise, as readily bribe him as they do now. At present, if he give a solemn promise, shame prevents him in most cases from violating it; but with the ballot he could, after selling his vote to one side, sell it to the other in security from detection, or the ballot would have no effect. His known want of morals could only keep the bribe from being offered him, and the ballot would strongly tempt him to abandon them, by leading him to suppose he could do it without discovery.

At present it is a hopeless matter for the agents of one candidate to tempt the tenants and workmen who are engaged through their superiors to another: introduce the ballot, and they will use every effort to gain such tenants and workmen by corruption. The influence of property is now a mighty means of preventing bribery; a vast proportion of the votes it controls would, if free from it, be sold.

If voting in public place a man under influence on the one hand, it also binds him to profession and pledge on the other. It forms the great bulwark against apostacy, treason, support of a bad cause, and the pernicious use of corrupt votes. If it place the followers under control, it restricts the leader to an honourable application of their votes; and it furnishes the example which is essential for giving a beneficial issue to elections. If the ballot were effective, the middle class of electors could barter their votes, to the betrayal of their cause, and government could buy its powerful opponents in security. Are we to find any preservative against this in the recent conduct of the Liverpool electors, or the history of the last House of Commons?

Our conclusion, therefore, is, that the ballot would be inoperative, or it would have mighty effect in destroying morals, extending corruption and treachery, and causing elections to turn on falsehood, bribery, and apostacy. In America, it is little more than a dead letter, because her circumstances differ totally from those of England.

We must say a word of it, in regard to Ireland, specially. It is well known, that there the Catholic Priest, at present, prevails against the landlord; destroy the influence of property, and the former will command every Catholic vote; the pledge exacted by him in secret, will be a matter of conscience, and, therefore, of certain redemption. The ballot would make the Catholic Priests as much the electors of the mass of the Irish members, as they would be, if they alone had votes. This ought to be sufficient for ensuring its rejection. Other things may be pleaded against it, generally. It would render a scrutiny impossible, and this would have much influence in giving the turn of elections to bad votes. It would operate balefully against public spirit, as well as opinion; and prove a great means of tempting neighbours to betray and ruin each other.

It has been declared highly ridiculous to do so, but, nevertheless, we will repeat the appeal to the Englishman's nationality. We call on every right-hearted Englishman to array himself against this outlandish and most un-English innovation.

* On shortening the life of Parliament, we have little to offer. Taking into account that the term of seven years is not the constant, but the occasional and extreme one, and that a Parliament sometimes is only suffered to live two or three, we do not say that change is necessary. At any rate, the term ought not to be less than five years.

But Reform, to be materially beneficial, must be extended in a very unsparing manner to the reformers themselves. Our readers are aware, that at some recent elections in Ireland, a Catholic Association took to itself the disposal of the seats in the House of Commons. It is evident enough that this pestilential body will virtually do the same at the next election. The example is in course of rapid imitation in England. There is an Anti-Slavery society, headed by sundry flaming reformers; this body, at the late dissolution of Parliament, did its utmost to influence the election of almost every place. A mighty combination exists, called the Birmingham Union, which avowedly labours to control every election within its reach. A society has lately been formed at Leeds, for the express purpose of making the county of York, as far as possible, its close borough, and doubtlessly, Leeds too, if the latter obtain members. Similar combinations exist, and are forming in other places; and, apparently, they will soon spread themselves over the whole country.

Why do these bodies interfere with elections? Is it their object to secure to the elector freedom of choice and fitting candidates? Or do they patriotically labour to prevent intimidation and delusion, to oppose falsehood, prejudice, and madness, to suppress faction, regulate party, base contests on public interest, and give the requisite character to the House of Commons? They interfere to do exactly the contrary. The Catholic faction deprives the legal electors of all freedom of choice, and binds them to one, and the very worst, kind of candidates, to produce convulsion and the dismemberment of the empire. The Anti-Slavery faction labours to ruin an important part of the empire, to the mighty injury of the whole. The Leeds faction intends practically to disfranchise the Yorkshire freeholders, exclude all qualified men from the representation, and force on the county such strangers or lawyers, as Sir T. Denman and Mr Sykes, to compass anti-national and revolutionary projects of its own. The case is similar with the other factions. All work by the foulest means — by falsehood, intimidation, and corruption — delusion, passion, and clamour — joint purse and mob violence; and it is utterly impossible for electors and candidates acting severally and uprightly, according to the constitution and laws, to stand against them.

These factions consist, to a vast extent, of men who are not electors, and they are really the tools of a few individuals. The followers are just as much the slaves of their heads, in regard to vote and candidate, as any tenants are of their landlords. They would give us this reform; a number of close boroughs are to be destroyed, on the one hand, and every place in the United Kingdom, counties included, is to be made a close borough, on the other. The Catholic faction is the instrument of O'Connell and the Papist Priests — the Anti-Slavery one is the tool of a knot of Cockney lawyers and traders — and that of Leeds is the slave of a Unitarian manufacturer, and certain newspaper fanatics; these men of course are to be the new borough-mongers. Thus the control of elections is to be taken from property, which is placed in many hands, and divided in principle, in order to give it to concentrated fanaticism and despotism — the nomination of members is to be taken from honourable and patriotic men, who have a deep stake in the public weal, for the purpose of bestowing it on depraved and pernicious brawlers, demagogues, and traitors.

If these factions are to be tolerated, it is ridiculous to speak of reform, or to say that, under any system, there could be purity and freedom of election. With them, it is impossible for the House of Commons to be other than a profligate, factious, imbecile, anti-national, and revolutionary body. They must be put down with a determined hand, head and tail, root and branch. There can be no real representation, if elections are to be governed by combinations and factions.

We will only glance at another most important matter. If the respectable electors be as corrupt as those of Liverpool are stated to be, what but the greatest evils can flow from reform? Vain and pernicious must all change be, without private virtue and public spirit in the elector. Here reform must again be comprehensively applied to the reformers in respect of morals.

Time and space compel us to leave various material points unnoticed; but we shall perhaps return to the subject, when the plan of Ministers is placed before the country.

No change ought evidently to be consented to by the Aristocracy and patriotic men, except on the following conditions:—

1. That talent, particularly on the Opposition side, continue to be admitted into the House of Commons, as it has been, in respect of freedom from expense and popular influence.

2. That the ignorant and corrupt part of burgesses be disfranchised; and the qualification of the elector be based on property in boroughs generally, and be sufficiently high to ensure a reasonable portion of intelligence and integrity.

3. That care be taken to prevent the lower class of electors from commanding the elections.

4. That the landed interest be raised to an equality with others; and have its full number of seats duly secured to it, not only nominally, but really, by the restriction of manufacturing and trading freeholders from voting for county members.

5. That every county and borough be bound to select members from its own real and regular inhabitants.

6. That the ballot be rejected, and property be suffered to retain its due influence.

7. That combinations for influencing elections be rigidly put down by law.

If reform do not comprehend these matters, it must be sternly opposed by every patriot.

We have said, we imagine, sufficient to give mortal offence to both sides, but as we do not write to please either, it gives us no concern; both may profit in some degree from what we have written. We conclude with offering to each a few observations.

You who are Whig reformers, must know that the labouring classes are not more anxious to injure the landed interest, than they are to impose ruinous laws on the manufacturers and traders, in respect of wages, machinery, &c. &c. You must be aware, that they feel as little affection for you as for the Tories: they will only act with you, when they can make you their instruments and followers. Lord Brougham found, in Yorkshire, that they must either be his "schoolmasters" or enemies; at the last election, it was as necessary for a candidate to conceal his connexion with you, as it was for him to conceal it with the Ministry: the men whom they follow hate you even more than the Tories. And you cannot be ignorant that your strength, even more than that of the Tories, lies in the Aristocracy. Knowing all this, as you must do, can you doubt, that if you give to these classes the ascendancy at elections, they will ruin manufactures and trade, as well as agriculture—they will destroy yourselves, as well as the Aristocracy and the Tories? And can you in common reason doubt, that the scheme of reform will give the best House of Commons to them, which will give the best to the rest of the population?

You who are Tory opponents of reform, are now a ruined minority; and how do you expect to retrieve your fallen fortunes? What do you hope for from the next Irish election? How long can you calculate on the Scotch members? In England, you are nearly driven out of every open borough, and you are undergoing rapid expulsion from the counties; this arises, not from accidental and momentary, but from natural, permanent, and growing causes. The present system will make the next election far worse to you than the last was; it will soon strip you of all but your close boroughs, neutralised by the Whig ones, and it is injuring your creed as much as your party power. In our conscience we believe that you have a deeper interest in reform, than any other part of the community. We do not ask you to change your opinion on our words, but we strongly urge you, for your own sake, to let them lead you to careful examination and impartial judgment.

THE OLD MAID AND THE GUN.

MY DEAR SIR CRISTIFER,

THERE'S naething I so much admire about you as the real simplicity o' your ways of going on. I always used to think, that as folk grew greater they grew aye the prouder: indeed, I've seen't sae in some folk myself; there was Mrs Duncason, the bailie's wife—as douce, quiet-behaved a woman in her shop as could be—ceevil and respectable to all the customers—when her man was made a Sir, for carrying up a dress, or something o' that kind, till his Majesty—no the present man, but his brother—he aye cared mair for his clothes than this sailor ane—she was neither to hold nor bind,—she answered as sharp as could possibly be, if a body only spiered the price o' an article, till folk was just frightened out o' her shop; for ye ken it wad not have done to have threip'd about maybe a bawbee, wi' such a grand woman, and “yer leddyship” coming out at every word. But that's no the way with you. Ye are just the same kind-hearted, even-down sort of a man that I have always known ye, unco agreeable to the leddies, and no elevated wi' yer dignity above what is just an' proper in a man o' yer station. I could not help thinking o' this the ither night when ye cam yer wa's up to yer tea, just as ye used to do, lang lang syne, afore ye ever thought o' being made a knight or a baronet either. We were just all delighted wi' ye; but I'll no tell ye a' that was said of you after ye were gone. I most sincerely hope the romanticism has not returned, and I can really and truly recommend coarse brown paper neist the skin, as the very best remedy I hae ever tried. It keeps out the cauld beyond belief. Weel, that night, ye mind, ye were sae amused, or was pleased to say sae, with my adventure wi' the ship at Portsmouth, that ye begged o' me to write it down for you, to read and laugh at it at yer leisure. Ye'll maybe think me an auld fool for my pains, but I can refuse ye naething; so, as I hae naething else to do the noo, I will e'en write it a', as it took place, as nearly as I can recollect.

VOL. XXIX. NO. CLXXVI.

Ye remember wee Johnny Henderson, the white-headed laddie, that lived wi' me ever since his mither, my niece, died o' a consumption, poor thing: he was aye a mischievous callant, an' I hope ye've forgi'en him for the tricks he used to play upon us baith—do ye mind when he sawed awa' about a foot frae yer crutch, and when ye gaed to show Mrs G. to her coach, ye cam' down on yer nose on the carpet? Aweel, aweel, I hope ye've past a' that, for there was nobody that wee Johnny likit sae weel as yersell. He was over high in the spirit for a poor auld maid like me to manage, so, wi' the advice o' the ither friends, though sair again' my inclination, I agreed to let him gang for a sailor, for he was extraordinary mad for the sea. I had had the care o' him by that time for more than ten years, and he was just the same to me as if he had been my ain.

Weel, we got him appointed a midshipman on board of the Jenny-veeve, a frigate of war, with thirty-six guns in her. When the news cam down, he was just wild wi' joy—he gaed about the house singing “Cease, rude Boreas,” and “The Gallant Harry Thusa,” till my maid—do ye mind auld Jenny?—declared he was fey, and naething gude would come of it. The time cam on at last when he had to gang up to England an' join his ship. He had his uniform on—I mind him so weel—wi' his little dirk hinging at his side, and looking sae bonny, wi' a little cockit hattie upon his head—oh, he didna look like as if he was ganging to the wars; an' I thought he was a bit orphan, an' that he might have staid sae happy at hame wi' his auld auntie—and my heart nearly misgave me, and I was sorry I had agreed to let him gang. But it was over late to draw back; an' as the bit creature hung greetin' ower my shoulder, I vowed, if he was spared this voyage, he should never quit me again. I, wi' tears and grief, said fareweel to wee Johnny, and lookit forward wi' the greatest impatience to the time when I was to see him again. He hadna been gone from me above a month, when he writ me a letter, tellin' me his ship was ordered to go to a station in South America, an' stay there for three years—an' I wasna to see him for a' that time! It made me regret a thousand times that ever I allowed him to gang, but it couldna be mendit noo, so I consoled myself as weel as I was able. It's extraordinar how soon ye come round out o' the bitterness o' grief at parting, as lang as ye hae ony hope o' meetin' again. I thought every time I heard frae him he was aye nearer the hame-comin'; and I amused myself in the meantime by mendin' his torn shirts he had left, and putting cloutings in the hinder part o' his breeks—hve pair o' ankeens, and three janes, forbye an auld pair o' corduroys. Every letter he wrote me, shewed he was getting mair and mair edication. They had a chaplain on board of the vessel, that was a good gentleman, and very kind to wee Johnny, learnin' him Latin and Greek at his orra hours, beside navigation, and boxing the compass, and astronomy, that they need in their profession as officers. The other parts o' their duty, such as speeling the shrouds, firing off little pistols, and rowing in boats, I've warrand Johnny learned them without troubling the reverend gentleman muckle in the teaching—for he was aye an active kind o' an ettercap, and unco fond o' the pouther—an' as to the climbing, I lost him ae time for a hail day, and fand him, at last, on the outside o' the lum.

The three years at last past ower, an' a letter cam frae him to say, his ship would be at Portsmouth some time in the end of July or beginning o' August. This cam to me in June, and I couldna sleep for thinkin' o' my dear wee Johnny's comin' back to me again. At last I made up my mind I wad gang up myself and receive him when he cam back; for, thinks I, the bit laddie will need some decent person that knows the ways o' the world to tak care o' him, after being sae lang awa' frae the dry land. I telled my resolution to no living; and upon the fifteenth day of July, I took my place in the James Watt steam-boat for London, and intended to tak the coach the minute I got there, and wait at Portsmouth till the Jenny-wave cam hame. Captain Bain, the Captain o' the James Watt steamboat, was a very nice chatty man, and tell'd me in every way how it was best for me to proceed. So, when the ship arrived at Blackwall, I gaed, intill a hackney coach, to the Green Dragon hotel, and was just as happy as if I had been in my ain house. Next morning, I gat into a coach wi' four horses, in a long street called Oxford Street, and was just entering into chat wi' a leddy on the other side, when an ill-fawred man opened the door, and told me he had put my luggage into the boot. I tell'd him I was muckle obliged to him for being sae kind, and was gaun on speaking to my fellow-passenger, when the man interrupted me again, and told me, "he expected me to pay him for his trouble, as he had put the trunk and portmanteau at the very bottom o' the boot, as I was going the whole way thro' to Poachumth."—"Mercifu'! gracious!" cried I, "dinna tak me to ony such place. Tell the coachman not to gang on, on ony account; for I took my place last night for Portsmouth, and paid." The impudent vagabond turned and winkit to a companion beside him, and said something about "queerin' the old Scotch un;" but, thinks I, my birkie, ye'll get the warst o' the queerin' if ye begin till't. The leddy noo telt me I was in the richt coach, and it was only the blackguard's way o' speech. Upon which I was greatly at my ease, and resolved no to gie the insolent rascal a single hawbee. Weel, he threipit on an' on; but I aye pretendit to be deaf, and never answered to all I' beggins; for he didna ask it at a' in a respectable manner. At last he grew to such a pitch of abusing me, that he told me to keep my coppers, as he supposed they would be a fortune to an old skinflint like me in my own beggarly country. Upon which I put my head out o' the window o' the coach, and telt him, says I, "Ye needna laugh at me, ye ill-fawred loon, or speak about beggarly countries, when ye're a beggar yersell, an' wad be a robber too, an' ye had the courage! Gin ye had keepit a creel tongue in yer head, ye wad hae chanced to hae had a siller saxpence in yer pocket! Sirs, who has the best o't noo?" Upon that a great guffaw gat up again' the vagabond; and the coachman crackit his whip, an' away set I, still in a great passion; for ye ken I'm easy angered,

Sir Cristifer; but still it was pleasant to hae saved a sixpence frae such an ill-mannered scoundrel as you, an' so thought the ledly too, for, in the hurry an' stramash, he had forgotten her a'thegither.

I needna tell you any thing about the journey down, but it was a lang way o' gate, and altho' the ither ledly was particular kind, and tell me a' the places, as we passed along the road, I'll no say but at the end o' the day I was very ow'come with sleep. The ither ledly she fell asleep too; but, just when we gat within maybe three miles o' the town, there was the most awfu' firing o' guns that could be. We baith started up in alarm, and the firing still continued boom, booming extraordinar. "Oh it's the French, the weary French!" cries I, for I mindit o' the panick in Edinburgh in the year eighteen hunder and twelve, when a French fleet was reported to be down at the Bass; but my neighbour put me in mind we were at peace with the French, and then she thought it wad maybe be saluting some ither fleet that was coming in frae foreign parts. "It'll be the Jennyveeve," thinks I; "Oh! I hope, meen, they dinna salute wi' cannon-balls, for I hae a nephew in a ship that I'm expecting is coming hame just about this time!"—"Oh no," says she, "be quite easy;" but the guns still gaed on firing far faster than the Castle on the fourth o' June; an' I couldna rest till I fand out the occasion,—so I put my head out o' the window and skirled to the coachman, as loud as I was able—"Coachman!" says I, "what's a' the guns firing for the noo?" The coachman was a very reevil man, as indeed a' the English coaches are, and says he, "It's the Lord fgh Hadmiral, maun, a-kimmin' hower from the Hisle o' Wight." That was our king that is noo; and an awfu' pluffin o' the pouter they made about him. At last I got into the hotel, the George, where the coach stoppit, and they tell me the house was unco croudet, because the Prince was in the town, and a great army o' officers come to wait on him. But after a deal o' do, they said they wad pit me up, and so, after a cup o' tea, me and the ither ledly gaed out to see the town. Every body was fleein' about as if the enemy was at the gate, grand officers wi' their cockit hats, and apalits on their shoulders, and fine leddies walking about. Indeed, we were baith of us very delighted wi the sight. But I maun mak my story short; for, to tell you the truth, I'm no muckle used to the writin', and my fingers are getting unco stiff.

Weel, the next morning I gat up, and after my breakfast, I askit the laird if he could tell me any thing about the Jennyveeve, for I expectit her in about that time. He was a very polite man, and promised, the minute she cam into the "hoffing," which I thought was maybe some part o' the harbour, he would let me know. A' the forenoon I gaed walking about the town, ca'in' every noo and then at the hotel, just to ask about the vessel; but at last I thought I wad gang down to the harbour myself. Weel, the first thing I sees a gentleman wi' a prospect glass in his hand, and, after keekin' through it a lang time, he turned about to his friend, and said, "Jennyveeve in the offing; I know her by her trim." I gaed up till him, and askit if it was really the Jennyveeve frigate, and how far off the part o' the offing was she was in. He tellt me she was just rounding St Helen's, and would be at anchor in two hours. Noo, a thought struck me, I would like to surprise wee Johnny; and as the sea was quite calm, and the day as warm as could be, I agreed wi' a man to tak me out to her in a boat. Away we went through the water, an' amang a' the ships, quite enchantit. I saw the Victory, where Lord Nelson was killed, and she lookit just like a three-story house in Abercromby Place. We sailed, and sailed, and at last we reached the side o' the Jennyveeve. A gentleman lookit over the bannister at the side o' the ship, and I tellt him I wantit him to let me come on board, as I had a friend in the ship, that I was very particular to see. Weel, he gaed awa' for a while, and then he cam back, and in a few minutes a stair was let down, and up I gaed, and fand myself on the floor o' the vessel, standin' beside the gentleman that had spoken to me first. I tellt him who I was, and that I wantit to see wee Johnny Henderson, that was a bit middie in their ship. He said I wad see him belive, but in the meantime he wad introduce me to the captain—a nice, brisk little bustling man, though rather ower much given up to the swearing, he turned out to be. He was standin' on the raised up part o' the floor, giein' his orders, and speakin' to me, a' in the breath. "You want Mr Henderson, I think, madam? excellent young man—highly pleased with him"—and then he said something about the ship. "Oh, I was sure ye wad be that, captain, for I aye brought him up myself wi' the greatest care." The captain laughed and spoke very familiarly, as if we had known ane another for long; but in a while he turned to the gentleman I spoke till, and desired him to send Mr Henderson. The gentleman—he was a lieutenant o' the ship—turned awa' in a moment, but as he passed me to execute the order, I could hear the birkie was humming the tune o' Black-Eyed Susan. Weel, in a short time up cam wee Johnny; but I declare to ye, Mr North—Sir Cristifer, I should say—I wad not hae known him, he was sae changed. He had grown tall and strong, and in naething like the stripling he had been, save in his bonny, wild-looking blue ee;—but when he saw me, and rushed forward and kissed his puir auld auntie, I kent he was the same warm-hearted creatur he used to be—I'll no say but I grat wi' perfect happiness at seein' the lad again—and I think Johnny himsell was unco near the greetin'.

The captain and the ither gentleman had gaen awa, which was very considerate, but they soon cam back again, when they saw us in conversation. "Oh, Johnny," said I, "what a great child ye have grown! the breeks that I mended for ye'll be o' nae use to ye; now, and the sarks'll be perfectly thrown awa." He began to laugh, when I said this, wi' the same wild laugh he used to do at hame; and said, "What! auntie, always thinking about the pence yet?" "It'll maybe be the better for ye some day, if I do; for, if ye're no, I'm greatly changed, a bawbee aye burned a hole in your pocket unco soon." But now began a great blazing awa o' the guns, much the same as the day before; a' the ships gettin' covered up wi' the smoke, but sometimes atwixt twa o' the clouds we could see a boat rowed wi' somebody in't o' great consequence, and some ither boats followin't to keep it company. I telt them it was the Lord High Admiral, the King's brither, seein' the ships; but the captain cried out, it was very unlucky he had not known of it before—but that they must exert themselves noo. Accordingly, he ordered every one to his station, to get the ship in the grandest order, in case the Prince should come on board to inspect her. So for a good while I was left to my ain reflections.

It was just astonishin' to see how nently they gaed about it—a' as quiet an' active as possible, nae clish-na-claver gaun on amang the men, like what ye hear whan a wheenwomen's brushing up a dining-room or washin' a stair. I stood for a lang time, and admired the quickness o' their motions, and the ship at last lookit just like a new preen. The guns in the ither ships were still firin' awa at intervals, and we were very near to them noo, and could see every thing that gaed on. The boat we had seen before, keepit rowin' frae ship to ship, and aye the guns keepit blowing on, till my very een grew sair wi' the winkin'; for it's impossible to keep the een open when such a great thud o' sound comes blash upon yer ear; it was for a' the world just like a skelp on the cheek o' the head. Weel, when I was tired wi' joukin' my head, an awfu' fear cam' upon me, that the guns in our ain ship wad be obligated to be fired; an' I weel kent, that if I wasna killed by the burstin' of the cannons, I wad die o' the fright. So, says I to the captain, "Oh, Captain Pagan, Captain Pagan, do ye think ye'll hae to fire aff the guns o' the ship? It'll just kill me outright." Then he laughed extraordinary, and said, "Fire!" said he; "yes, egad, old Billy's a bluff one, and if we don't give the royal salute, he'll blow us up sky-high!"—"Oh Lord hae a care o' me!" says I, "he wad surely never do such a cruel thing as blow us a' up for no firin' a salute? Oh, they're weary things, thae salutes, baith for auld and young!" I sat down just perfectly overcome wi' my apprehensions, when, to my great delight and astonishment, wee Johnny comes up to me, and tells me, that a flag or signal o' some sort or ither was put up, to gie them to understand that the Lord High Admiral didna want to be saluted; but he wad just come in about half an hour, and see how they were after being three years from home.

Weel pleased, as ye may imagine, was I to hear the news; for I made sure a danger was over; and I couldna help thinkin' how very kind it was in the Prince, no to let the sailors, poor fellows, run the risk o' firing, noo they had come sae near to the shore in safety. But just in the midst of my keekling and rejoicing, up comes wee Johnny again, and tells me, that as the Admiral didna like to see petticoats on board, I must be stowed away into some quiet corner where his Royal Highness wadna see me. Oh! I was willing to gang ony place, I was sae perfectly happy to have escaped the guns. But oh, Sir Crisifier! whar do you think that neer-do-weel callant persuaded me to be hidden? There wasna a single part o' the ship, he said, that the admiral wadna see in a jiffey; he wad gang intill every corner, till no a mouse wad be in the haill of the vessel that he wadna ken whar its hiding-hole was; so, after threeeping and telling me every thing was safe, he just prevailed on me to slip intill aue o' the guns. Weel, he telt me, and swore till't, that no salute was to be fired, and that there was no chance o' my being fund out in such a place as that; and so, at last, in great fear and trembling, I let him lift me up, and put me, feet foremost, into aue o' the cannons at the side o' the ship. Ye ken what a wee jump body I am; and I assure you I've lain in mony a waur situation than yon; I couldna turn myself, to be sure, but I was in safety, and the Prince, they telt me, wadna stay more than twenty minutes. Weel, I hadna been lang in the gun when I heard the patter of oars in the water below where I was; then I heard the boat stop; and syne I heard a great stamping on the floor, or the deck, as they call it in a ship. Then the noise all ceased for maybe a quarter of an hour, and then the stamping began again. And as the party stood very near whar I was, I could even hear a wee o' what they were sayin'. I could just catch a voice nows and thens sayin' somethin' about damnation—an' I was sure frae the rest that I heard, that it was the Prince was speakin'; but the captain gied as good as he got, and spak' a great deal about damnation too; so that really whether they were swearing, as sailors generally are in the habit of doing, or expounding a text, I couldna weel determine; but, however that may, there gat up a great laugh, and the Prince seemed unco weel pleased, by the tone o' his voice. But oh, Mr North!—there, I've forgotten yer teetle again—just fancy my feelings when I heard the captain ask leave to salute his Royal Highness as he went away! Oh dear me, thinks I, I'll be sent fleecin' thro' the air frae the mouth o' a gun! And what sort o' death is that for a decent auld maiden ledly to dee! Oh that I had never set my foot intill a ship! And wi' that I tried to scream to them to stop, but my throat was sae dry I could mak' no sound;—I tried to creep out, and hoped to tumble intill the sea and be drown'd; but I couldna move hand or fit, I was sae jammed intill the gun. And noo, tho' I was mair than half dead, I had a terrible consciousness o' every thing that was gaun on. I heard the party gaun down into their boat; I could fancy I saw them laughing and chatting awa' sae happy and contentit; and there was I, stuck into the mouth o' a gun, ready to be fired awa' in honour o' the Lord High Admiral!!! I thought I could see the very part o' the wall about twa miles aff that I wad reach to, and yet I hadna power to cry out and tell the Prince the jeopardy I was in. But very soon a greater degree o' the fear cam' ower me, for the ship shook and staggered as if a great blow had been hit, and then cam' a roar o' the cannon, and I felt that the bitterness o' death was begun; then gaed aff anither; and then, in the pauses between my ears were preternaturally sharpened, and I heard a voice saying, "Oh, auntie, farewell—but don't be very much alarm'd, for she is not loaded with ball,—and you're a chance of being picked up by the boats." Then gaed aff anither gun, and I felt by the sound they were coming regularly up the row where I was—and then I heard the captain, standing just at the end o' my gun, say to the man that was firing them off—"Here—run out this old jade!" Mercifu' me, could the cauld-hearted vagabond be speakin' that way o' me!"—"Raise up her breech a little, and lay on!"—Here my senses a' thegither forsook me—to be spoken o' in such an undelicate manner before sae mony great starin' menfolk, was waur than being shot out o' the gun; and being perfectly overcome wi' shame and fright, I sank into a dwam. The rest o' the story is very soon told. The vagabonds kent a' the time they were never gaun to fire her aff; but the captain and that good-for-nothin' creatur, wee Johnnie, did it a' for their ain amusement. However, when they gat me out o' the gun, they really behaved sae weel, and made sae mony kind speeches about it, that I couldna find it in my heart to be angry. So I just forgied them baith; but if ever ony body catches me playing hide-and-seek in the body o' a gun, they've my free leave to fire it aff, and send me fleein' to the back o' Beyont. And noo, Sir Cristifer, I hae gien ye the account o' my adventure, that ye wantet. Ye maun mak a' allowances for the spelling and the language o' this account; for the real truth o' the matter is, that if I tak' either to writin' or speakin' o' the English, I diinna come nearly sae good a hand as when I think and write in my ain native tongue. So, wi' best wishes to yourself, and to Mrs G. the next time ye see her, I remain,

My dear Sir Cristifer,
Your affectionate friend and
weel wisher,

We might be happy; but this clay will sink
Its spark immortal.

BYRON

RETURNS, my thoughts, come home!
Ye wild and wing'd! what do ye o'er the deep?
And wherefore thus th' Abyss of Time o'ersweep,
As bid the ocean-foam?

Swifter than shooting star,
Swifter than lances of the northern light,
Upspringing through the purple heaven of night,
Hath been your course afar!

Through the bright battle-clime,
Where laurel-boughs make dim the Grecian streams,
And reeds are whispering of heroic themes,
By temples of old Time:

Through southern garden-bowers,
Such as young Juliet look'd from, when her eye,
Fill'd with the fervid soul of Italy,
Watch'd for the starry hour:

Through the North's ancient halls,
Where banners thrill'd of yore, where harp-strings rung,
But grass waves now o'er those that fought and sung—
Hearth-light hath left their walls!

Through forests old and dim,
Where o'er the leaves dread magic seems to brood,
And sometimes on the haunted solitude,
Rises the pilgrim's hymn:

Or where some fountain lies,
With lotus-cups through orient spice-woods gleaming!
There have ye been, ye wanderers! idly dreaming
Of man's lost paradise!

Return, my thoughts, return!
Cares wait your presence in life's daily track,
And voices, not of music, call you back;
Harsh voices, cold and stern!

Oh! no, return ye not!
Still farther, loftier, let your soarings be!
Go, bring me strength from journeyings bright and free,
O'er many a haunted spot.

Go, seek the martyr's grave,
'Midst the old mountains, and the deserts vast;
Or through the ruin'd cities of the past,
Follow the wise and brave!

Go, visit cell and shrine!
Where woman hath endured!—through wrong, through scorn,
Uncheer'd by fame, yet silently upborne
By promptings more divine!

Go, shoot the gulf of death!
Track the pure spirits where no chain can bind,
Where the heart's boundless love its rest may find,
Where the storm sends no breath!

Higher, and yet more high!
Shake off the cumbering chain which earth would lay
On your victorious wings—mount, mount!—Your way
Is through eternity!

THE NECROMANCER.

BY MRS HEWANS.

Shall I make spirits fetch me what I please?
Resolve me of all ambiguities?
Perform what desperate enterprises I will?
I'll have them fly to India for gold,
Ransack the ocean for orient pearl,
And search all corners of the New-found World
For pleasant fruits and princely delicacies.

MARLOW'S Franklin.

As old man on his deathbed lay, an old yet stately man;
His lip seem'd moulded for command, tho' quivering now, and wan;
By fits a wild and wandering fire shot from his troubled eye,
But his pale brow still austere wore its native mastery.

There were gorgeous things from land afar, strewn round the mystic room;
From where the orient palm-trees wave, bright gem and dazzling plume;
And vases with rich odour fill'd, that o'er the couch of death
Shed forth, like groves from Indian isles, a spicy summer's breath.

And sculptured forms of olden time, in their strange beauty white,
Stood round the chamber solemnly, robed as in ghostly light;
All passionless and still they stood, and shining through the gloom,
Like watchers of another world, stern angels of the tomb.

"'Twas silent as a midnight church, that dim and mystic place,
While shadows cast from many thoughts, o'erswept the old man's face;
He spoke at last, and low and deep, yet piercing was the tone,
To one that o'er him long had watch'd, in reverence and alone.

"I leave," he said, "an empire dread, by mount, and shore, and sea,
Wider than Roman Eagle's wing e'er traversed proudly free;
Never did King or Kaiser yet such high dominion boast,
Or Soldan of the sunbeam's clime, girt with a conquering host.

"They hear me, they that dwell far down where the sea-serpent lies,
And they, th' unseen, on Afric's hills, that sport when tempests rise;
And they that rest in central caves, whence fiery streams make way,
My lightest whisper shakes ~~their~~ sleep, they hear me, and obey.

"They come to me with ancient wealth—with crown and cup of gold,
From cities roof'd with ocean-waves, that buried them of old;
They come from Earth's most hidden veins, which man shall never find,
With gems that have the hues of fire deep at their heart enshrined.

"But a mightier power is on me now—it rules my struggling breath;
I have sway'd the rushing elements—but still and strong is Death!
I quit my throne, yet leave I not my vassal-spirits free—
Thou hast brave and high aspirings, youth!—my Sceptre is for thee!

"Now listen! I will teach thee words whose mastery shall compel
The viewless ones to do thy work, in wave, or blood, or hell!
But never, never mayst thou breathe those words in human ear, Until thou'rt laid, as I am now, the grave's dark portals near."

His voice in faintness died away—and a sudden flush was seen,
A manding of the rapid blood o'er the youth's impassion'd mien,
A mantling and a fading swift—a look with sadness fraught—
And that too pass'd—and boldly then rush'd forth the ardent thought.

"Must those high words of sovereignty ne'er sound in human ear?
I have a friend—a noble friend—as life or freedom dear!
Thou offerest me a glorious gift—a proud majestic throne,
But I know the secrets of his heart—and shall I seal mine own?

"And there is one that loves me well, with yet a gentle love—
Oh! is not her full, boundless faith, all power, all wealth above?
Must a deep gulf between the souls—now closely link'd—be set?
Keep, keep the Sceptre!—leave me free, and loved, and trustful yet!"

Then from the old man's haughty lips was heard the sad reply—
"Well hast thou chosen!—I blame thee not—I that unwept must die
Live, thou beloved, and trustful yet!—No more on human head,
Be the sorrows of unworthy gifts from bitter vials shed!"

Scow, the Smuggery—Time, Now—Present, NORTH, SHEPHERD, and TICKLER.

TICKLER.

CENTAU! No more like a centaur, James, than he is like a whale. Ducrow is not "demi-corpsed"—as Shakespeare said of Laertes—with what he bestrides; how could he, with half-a-dozen horses at a time? If the blockheads will but look at a centaur, they will see that he is not six horses and one man, but one manhorse or horseman, galloping on four feet, with one tail, and one face much more humane than either of ours—

SHEPHERD.

Confine yourself to your ain face, Mr Tickler. A centaur wou'd hae sma' diffeeculty in ha'in' a face mair humane nor yours, sir—for it's mair like the face o' Notus or Eurus nor a Christian's; but as for ma face, sir, it's meeker and milder than that o' Charon himsell—

NORTH.

Chiron, James.

SHEPHERD.

Weel then, Cheeron be't—when he was instillin' wisdom, music, and heroism intil the sowle o' Achilles, him that afterwards grew up the maist beautifu' and dreadfu' o' a' the sons o' men.

TICKLER.

The glory of Ducrow lies in his Poetical Impersonations. Why, the horse is but the air, as it were, on which he flies! What godlike grace in that volant motion, fresh from Olympus, e'er yet "new-lighted on some heaven-kissing hill!" What seems "the feather'd Mercury" to care for the horse, whose side his toe but touches, as if it were a cloud in the ether? As the flight accelerates, the animal absolutely disappears, if not from the sight of our bodily eye, certainly from that of our imagination, and we behold but the messenger of Jove, worthy to be joined in marriage with Iris.

SHEPHERD.

I'm no just sae poetical's you, Mr Tickler, when I'm at the Circus; and ma bodily een, as ye ca' them, that's to say, the een, ane on ilka side o' ma nose, are far ow'rægleg ever to lose sight o' yon bonny din meere.

NORTH.

A dun mare, worthy indeed to waft Green Turban,

"Far descended of the Prophet line," across the sands of the Desert.

VOL. XXIX. NO. CLXXVI.

R

SHEPHERD.

Ma verra thoct! As she flew round like lichtnin', the saw-dust o' the Amphitheatre becam the sand-dust o' Arawbia—the heave-doomed region, for ever and aye, o' the sons o' Ishmael.

TICKLER.

Gentlemen, you are forgettin' Ducrow.

SHEPHERD.

Na. It's only you that's forgettin' the diu meere. His Mercury's beautiful; but his Glawdiawtor's shoo-blime.

TICKLER.

Roman soldier you mean, James.

SHEPHERD.

Haud your tongue, Tickler! Isna a Roman sodger a Glawdiawtor? Does na the verra word, Glawdiawtor, come frae the Latin for sword? Nae wunner the Romans conquer'd a' the warld, gin a' their sodgers fought like you! Sune as Ducrow tyeuck his attetud, as steadfast on the steed as on a stane, there ye beheld, stamin' afore you, wi' helmet, sword, and buckler, the cennage o' a warriour-king! The hero looked as gin he were about to engage in single combat wi' some hero o' the tither side—some giant Gaul—perhaps himsell a king—in slecht o' baith armies—and by the eagle-crest cou'd ye hae sword, that sune wou'd the barbaric host be in panic-slicht. What ither man o' woman born cou'd sustain sic strokes, deliver'd wi' sovereign might and sovereign majesty, as if Mats himsell had descended in mortal guise, to be the champion o' his ain eternal city!

NORTH.

Ma verra thoct!

SHEPHERD.

Your thoct! you bit puir, useless, trillin' cretur!—As your pardon, sa—for really, in the enthusiasm o' the moment, I had forgotten wha's vice it was, and thoct it was Mr Tickler's.

TICKLER.

Who's?

SHEPHERD.

Sit still, sir. I wunner gin the Romans, in battle, used, like our sodgers, to cry, "Huzzaw, huzzaw, huzzaw!"

NORTH.

We learned it from them, James. And ere all was done, we became their masters in that martial vociferation. Its echoes frightened them at last among the Grampians; and they set sail from unconquered Caledon.

SHEPHERD.

What a bluidy beatin' Galgacus gied Agricola!

NORTH.

He did so indeed, James—yet see how that fellow, his son-in-law, Tacitus, lies like a bulletin. He swears the Britons lost the battle.

SHEPHERD.

Haw, haw, haw! What? I've been at the verra spat—and the tradition's as fresh as if it had been but the verra day after the battle, that the Romans were cut aff till a man.

NORTH.

Not one escaped?

SHEPHERD.

Deevil the ane—the hills, whar the chief carnage rotted, are greener nor the lave till this hour. Nae white clover grows there—nae white daisies—wud you believe me, sir, they're a' red. The life-draps seepit through the grun'—and were a body to dig down far enouch, wha kens but he wou'dna come to coagulated gore, strengthening the soil aneath, till it sends up showers o' thae sanguinary zowans and clover, the product o' inextinguishable Roman bluid?

TICKLER.

The Living Statues!

NORTH.

Perfect. The very Prometheus of Æschylus. Oh! James! what high and profound Poetry was the Poetry of the world of old! To steal fire from heaven—what a glorious conception of the soul in its consciousness of immortality!

SHEPHERD.

And what a glorious conception o' the sowle, in its consciousness o' immortality, o' Divine Justice! O the mercy o' Almichty Jove! To punish the Fire-stealer by fastenin' him down to a rock, and sendin' a vultur to prey on his liver—perpetually to keep prey—preyin' on his pair liver—sirs—waur even nor the worm that never dees—or if no waur, at least as ill—rug—ruggin', gnaw—gnawin', tear—tearin', howk—howkin', at his meeserable liver aye wanin' and aye waxin' aneath that unpacified beak—that beak noo cuttin' like a knife, noo clippin' like shissors, noo chirtin like pinchers, noo hagglin' like a cleaver! A' the while the body o' the glorious sinner bun' needlessly till a rock-block—needlessly bun', I say, sirs, for stirless is Prometheus in his endurance o' the doom he dees, as if he were but a Stane-eemage, or aye o' the unsufferin' dead!

NORTH.

A troubled mystery!

SHEPHERD.

Ane amaisit fears to pity him, lest we wrang fortitude sae majestical. Yet see, it stirs! Ha! 'twas but the vultur. Prometheus himself is still—in the micht, think ye, sirs, o' curse or prayer? Oh! yonner's just ae single slight shudder—as the demon, to get a stronger purchase at his food, takes up new grun wi' his tawlous, and gies a fluff and a flap wi' his huge wings again' the ribs o' his victim, utterin'—was't horrid fancy?—a gurglin' throat-croak choked savagely in bluid!

NORTH.

The Spirit's triumph over Pain, that reaches but cannot pierce its core—

“In Pangs sublime, magnificent in Death!”

TICKLER.

Life in Death! Exultation in Agony! Earth victorious over Heaven! Prometheus bound in manglings on a sea-cliff, more godlike than Jove himself, when “Nata tremefecit Olympum!”

SHEPHERD.

Natur victorious owre the verra Fate her ain imagination had creawted! And in the dread confusion o' her superstitious dreams, glorifying the passive magnanimity o' man, far ayont the active vengeance o' the highest o' her gods! A wild bewilderment, sirs, that ought to convince us, that nae licht can ever be thrown on the moral government that reigns ower the region o' human life—nae licht that's no mair astoundin' than the blackness o' darkness—but that o' Revelation that ae day or ither shall illumine the uttermost parts o' the earth.

NORTH.

Noble. These Impersonations by Ducrow, James, prove that he is a man of genius.

SHEPHERD.

Are they a' his ain inventions, sir?

NORTH.

Few or none. Why, if they were, he would be the greatest of sculptors. But thus to convert his frame into such forms—shapes—attitudes—postures—as the Greek imagination moulded into perfect expression of the highest states of the soul—that, James, shews that Ducrow has a spirit kindred to those who in marble made their mythology immortal.

SHEPHERD.

That's bonny—na, that's gran'. It gars a body grue—just like aye o' thae lines in poetry that suddenly dirls through you—just like ae smite on a single string by a master's hann' that gars shiver the hail harp.

TICKLER.

Ducrow was not so successful in his Apollo.

NORTH.

'Twas the Apollo of the painters, Tickler; not of the sculptors.

TICKLER.

True. But why not give us the Belvidere?

NORTH.

I doubt if that be in the power of mortal man. But even were Ducrow to shew us that statue with the same perfection that crowns all his other impersonations, unless he were to stand for hours before us, we should not feel, to the full, its divine majesty; for in the marble it grows and grows upon us as our own spirits dilate, till the Sun-god at last almost commands our belief in his radiant being, and we hear ever the fabled Python groan!

TICKLER.

Yes, North, our emotion is progressive—just as the worshipper, who seeks the inner shrine, feels his adoration rising higher and higher at every step he takes up the magnificent flight in front of the temple.

SHEPHERD.

Na, na, na—this 'll never do. It's manifest that you twa hae entered intil a combination again' me, and are remain' ower me wi' your set speeches, a' written doon, and gotten aff the licht afore, to dumbfounder the Shepherd. What bit o' paper's that, Mr Tickler, keekin' out o' the pocket o' your vest? Notts. Notts in short haun'—and a' the time you was pretendin' to be crunklin' up to licht the tip o' your segawr, hae you been cleekin' haud o' the catch-word—and that's the gate you deceive the Snuggery intil admiration o' your extemporaneous eeloquence! The secret's out noo—an' I wunner it was never blawn afore; for, noo that ma een are opened, they set till richts ma lugs; and on considerin' hoo matters used to staun' in the past, I really canna charge ma memory wi' a mair feckless cretur than yoursell at a reply.

NORTH.

You do me cruel injustice, James—were I to prepare a single paragraph, I should stick—

SHEPHERD.

Oh! man, hoo I wou'd enjoy to see you stick! stickin' a set speech in a ha' fu' o' admirin', that is, wunnerin' hunders o' your fellow-citizens, on Parliamentary Reform, for instance, or Slavery in the West Indies, or—

NORTH.

The supposition, sir, is odious; I—

SHEPHERD.

No in the least degree odious, sir—but superlatively absurd, and ludicrous far ayont the boun's o' lauchter—except that lauchter that torments a' the inside o' a listener and looker-on, an internal earthquake that convulses a body frae the pow till the paw, frae the fingers till the feet, till a' the pent-up power o' risibility bursts out through the mouth, like the lang-smouldering fire vomited out o' the crater o' a volcano, and then the astonished warld hears, for the first time, what heaven and earth acknowledge by their echoes to be indeed—a Guffaw!

NORTH.

James, you are getting extremely impertinent.

SHEPHERD.

Nae personality, sir; nae personality shall be allow'd, in ma presence at least, at a Noctes. That's to say, nae personality towards the persons present—for as to a' the rest o' the warld, men, women, and children, I carena though you personally insult, ane after anither, a' the human race.

NORTH.

I insult?

SHEPHERD.

Yes—you insult. Haena ye made the haill civilizeed warld your enemy by that tongue and that pen o' yours, that spares neither age nor sect?

NORTH.

I???

SHEPHERD.

You!!!

TICKLER.

Come, come, gentlemen, remember where you are, and in whose presence you are sitting; but look here—here is the

APOLLO BELVIDERE.

(TICKLER is transformed into Apollo Belvidere.)

SHEPHERD.

That's no canny.

NORTH.

In his lip "what beautiful disdain!"

SHEPHERD.

As if he were smellin' at a rotten egg.

NORTH.

There "the Heavenly Archer stands."

SHEPHERD.

I wadna counsel him to shoot for the Guse Medal. Henry Watson wou'd ding him till sticks.

NORTH.

I remember, James, once hearing an outrageous dispute between two impassioned connoisseurs, amateurs, men of vertu, cognoscenti, dilettanti, about this very Apollo Belvidere.

SHEPHERD.

Confoun' me, gin he's no monstrous like marble! His verra claes seem to hae drapp'd aff him—and I've no pit on my specs, for fear he should pruve to be naked.—What was the natur o' the dispoot?

NORTH.

Simply whether Apollo advanced his right or left foot——

SHEPHERD.

Ane o' the disputants maun hae been a great fule. Shou'dna Apollo pit his best fit foremost, that is the right ane, on such an occasion as shootin' a Preethon? Hut-tut—Stop a wee—let's consider. Na, it maun be the left fit foremost—unless he was kerr-hann'd. Let's try't.

(The SHEPHERD rises, and puts himself into the attitude of the Apollo Belvidere—insensibly transforming himself into another TICKLER of a shorter and stouter size.)

NORTH.

I could believe myself in the Louvre, before Mrs Hemans wrote her beautiful poem on the Restoration of the Works of Art to Italy. Were the two brought to the hammer, an auctioneer might knock them down for ten thousand pounds each.

SHEPHERD.

Whilk of us is the maist Appollonic, sir?

NORTH.

Why, James, you have the advantage of Tickler, in being, as it were, in the prime of youth—for though by the parish register you have passed the sixtieth year-stone on the road of life, you look as fresh as if you had not finished the first stage.

SHEPHERD.

Do you hear that, Mr Tickler?

NORTH.

You have also most conspicuously the better of Mr Tickler in the article of hair. Yours are locks—his leeks.

SHEPHERD.

Mr Tickler, are you as deaf and dumb's a statute, as weel's as stiff?

NORTH.

As to features, the bridge of Tickler's nose—begging his pardon—is of too prominent a build. The arch reminds me of the old bridge across the Esk, at Musselburgh.

SHEPHERD.

What say you to that, Mr Tickler?

NORTH.

" 'Tis mair an antique Roman than a'——"

SHEPHERD.

Mr Tickler?

NORTH.

But neither is the nose of the gentle Shepherd pure Grecian.

TICKLER.

Pure Peebles?

SHEPHERD.

Oho! You've fun' the use o' your tongue.

NORTH.

Of noses so extremely——

SHEPHERD.

Mine's, I ken, 's a cockit ane. Oor mooths?

NORTH.

Why, there, I must say, gentlemen, there's a wide opening for——

TICKLER.

Don't blink the buck-teeth.

SHEPHERD.

Better than nane ava'.

NORTH.

Of Tickler's attitude I should say generally—that is—— (Here TICKLER reassumes SOUTHSIDE, and taking the Snuggery at a stride, usurps THE CHAIR, and outstretches himself to his extreme length, with head leaning on the ridge, and his feet some yards off on the fender.

SHEPHERD (leaping about.)

Huzzaw—huzzaw—huzzaw!—I've beaten him at Apollo! Noo for Pan.

(The SHEPHERD performs Pan in a style that would have subdued Pomona.

TICKLER.

Aye—that's more in character.

NORTH.

Sufficient, certainly, to frighten an army.

TICKLER.

The very picture of our Popular Devil.

NORTH.

Say rather, with Wordsworth——

“Pan himself,

The simple shepherd's awe-inspiring god.”

SHEPHERD.

Keep your een on me—keep your een on me—and you'll soon see a change that will strike you wi' astonishment. But rax me owre the poker, Mr North—rax me owre the poker.

(NORTH puts the poker into Pan's paws, and instantler he is Hercules.

TICKLER (clapping his hands.)

Bravo! Bravissimo!

NORTH.

I had better remove the crystal. (Wheels the circular closer to the hearth.) James, remember the mirror.

TICKLER.

At that blow dies the Nemean lion.

(The SHEPHERD, flinging down the poker-club, seems to drag up the carcass of the Monster with a prodigious display of muscularity, and then stooping his neck, heaves it over his head, as into some profound abyss.

NORTH.

Ducrow's Double!

SHEPHERD (proudly.)

Say rather the Dooble, that's Twa, o' Ducraw. Ducraw's nae mair fit to ack Hercules wi' me, than he is to ack Sampson.

I believe it.

TICKLER.

SHEPHERD.

I cou'd tell ye a droll story about me and Mr Ducraw. Ae nicht I got intil an argument wi' him at the Caffee, about the true scriptral gate o' aekin' the Fear o' the Philistines, and I was pressin' him gaeu hard aboot his method o' puin' doon the pillars, when he turns aboot upon me—and bein' putten o' his metal—says, “Mr Hogg, why did not you object to my representing in one scene—and at one time—Sampson carrying away the gates of Gaza, and also pullin' down the pillars?”

NORTH.

There he had you on the hip, James.

SHEPHERD.

I hadna a word to say for't—but confessed at aince that it's just the way o' a' critics wha stumble ower molehills, and yet mak naething o' moun-tains. The truth is, that a' us that are maisters in the fine arts, kens ilka ane respectively about his ain art a thoosan' times mair nor ony possible body else—and I thoct on the pedant lecturin' Hannibal on war, or ony ither pedant me on poetry, or ~~on~~ Cecilia on music, or Christopher North on literatur, or Sir Isaac Newton on the stars, or——

NORTH.

Now, James, that you may not say that I ever sulkily or sullenly refuse to contribute my quota of “weel-timed daffin” to the Noctes—behold me in

HERCULES FURESS.

(North off with coat and waistcoat in a jiffy, and goes to work.)

SHEPHERD.

That's fearsome! Dinna tear your shirt to rags—dinna tear your shirt to rags, sir!

TICKLER.

The poison searches his marrow-bones now!

SHEPHERD.

His bluid's liquid fire!

TICKLER.

Lava.

SHEPHERD.

Linens is cheap the noo, to be sure—dinna tear your shirt, sir—dinna tear your shirt. What pains maun a' that shuin' on the breest and collar hae cost Mrs Gentle!

TICKLER.

O Dejanira! Dejanira! Dejanira!

SHEPHERD.

That out-hercules's Hercules! Foamin' at the mooth like a mad-dowg! The Epilepsy! The quiverin' o' his hauns! The whites o' his een, noo flickerin' and noo uxed! Oh! dire mishapen lauchter, drawin' his mooth awa up along the tae side o' his face, owtowre till ane o' his lugs! Puir Son o' Alknook!

TICKLER.

Alcmena, James.

SHEPHERD.

A' his labours are near an end noo! A' the fify, if crooded and cram-med intil ane, no sae terrible as the last! Loup—loup—loup—tumble—tumble—tumble—sprawl—sprawl—sprawl—row—row—row—roun' aboot—roun' aboot—roun' about—like an axle-tree—then ae sudden streek out intil a' his length, and there lies he straught, stiff, and stark, after the dead-thraws, like a guarled oak-trunk that had kept knottin' for a thoosan' years.

TICKLER.

But for an awkward club-foot too much, would I exclaim, “Cedite Romani imitatores! Cedite Graii.”

SHEPHERD (raising NORTH from the floor.)

Do you ken, sir, you fairly tyenck me in—and I'm a' in a trummle. It's like Boaz frichtenin' Ingleby wi' his ain ba's.

NORTH.

Rather hot work, my dear James. I'm beginning to perspire.

SHEPHERD (feeling NORTH's forehead.)

Beginnin' till perspire!! Never afore, in this weary world, was a man in sic an even-doon poor o' sweet! A perspiration-fa'! The same wi' your breest! What? You cou'dna hae been watter had you stood after a thunder-plump for an hoor unner a roan.

NORTH.

Say spout, James, roan is vulgar—it is Scotch—and your English is so pure now, that a word like that grates harshly on the ear, so that, were you in England, you would undeceive and alarm the natives. But let us recur to the subject under spirited discussion immediately before Raphael's Dream—I mean the Jug.

SHEPHERD.

Let us come our wa's until the fire.

(The Thrie are again seated at "the wee bit ingle blinking bonnily.")

NORTH.

Where were we?

SHEPHERD.

On aye. I was beginnin' to pent a pictur o' you, sir, stickin' a speech on Slavery or Reform. Slowly you rise—and at the uprisin' "o' the auld man eloquent" hushed is that assemblage as sleep. But wide awake are a' een—a' fixed on Christopher North, the orator o' the human race.

TICKLER.

As is usual to say on such occasions—you might hear a pin fall—say a needle, which, having no head, falls lighter.

SHEPHERD.

He begins laigh, and wi' a dimness in and around his een—a kind o' halo, sic as obscures the moon afore a storm. But sune his vice gets louder and louder, musical at its tapmost richt, as the breath o' a silver trumpet. Action he has little or none—noo and then the richt haun' on the heart, and the left arm at richt angles till the body—just sae—like Mr Pitt's—only this far no like Mr Pitt's—for there's nae sense in that—no up and doon like the haunle o' a well-pump. What reasin'! What imagination! Fancy free and fertile as an auld green flowery lea! Pathos pure as dew—and wit bricht as the rinnin' waters, translucent

"At touch ethereal o' heaven's fiery rod"

TICKLER.

Spare his blushes, Shepherd, spare his blushes.

SHEPHERD.

Wae's me—pity on him—but I canna spare his blushes—sae, sir, just hang doon your head a wee, till I conclude. In the verra middle o' a lang train o' ratiocination—(I'm gratefu' for havin' gotten through that word)—surrounded, ahint and afore, and on a' sides, wi' countless series o' syllogisms—in the very central heart o' a forest o' Aegurs, containin' many a garden o' flowers o' speech—within sight, nay amaisht within touch, o' the feenal cleemax, at which the assemblage o' livin' sowles were a' waitin' to break oot intil thunder, like the waves o' the sea impatient for the first smiting o' a storm seen afar on the main—at that verra crisis and agony o' his fame, Christopher is seized wi' a sudden stupification o' the head and a' his faculties, his brain whirls dizzily roun', as if he were a' at aince waukenin' out o' a dream, at the edge o' a precipice, or on a "coign o' disadvantage," outside the battlements o' a cloud-capt tower; his eyes get bewildered, his cheeks wax white, struck seems his tongue wi' palay, he stutters—stutters—stutters—and "of his stutterin' finds no end" till—HE STICKS!

TICKLER.

Fast as a waggon mired up to the axle-tree, while Roger, with the loosened team, steers his course back to the farm-stead, with arms a-kimbo on old Smiler's rump.

SHEPHERD.

He fents! a cry for cauld spring-water—

NORTH (frowning.)

Hark ye—when deroid of all probability—nay, at war with possibility—Fiction is falsehood, fun folly, mirth mere maundering, humour forsooth! idiocy, would-be wit “wersh as parritch without saut,” James a merry-Andrew, and the Shepherd—sad and sorry am I to say it—a Buffoon!

SHEPHERD.

Haw! haw! haw! O man, but you're angry. It's aye the way o't. Them that's aye tryin' ineffecktwally to make a fule o' ithers, when the tables are turned on them, gang red-wud-stark-staring mad a' thegither, and scarcely leave theirsells the likeness o' a dowg. But forgie me, sir—forgie me—I concur wi' you that the description was naething but a tissue—as you hae sae reevily and coortusly said—o' fausehood, folly, maunderin' idiocy, and wersh parritch—

TICKLER.

James a merry-Andrew, and the Shepherd a Buffoon.

SHEPHERD.

Dimna “louse your tinkler jaw, sir,” as Burns said o' Charlie Fox, on me, Mr Tickler—for I'll no thole frae you a tithe, Timothy, o' what I'll enjoy frae Mr North—an' it's no twice in the towmount I ventur to ca' him Kit. Oh! my dear freen, Mr North, do you ken, sir, that in lookin' owre some sax-year auld accounts—

TICKLER.

Paid?

SHEPHERD.

No by you at least—for a bill o' butter for smearin', what shou'd come till haun but a sort o' droll attempt at a sang by that dead facetious fallow, the late Bishop o' Bristol.

TICKLER.

Scotty!

SHEPHERD.

Doctor Scott!

TICKLER.

The Doctor!

NORTH.

The Odontist!

SHEPHERD.

Puir Pultusky!

NORTH.

A simple soul!

SHEPHERD.

Amast an Innocent! Yet what wut! Here it is—for his sake I'll chant it affetuous—amast lakrinoso—for I see the Doctor sitting afore me as distinct in his drollness, as if in the flesh.

THE FIVE CHAMPIONS OF MAGA,

A SONG BY THE LATE DR SCOTT.

(As sung by the Ettrick Shepherd, at the Noctes Ambrosianæ, with the usual applause.)

I.

THERE once was an Irishman, and he was very fat;
He wore a wig upon his head, and on his wig a hat;
The Cockneys, in his presence, ceased to gibe at North and Hogg, sir,
Because he gave them blarney, and bother'd them with brogue, sir.

Och! by my soul, this Irishman most sturdily attack would,
Whoever dared to sport his chaff, or run a-muck at Blackwood.

II.

There once was a Scotchman, and he was very lean;
A prettier man in philibegs was nowhere to be seen:
For fighting in the cause of Kit, he was a perfect satyr;
Upon the Whiggish ranks he rush'd, and spilt their blood like water;
Though wanting "inexpressibles," he constantly attack would,
With fury inexpressible, the enemies of Blackwood.

III.

There once was an Englishman, and he was very short;
For every mutton-chop he ate, he swigg'd a quart of port.
Of Tickler, Mullion, North and Hogg, he did nought but dream all night, sir,
And in the daytime, for their cause, he nothing did but fight, sir.
Whigs, Cockneys, Revolutionists, he furiously attack would,
And floor them with his bunch of fires—this champion stout of Blackwood.

IV.

There once was a Welshman, and he was very tall,
When North's opponents heard his voice, they look'd out for a squall:
In Maga's cause he was as fierce as General Napper-Tandy:
All foemen were alike to him—the bully or the dandy—
He thrash'd them right, he thrash'd them left, their burdies he attack would,
With Christopher's own potent knout—in honour all of Blackwood.

V.

There once was a Yankey, and he was very sage,
Who 'gainst the toes of Christopher a bloody war did wage.
Those who his rifle to escape were so exceeding lucky,
Ran off, I guess, and hid themselves in Erie and Kentucky.
The Cherokees and Chickasaws he furiously attack would,
And shoot their chiefs and kiss their squaws, if they spoke ill of Blackwood.

NORTH.

Next time you pay me a visit, James, at No. 99—I'll shew you THE PICTURE.

SHEPHERD.

I unnerstan you, sir—Titian's Venus—or is't his Danaw yielding to her yellow Jupiter victorious in a shower o' gold? O the selfish hizzie!

NORTH.

James, such subjects—

SHEPHERD.

You had better, sir, no say anither syllable about them—it may answer verra weel for an auld bachelor like you, sir, to keep that sort o' a serawlio, naked limmers in ilea, a shame to ony honest canvass, whatever may have been the genius o' the Penter that sent them sprawling here; but as for me, I'm a married man, and—

NORTH.

My dear James, you are under a gross delusion—

SHEPHERD.

It's nae delusion. Nae pictur o' the sort, na no e'en altho' ane o' the greatest o' the auld Maisters, sall ever hang on ma wa's—I should be ashamed to look the servant lasses in the face when they come in to sweep the floor or ripe the ribs—

NORTH (rising with dignity.)

No picture, sir, shall ever hang on my walls, on which her eye might not dwell—

SHEPHERD.

Mrs Gentle! a bit dainty body—wi' a' the modesty, and without ony o' the demureness, o' the Quaker leddie; and as for yon pictur o' her aboon the brace-piece o' your Sanctum, by Sir Thomas Lawrence——

NORTH.

John Watson Gordon, if you please, my dear James.

SHEPHERD.

It has the face o' an angel.

NORTH (sitting down with dignity.)

I was about to ask you, James, to come and see my last work—my master-piece—my chef-d'œuvre——

SHEPHERD.

The soobjeck?

NORTH.

The Defence of Socrates.

SHEPHERD.

A noble soobjeck indeed, sir, and weel adapted for your high intellectual and moral genie.

NORTH.

My chief object, James, has been to represent the character of Socrates. I have conceived of that character, as one in which unshaken strength of high and clear Intellect—and a moral Will fortified against all earthly trials—sublime and pure—were both subordinate to the principle of Love.

SHEPHERD.

Gude, sir—gude. He was the Freen' o' Man.

NORTH.

I felt a great difficulty in my art, James—from the circumstances purely historical—that neither the figure nor the countenance of Socrates were naturally commanding——

SHEPHERD.

An' hae ye conquered it to your satisfaction, sir?

NORTH.

I have. Another difficulty met me too, James, in this—that in his mind there was a cast of intellect—a play of comic wit—inseparable from his discourse—and which must not be forgotten in any representation of it.

SHEPHERD.

Profoond as true.

NORTH.

To give dignity and beauty to the expression of features, and a figure of which the form was neither dignified nor beautiful, was indeed a severe trial for the power of art.

SHEPHERD.

An' hae you conquered it too, sir?

NORTH.

Most successfully. In the countenance, therefore, my dear James, to answer to what I have assigned as the highest principle in the character, Love, there is a prevailing character of gentleness—the calm of that unalterable mind has taken the appearance of a celestial serenity—an expression caught, methinks, from the peaceful heart of the unclouded sky brooding in love over rejoicing nature.

SHEPHERD.

That's richt, sir.

NORTH.

Such expression I have breathed over the forehead, the lips, and the eyes; yet is there not wanting either the grandeur, nor the fire, nor the power of intellect, nor the boldness of conscious innocence.

SHEPHERD.

I'll come and see't, sir, the morn'g mornin', afore breakfast. Fowre eggs.

NORTH.

That one purpose I have pursued and fulfilled by the expression of all the Groups in the piece.

SHEPHERD.

Naething in pentin' kitter than groopin'.

NORTH.

You behold a prevalent expression of Love in the countenance of his friends and followers—of love greater than even reverence, admiration, sorrow, anxiety, and fear!

SHEPHERD.

Though dootless a' thae emotions, too, will be expressed—and familiar hae thae been to you, sir, through the coorse o' a strangely checkquered though not unhappy life.

NORTH.

Then, too, James, have I had to express—and I have expressed it—the habitual character belonging to many there—besides the expression of the moment; countenances of generous, loving, open-souled youth; middle-aged men of calm benign aspect, but not without earnest thought; and not unobscured, one aged man, James, almost the counterpart of Socrates himself, only without his high intellectual power, a face composed, I may almost say, of peace, the only one of all perfectly untroubled.

SHEPHERD.

That's an expressive thought, sir—and it's original—that's to say, it never occurred to me afore you mentioned it.

NORTH.

He, like Socrates, reconciled to that certain death, familiar with the looks of the near term of life, and not without hopes beyond it.

SHEPHERD.

Believed thae sages, think ye, sir, in the immortality o' the sowle?

NORTH.

I think, James, that they did—assuredly Socrates.

SHEPHERD.

I'm glad o't for their sakes, though they hae a' been dead for thousands o' years.

NORTH.

Then, James, how have I managed his Judges?

SHEPHERD.

Hoo?

NORTH.

In all their faces, with many expressions, there is one expression—answering to the predominant disposition assigned to the character of Socrates—the expression of Malignity towards Love.

SHEPHERD.

You've hit it, sir: you've hit it. Here's your health.

NORTH.

An expression of malignity in some almost lost on a face of timidity, fear, or awe, in others blended almost brutally with impenetrable ignorance.

SHEPHERD.

That comes o' studyin' the Passions. I think but little noo o' Collins's Odd.

NORTH.

Then, James, I have given the countenances of the people.

SHEPHERD.

A fickle people—ever ready to strike doon offensive Virtue—and ever as ready to shed tears o' overactin' remorse on her ashes!

NORTH.

In the countenances of the people, James, I have laboured long, but succeeded methinks at last, in personifying as it were the Vices which drove them on to sacrifice the father of the city—to dim the eye and silence the tongue of Athens, who was herself the soul of Greece.

SHEPHERD.

A gran' idea, sir,—and natural as gran'—ane that could only visit the sowle o' a great Maister.

NORTH.

There you see anger, wrath, rage, hatred, spite, envy, jealousy, exemplified in many different natures. That Figure, prominent in the hardened pride of intellect, with his evil nature scowling through, eying Socrates with malignant, stern, and deadly revenge—is the King of the Sophists.

SHEPHERD.

About to re-erect his Throne, as he hopes, on the ruins o' that Natural Theology which Socrates taught the heathens.

NORTH.

You see then, James,—you feel that the purpose of the painter on the whole picture, has been to express, as I said, his conception of the character of Socrates—a various and manifold reflection of one image; but the image itself, giving the same due proportion,—where Love sits on the height of moral and intellectual power, and Intellect in their triple union, though strong in its own character, is yet subordinate to Both.

SHEPHERD.

What a pictur it maun be, if the execution be equal to the design!

NORTH.

Many conceptions, my dear James, troubled my imagination, before, in the steadfastness of my delight in Love, I finally fixed upon this—which I humbly hope the world “will not willingly let die.”

SHEPHERD.

It's the same way wi' poems. They aye turn oot at last something seemingly quite different frae the origination form—but it's no sae—for a spirit o' the same divine sameness breathes throughout, though ye nae langer ken the bit bonny bud in “the bright consummate flower.”

NORTH.

In one sketch—I will make you a present of it, my dear James—

SHEPHERD.

Thank ye, sir—thank ye;—you're really owre kind—owre good to your Shepherd—but dinna forget, sir—see that you dinna forget—for you'll pardon me for hintin' that sometimes promises o' that sort slip your memory—

NORTH.

In one sketch, James, I have represented Socrates speaking—and I found it more difficult to give the character of the principal figure—because the fire of discourse, of necessity, gave a disproportionate force to the intellectual expression—while again, I found it easier to give the character of all the rest, who looked upon Socrates, under the power of his eloquence, simply commanding, with almost an undivided expression, in which individual character was either lost or subdued.

SHEPHERD.

Never mind—send me the Sketch.

NORTH.

I will—and another. For, again, I chose that moment, when having closed his defence, Socrates stands looking upon the consulting judges, and awaiting their decision.

SHEPHERD.

Oh! sir! and that was a time when his ain character, methinks, micht wi' mair ease be most beautifully expressed!

NORTH.

Most true. But then, the divided and conflicting expression of all the other figures, some turned on the judges with scrutinizing eagerness, to read the decision before it was on their lips—some certain of the result—looking on Socrates—or on the judges—with what different states of soul! These, James, I found difficult indeed to manage, and to bring them all under the one expression, which in that sketch too, as in my large picture, it was my aim to breathe over the canvass.

SHEPHERD.

You maun try, sir, to mak a feenith'd pictur frae that sketch, sir—you maun indeed, sir. I'll lend it to you for that purpose—and no grudge't though ye keep it in your ain possession till next year.

NORTH.

I have not only made a sketch of another design, James, but worked in some of the colours.

SHEPHERD.

The dead colours ?

NORTH.

No—colours already instinct with life. I have chosen that calmer time, when after the pronouncing of the sentence, Socrates resumes his discourse—you may read it, James, in that divine dialogue of Plato—

SHEPHERD.

But I'm no grent haun' at the Greek.

NORTH.

Use Floyer Sydenham's translation, or—let me see—has he done that dialogue ? Take then that noble old man's, Taylor of Norwich. Socrates resumes his discourse, and declares his satisfaction in death, and his trust in immortality. A moment, indeed, for the sublime in art ; but affording to the painter opportunity for a different purpose from that which was mine in my great picture. For in this sketch, instead of intending, as my principal and paramount object, the representation of individual historical character—I have designed to express—rather—the Power among men of the sublime Spirit of their being—exemplified among a people dark with idolatry—using the historical subject as subservient to this my purpose—inasmuch as it shows a single mind raised up by the force of this feeling above nature—yea, shews the power of that feeling within that one mind, resting in awe upon a great multitude of men. For, surely, my dear James, it is not to be believed that at that moment, one countenance would preserve unchanged its bitter hostility, when revenge was in part defeated by seeing triumph arise out of doom—when malignant hate had got its victim—and when murder, that had struck its blow, might begin to feel its heart open to the terror of remorse.

SHEPHERD.

My dear Mr North, gie me baith your twa hauns. That's richt. Noo that I hae shucken, and noo that I hae squozen them in nua ain twa neives no unlike a vice, though you're no the king upon the throne, wi' a golden croon on his head, and a sceptre in his haund—that's King William the IVth, God bless him—yet you are a king ; and, as a loyal subject, loyal but no servile, for never was a slave born i' the Forest, here do I, James Hogg, the Ettrick Shepherd, kneel down on ae knee—thus—and kiss the richt haun o' King Kit.

(The SHEPHERD drops on his knee—does as he says, in spite of NORTH'S struggles to hinder him—rises—wipes the dust from his pants—and resumes his seat.)

NORTH.

" How many of my poorest subjects," James, " are now asleep ! " Look at Tickler.

TICKLER.

Asleep ! Broad-awake as the Baltic in a blast. But when under the power of Eloquence, I always sit with my eyes shut.

SHEPHERD.

But what for snore ? Hae ye nae mercy on the sick man through the partition ?

NORTH.

After Paintin' ; let us have some Politics.

•

SHEPHERD.

Na—na—na—na—na ! Come, Mr. Tickler, gie's a sang—to the fiddle. See hoo your Crennau is smilin' on you to haunle her frae her peg.

(The SHEPHERD takes down the celebrated Crennau from the wall, and, after tuning it, gives it to TICKLER.)

TICKLER (attempting a prelude.)

Shade of Stabilini ! heard'st thou ever grated such harsh discord as this ? 'Tis like a litter of pigs.

(TICKLER tunes his instrument.)

SHEPHERD.

Oh, for Geordie Crucksbanks ! " TICKLER AT THE TUNING ! " What for, Mr North, dinna ye get Geordie to invent a Series o' Illustrations o' the Noctes, and pooblish a Selection in four volumns octawvo ?

NORTH.

Wait, James, till "one with moderate haste might count a HUNDRED."

SHEPHERD.

What if we're a' dead?

NORTH.

The world will go on without us.

SHEPHERD.

Aye—but never see weel again. The verra Earth will feel a dirl at her heart, and pause for a moment pensively on her ain axis.

THE KLER (sings to an accompaniment of his own composition for the Cremona.)

DEMON.

My song is of Demos, our well-meaning friend,
Who lately was leading a peaceable life,
But now is so changed, that there's really no end
To his love of commotion, disturbance, and strife:
He's got such strange fancies and whims in his head,
And shews them so strangely wherever he goes,
That I fear he requires to be physic'd and bled,
For the more he is humour'd, the wilder he grows.

Thus abroad, he again has insanely begun
The career that once led him to sorrow and shame:
And madly exulting in what he has done,
He thinks his own echo the trumpet of Fame:
He blusters, and bullies, and brags of it so,
Yet mimics so strangely the land of the free,
That you'd almost suppose he intended to shew
How truly absurd even Freedom can be!

There in heavy Holland, where a sceptre of lead,
By nature should hold its Heronian reign,
He vows he must have the French bayonet instead,
Just to keep his own pond'rous posteriors in pain!
He sets fire to his house—he abandons his trade—
He perplexes his person with warlike array,
And fearlessly tells us he is not afraid,
And will never submit to legitimate sway!

Then at home he despises the old-fashion'd air
Of the vessel that's weather'd so many a storm,
And tells all the crew that they now must prepare
For a work of destruction, which he calls Reform:
And much do I fear that the crew must submit,
And yield to a blast that so fiercely prevails,
For the Devil himself at the helm seems to sit,
While Beelzebub's busy in filling the sails!

Oh, Demos! thy madness is madness indeed,
As all will admit, in that ill-omen'd hour,
When, from Princes, from Priests, and from Principles freed,
You become the first victim of this your own power!
For, trust me, my friend, you have merely to taste
The sweets of your own Il-legitimate sway,
To mourn o'er the path that can ne'er be retraced,
And curse the false friends that have led you astray!

SHEPHERD.

Soun' doctrine weel sung. Mr North, when ma lug's in for music, I aye like to hear't flowin', if no in a continuous strain, yet just, as a body might say, wi' nae langer interruption than ane might toddle owre a bit green knowe, and come down on anither murmur in the hollow, as sweet and clear as that he has left!

NORTH.

After such an image, James, how can I refuse?

SHEPHERD.

Here's your harp, sir.

(NORTH receives from the hand of the SHEPHERD perhaps the finest-toned Welsh harp in the world—the gift of Owen Evans of Pen-munmawr.

NORTH.

The air, you know, is my own, James. I shall sing it to-night to some beautiful words by my friend Robert Folkestone Williams—written, he tells me, expressly for the Noctes.

On! fill the wine-cup high,
The sparkling liquor pour;
For we will care and grief defy,
They ne'er shall plague us more.
And ere the snowy foam
From off the wine departs,
The precious draught shall find a home,
A dwelling in our hearts.

Though bright may be the beams
That woman's eyes display;
They are not like the ruby gleams
That in our goblets play.
For though surpassing bright
Their brilliancy may be,
Age dims the lustre of their light,
But adds more worth to thee.

Give me another draught,
The sparkling, and the strong;
He who would learn the poet craft—
He who would shine in song—
Should pledge the flowing bowl
With warm and generous wine;
'Twas wine that warm'd Anacreon's soul,
And made his songs divine.

And e'en in tragedy,
Who lives that never knew
The honey of the Attic Bee
Was gather'd from thy dew?
He of the tragic muse,
Whose praises bards rehearse;
What power but thine could e'er diffuse
Such sweetness o'er his verse?

Oh! would, that I could raise
The magic of that tongue;
The spirit of those deathless lays,
The Swan of Teios sung!
Each song the bard has given,
Its beauty and its worth,
Sounds sweet as if a voice from heaven
Was echoed upon earth.

How mighty—how divine,
Thy spirit seemeth when

The rich draught of the purple vine
 Dwelt in these godlike men.
 It made each glowing page,
 Its eloquence, and truth,
 In the glory of their golden age,
 Outshine the fire of youth.

Joy to the lone heart—joy
 To the desolate—oppress'd
 For wine can every grief destroy
 That gathers in the breast.
 The sorrows, and the care,
 That in our hearts abide,
 'Twill chase them from their dwellings there,
 To drown them in its tide.

And now the heart grows warm,
 With feelings undefined,
 Throwing their deep diffusive charm
 O'er all the realms of mind.
 The loveliness of truth
 Flings out its brightest rays,
 Clothed in the songs of early youth,
 Or joys of other days.

We think of her, the young,
 The beautiful, the bright;
 We hear the music of her tongue,
 Breathing its deep delight.
 We see again each glance,
 Each bright and dazzling beam,
 We feel our throbbing hearts still dance,
 We live but in a dream.

From darkness, and from woe,
 A power like lightning darts;
 A glory cometh down to throw
 Its shadow o'er our hearts,
 And dimm'd by falling tears,
 A spirit seems to rise,
 That shews the friend of other years
 Is mirror'd in our eyes.

But sorrow, grief, and care,
 Had dimm'd his setting star;
 And we think with tears of those that were,
 To smile on those that are.
 Yet though the grassy mound
 Sits lightly on his head,
 We'll pledge, in solemn silence round,
 THE MEMORY OF THE DEAD!

The sparkling juice now pour,
 With fond and liberal hand;
 Oh! raise the laughing rim once more,
 Here's to our FATHER LAND!
 Up, every soul that hears,
 Hurrah! with three times three;
 And shout aloud, with deafening cheers,
 The "ISLAND OF THE FREE."

Then fill the wine-cup high,
 The sparkling liquor pour;
 For we will care and grief defy,
 They ne'er shall plague us more.
 And ere the snowy foam
 From off the wine departs,
 The precious draught shall find a home—
 A dwelling in our hearts.

SHEPHERD.

Very gude—excellent—beautifu'! I thocht at ae time it was gaun to be owre lang—and aiblins it micht be sae—at least for a sang—unnerither circumstances—but here—hoo—w' your vice an' herp, it was owre sune owre—and here's to the health o' your freen, Robert Folkstone Williams—and may he be here to sing't himsell some nicht. Ken ye ony thing about American Poetry, Mr North?

NORTH.

Not so much as I could wish. Would all the living best American bards send me over copies of their works, I should do them justice. I respect—nay I admire that people, James; though perhaps they don't know it. Yet I know less of their Poetry than their Politics, and of them not much—

TICKLER.

How Jonathan Jeremy-Diddlers our Ministries! "Have you got such a thing as a half-crown about you?" And B flat, obedient to A sharp, shells out the ready rhino from his own impoverished exchequer into that of his "Transatlantic brother," overflowing with dollars.

SHEPHERD.

But the little you do ken o' their poetry, let's hear't.

NORTH.

I have lately looked over—in three volumes—Specimens of American Poetry, with Critical and Biographical Notices, and have met with many most interesting little poems, and passages of poems. The editor has been desirous of shewing what had been achieved under the inspiration of the American Muses before the days of Irving and Cooper, Pierpont and Percival, and thinks, rightly, that the lays of the Pilgrim Fathers of New England, the poets of the Western world, are as likely to bear some characteristic traits of national or individual character, as those of the Minnesingers and Trouveurs—or the "Gongorism of the Castilian rhymesters of old."

SHEPHERD.

Gongorism! What's that?

NORTH.

Accordingly, he goes as far back as 1612, and gives us a pretty long poem, called "Contemplations," by Anne Bradstreet, daughter of one Governor of Massachusetts Colony, and wife of another, who seems to have been a fine spirit.

SHEPHERD.

Was she, sir?

NORTH.

She is said to have been "a woman honoured and esteemed, where she lived, for her gracious demeanour, her eminent parts, her pious conversation, her virtuous disposition, her exact diligence in her place, and discreet managing of her family occasions; and more so, these poems are the fruits but of some few hours curtailed from her sleep, and other refreshments."

SHEPHERD.

Then Anne Bradstreet, sir, was a fine spirit! Just like a' our ain poetesses—in England and Scotland—married or no married yet—and och! och! och! hoo unlike to her and them the literary limmers o' France, rougin' and leeriu' on their spinnle-shanked lovers, that maun hae loathed the sicht and the smell o' them, starin' and stinkin' their way to the grave!

TICKLER.

James!

NORTH.

The celebrated Cotton Mather——

SHEPHERD.

Aye, I ken about him—born about fifty years after that date—the great mover in the mysterious matter o' the Salem witchcraft.

NORTH.

He says that “her poems, eleven times printed, have afforded a plentiful entertainment unto the ingenious, and a monument for her memory beyond the stateliest marbles.” And the learned and excellent Norton of Ipswich——

SHEPHERD.

I kenna him——

NORTH.

—— calls her “The mirror of her age, and glory of her sex.”

SHEPHERD.

Recolleck ye ony verses o' her contemplations?

NORTH.

Anne is walking in her contemplations through a wood—and she saith,

While musing thus, with contemplation fed,
And thousand fancies buzzing in my brain,
The sweet-tongued Philomel perch'd o'er my head,
And chanted forth a most melodious strain,
Which rapt me so with wonder and delight,
I judg'd my hearing better than my sight,
And wish'd me wings with her a while to take my flight.

“O Merry Bird!” said I, “that fears no snares,
That neither toils, nor hoards up in thy barns,
Feels no sad thought, nor cruciating cares
To gain more good, or shun what might thee harm;
Thy clothes ne'er wear, thy meat is everywhere,
Thy bed a bough, thy drink the water clear,
Remind'st not what is past, nor what's to come dost fear.

The dawning morn with songs thou dost prevent,
Set'st hundred notes unto thy feather'd crew,
So each one tunes his pretty instrument,
And warbling out the old, begins anew;
And thus they pass their youth in summer season,
Then follow thee into a better region,
Where winter's never felt by that sweet airy legion!”

SHEPHERD.

Oh! man, but they're bonny, incorrect, sweet, simple lines thae—and after sic a life as Anne Bradstreet led, can there be ony doubt that she is in heaven?

NORTH.

In my mind none. Nearly a hundred years after the birth—and nearly forty after the death of Anne Bradstreet—was born in Boston, Jane Colman, daughter of a clergyman, who was a school companion of Cotton Mather. At eleven, she used to correspond with her worthy father in verse—on entering her nineteenth year, she married a Mr Turel of Medford——

SHEPHERD.

Hoo can ye remember names in that wonnerfu' way, sir? And yet you say ye hae nae memory? You forget naething.

NORTH.

—— and died, James, in 1733, at the age of twenty-seven, “having faithfully fulfilled those duties which shed the brightest lustre on woman's name—the duties of the friend, the daughter, the mother, and the wife.”

SHEPHERD.

Hae ye ony o' her verses by heart, sir?

NORTH.

A paraphrase of a Psalm you know well——

SHEPHERD.

I ken weel a' the Psalm.

NORTH.

The following flows plaintively.

“ From hearts oppress'd with grief, did they require
 A sacred anthem on the sounding lyre :
 Come now, they cry, regale us with a song—
 Music and mirth the fleeting hours prolong.
 Shall Babel's daughter hear that blessed sound ?
 Shall songs divine be sung in heathen ground ?
 No ! Heaven forbid that we should tune our voice,
 Or touch the lyre, while—slaves—we can't rejoice !
 O Palestine ! our once so dear abode !
 Thou once wert blest with peace, and loved of God ;
 But now art desolate ! a barren waste !
 Thy fruitful fields by thorns and weeds disgraced.
 If I forget Judea's mournful land,
 May nothing prosper that I take in hand !
 Or if I string my lyre, or tune my voice,
 Till thy deliverance call me to rejoice ;
 O may my tongue forget the art to move,
 And may I never more my speech improve !
 Return, O Lord ! avenge us of our foes,
 Destroy the men that up against us rose !
 Let Edom's sons thy just displeasure know,
 And let them serve, like us, some foreign foe,
 In distant realms—far from their native home,
 To which dear seat, O ! never let them come ! ”

SHEPHERD.

I daursay, gin I cou'd get the soun' o' our ain mournfu' auld version out o' ma heart, that I wou'd like the lines unco weel—she mun hae been a gentle creatur.

NORTH.

I mentioned, James, that she and her father used to correspond——

SHEPHERD.

After her marriage :

NORTH.

Before and after—and in one of his letters—which I think must have been addressed to her before—before living with her husband at Medford—alluding to her having, in her paraphrase, said,

“ No helper in the waste and barren ground,
 Only a mournful willow wither'd there,” her father writes to her thus—strange, is it not, that part of his letter should be read at a Noctes !

SHEPHERD.

I think I see him mendin' his pen in his study at Boston, New England America, ae forenoon about twal o'clock, on the 21st January o' 1731—preceesely a hunder years !

NORTH.

The affectionate father says, “ This serious melancholy Psalm is well turned by you in most parts of it, considering your years and advantages for such a performance. You speak of a single withered willow which they hang their harps on ; but Euphrates was covered with willows along the banks of it, so that it has been called the river of willows. I hope, my dear, your lyre will not be hung on such a sorrowful shrub. Go on in sacred songs, and we'll hang it on the stately cedars of Lebanon, or let the pleasant elm before the door where you are suffice for you.”

SHEPHERD.

The pious pride o' paternal affection!

NORTH.

Jane Colman, during her eight years of wedded life, was no doubt happy—and in a calm spirit of happiness must have indited the soft, sweet, and simple close of an imitation of Horace.

SHEPHERD.

O' Horace! Could she read Latin?

NORTH.

Why not? Daughter—wife—of a clergyman?

No stately beds my humble roof adorn,
No costly purple, by carved panthers borne;
Nor can I boast Arabia's rich perfumes,
Diffusing odours through our stately rooms;
For me no fair Egyptian plies the loom,
But my fine linen all is made at home.
Though I no down or tapestry should spread,
A clean soft pillow shall support your head,
Fill'd with the wool from off my tender sheep,
On which with ease and safety you may sleep.
The nightingale shall lull you to your rest,
And all be calm and still as is your breast!

SHEPHERD.

Far mair simplicity o' language seem to hae had the young leddie o' New England in thae days, sir, than them o' Auld England o' the present age.—Come down some half century still nearer us, and fin' you ony virgin or wife o' poetical genie at that pint o' time?

NORTH.

I come down to 1712, and find Ann Eliza Schuyler, the daughter of Mr Brandt Schuyler, New York. At seventeen, she was married to Mr Bleeker of New Rochelle, and removed with him to Tomhanick, a beautiful solitary village, eighteen miles above Albany. There they passed several years, we are told, in the unbroken quiet of the wilderness; but then, were driven from the repose of that beautiful and romantic spot by the savages in alliance with Burgoyne. On their way from Albany, down the Hudson, they were forced to go ashore by the illness of their youngest daughter, where the poor creature died. Soon after, the capture of Burgoyne—(an unfortunate soldier, but a most accomplished man—witness his celebrated comedy, the Heiress)—allowed them to return to their retreat in the country; but the loss of her daughter made so deep an impression on her mind, that the mother never recovered her former happiness. A few years afterwards, her husband, when assisting his men in taking in the harvest, was surprised by a party of the enemy from Canada, and carried off prisoner. The shock which she received was so great, that her health was gone for ever; and though her husband was soon rescued from thralldom, and they, after a visit to their friends in New York, returned to Tornhanick, there she shortly died, in the thirty-first year of her age.

SHEPHERD.

And is her poetry as interesting as her life?

NORTH.

I have seen but little of it, and wish the editor of the Specimens had given us more; for he well observes, that a female cultivating the elegant arts of refined society at the Ultima Thule of civilized life, in regions of savage wildness, and among scenes of alarm, desolation, and blood, is a striking spectacle.

TICKLER (as the Time-piece smites twelve.)

A striking spectacle indeed!

(Enter PICARDY and Tail, with all the substantialities of the season.)

SHEPHERD.

I maun hear mair frae you, sir, anither time, about these American poetesses. Ony flourishing at this day?—Eh! Eh! What'n a gure!

NORTH.

Several, James.

SHEPHERD.

What? Several. Mr Awnrose—Dinna bring in a single ither guse, till we hae dispatched our freen' at the head o' the table.—Mr Tickler, whare'll ye sit? and whar'll ye eat? and what'll ye drink? and what'll ye want to hear? and what'll ye want to say? For, oh, sir! you've been pleesant the nicht—in ane o' your loun, but no seelent, humours.

TICKLER.

The legs.

SHEPHERD.

Baith?

TICKLER.

Do you mean to insult me? Certainly—both.

SHEPHERD.

I've sprained ma thoon. Sae tak him to yoursell, and——

(SHEPHERD shoves over the goose to TICKLER.

NORTH.

Help yourself first, James.

SHEPHERD.

Be easy, sir, on ma accoont. Alloo me to gie you some slices o' the breest aff ma ain plate, Mr North, I've never touched them——

NORTH.

Do, James.

SHEPHERD.

Na, niffer plates at ance—though yours is clean, and mine swooming' wi' sappy shavin's aff the bonny bosom o' the best bird that ever waddled among stubble.

(SHEPHERD insists on NORTH exchanging trenchers.

NORTH.

You know the way, James, to the old man's heart!

SHEPHERD.

It's like the grave. What for? 'Cause the "paths o' glory lead" till it! Thank ye, Tickler, for the twa spawls.

(SHEPHERD, with infinite alacrity and address, forks both legs with the same instrument, and leaves TICKLER desolate.

TICKLER.

Fill high the sparkling bowl,

The rich repast prepare!

Robb'd of a goose, I yet may share the feast.

Close by the regal chair,

Fell Thirst and Famine scowl!

A baleful smile upon their baffled guest.

Ambrose—a goose!—a goose!—my kingdom for a goose,—and, Tappie! pot o' pota!

SHEPHERD.

Gurney! Gurney! Guse, man, guse, ane's gane and anither's comin'—guse, man—Gurney—guse, guse, guse!

(GURNEY appears, and the Noctes vanish.

PART II.

WINTER RHAPSODY.

BY CHRISTOPHER NORTH.

FYTTE III.

A MYRIAD-MINDED Vision of Winter comes, breathing, frost-work-like, over the mirror of our imagination ! And who knows but that the words which give it a second being—words seeming to be things, and things thoughts—after all that evanescent imagery has relapsed into nothing, may prove a Prose-Poem, in which the lover of nature may behold some of her most beautiful and sublimest forms, fixed permanently before his gaze—that mental gaze, which, when the bodily eye is shut, or its range limited, continues to behold all creation in boundless reveries and dreams, lying beneath a sweeter or a more sullen light than ever fell from a material sun over a material world ?

A Prose-Poem ! The builders of the lofty rhyme are now contented to look back, through the vista of years, on the enduring edifices their genius constructed in its prime—some are old and some dead—the right hands of all the living have either forgot their cunning, are idle in the joy of glory achieved, or are loath to essay other works,

"Least aught else great might stamp them mortal."

Some hands may have been chilled—almost palsied by doubt—despondency—or "hope deferred, that maketh the heart sick," and they who own them, number themselves no more among the Muses' Sons. The cares and duties of life have won away others from the charms of song ; and haply one or two there be, in whom strange and cureless sorrows have dimmed and deadened

"The Vision and the Faculty divine !"

Now that those deep diapasons have ceased to roll—now that no more,

—"through the long-drawn aisle and fretted vault,
The pealing anthem swells the note of praise,"

in the hush may audience be found to listen even to our humbler strains—provided they are breathed from the inspiration of a not unthoughtful heart, and obey the biddings of that Sense of Beauty, which is born with every creature "endowed with discourse of reason ;" and when cherished by Conscience, God's vicegerent here below, can clothe insensate things with the charm of life, and imbue life with a spirit that speaks of immortality !

A Prose-Poem ! Yes—Prose is Poetry, whenever Passion and Imagination give utterance, in unison and in unison, to the dreams by which

* See our December Number, for Fyttes I. and II.

They are haunted and possessed!
Then from the lips of us all come "Thoughts that breathe, and words that burn,"

and the whole "mysterious world of eye and ear" undergoes fair or glorious transfiguration.

This House of ours is a prison—this Study of ours a cell. Time has laid his fetters on our feet—fettlers fine as the gossamer, but strong as Samson's ribs, silken-soft to wise submission, but to vain impatience galling as cankered wound that keeps ceaselessly eating into the bone. But while our bodily feet are thus bound by an inevitable and inexorable law, lo! our mortal wings are yet free as those of the lark, the dove, or the eagle—and they shall be expanded as of yore, in calm or tempest, now touching with their tips the bosom of this dearly beloved earth, and now aspiring heavenwards, beyond the realms of mist and cloud, even unto the very core of the still heart of that otherwise unapproachable sky, which graciously opens to receive the soul on its flight, when, dis-encumbered of the burden of all grovelling thoughts, and strong in its spirituality, it exults to soar

"Beyond this visible diurnal sphere."

nearing and nearing the native region of its own incomprehensible being!

Now touching, we said, with their tips the bosom of this dearly beloved earth! How sweet that attraction to imagination's wings! How delightful in that lower flight to skim along the green ground, or as now along the soft-bosomed beauty of the virgin snow! We were asleep all night long —sound asleep as children—while the flakes were falling, and "soft as snow on-snow" were all the descendings of our untroubled dreams.
The moon and all her stars were willing that their lustre should be veiled by that peaceful shower—and the sun, pleased with the purity of the sparkling earth, all white as inno-

—looked down from heaven a meek unmelting light, and leaves undissolved the stainless splendour. There is Frost in the air —but he "does his spiriting gently" studding the ground-snow thickly with diamonds, and shaping the tree-snow according to the peculiar and characteristic beauty of the leaves and sprays on which it has alighted almost as gently as the dews of spring. You know every kind of tree still by its own spirit shewing itself through that fairy veil—momentarily disguised from recognition—but admired the more in the sweet surprise with which again your heart salutes its familiar branches all fancifully ornamented with their snow-foliage, that murmurs not like the green leaves of summer, that like the yellow leaves of autumn strews not the earth with decay, but often melts away into change so invisible and inaudible, that you wonder, in the sunshine, to find that it is all vanished, and to see the old tree again standing in its own faint-green glossy bark, with its many million buds, which perhaps fancy suddenly expands into a power of umbrage impenetrable to the sun in Scorpio.

Lo! a sudden burst of sunshine, bringing back the pensive spirit from the past to the present, and kindling it, till it dances like light reflected from a burning mirror! Behold what a cheerful Sun-scene, though almost destitute of life!—An undulating Landscape, hillocky and hilly, but not mountainous, and buried under the weight of a day and night's incessant and continuous snowfall!
The weather has not been windy—and now that the flakes have ceased falling, there is not a cloud to be seen, except some delicate braidings, here and there along the calm of the Great Blue Sea of Heaven. Most luminous is the sun, but you can look straight on his face, almost with unwinking eyes, so mild and mellow is his large light as it overflows the day. All enclosures have disappeared, and you indistinctly ken the greater landmarks, such as a grove, a wood, a hall, a castle, a spire, a village, a town,—the faint haze of a far off and smokeless city. Most intense is the silence. For all the streams are dumb, and the great river lies like a dead serpent in the strath. Not dead —for, lo! yonder one of his folds glitters—and in the glitter you see him moving—while all the rest of his sullen length is palsied by frost, and looks livid and more livid at every distant and more distant winding.
What blackens on that tower of snow?
Crows roosting innumerable on a huge tree—but they saw not in their hunger. Neither sheep nor cattle are to be seen or heard—but they are cared for—the folds and the farm-yards are all full of life—and the ungathered stragglers are safe in their instincts.—There has been a deep fall—but no storm—and the silence, though partly that of suffering, is not that of death. Therefore, to the imagination, unsaddened by the heart, the repose is beautiful. The almost unbroken uniformity of the scene—its simple and grand monotony—lulls all the thoughts and feelings into a calm, over which is breathed the gentle excitation of a novel charm, inspiring many fancies, all of a quiet character. Their range, perhaps, is not very extensive, but they all regard the homely and domestic charities of life. And the heart burns as here and there some human dwelling discovers itself by a wreath of smoke up the air, or as the robin redbreast, a creature that is ever at hand, comes flitting before your path, with an almost pert flutter of his feathers, bold from the acquaintance-ship he has formed with you in severer weather at the threshold or window of the tenement, which, for years, may have been the winter sanctuary of the “bird whom man loves best,” and who bears a Christian name in every clime he inhabits. Meanwhile the sun waxes brighter and warmer in heaven—some insects are in the air, as if that moment called to life—and the mosses that may yet be visible here and there along the ridge of a wall or on the stem of a tree, in variegated lustre frost-brightened, seem to delight in the snow, and in no other season of the year to be so happy as in winter. Such gentle touches of pleasure animate one’s whole being, and connect, by many fine associations, the emotions inspired by the objects of animate and inanimate nature, even sometimes giving to them all

“The glory and the freshness of a dream!”

Ponder on the idea—the emotion of purity—and how finely soul-blent is the delight imagination feels in a bright hush of new-fallen snow! Some speck or stain—however slight—there always seems to be on the most perfect whiteness of any other substance—or “dim suffusion veils” it with some faint discolour—witness even the leaf of the lily or the rose. Heaven forbid that we should ever breathe aught but love and delight in the beauty of these consummate flowers! But feels not the heart, even when the midsummer morning sunshine is melting the dew on their fragrant bosoms, that their loveliness is “of the earth earthy”—faintly tinged or streaked, when at the very fairest, with a hue foreboding languishment and decay? Not the less for its sake are those soulless flowers dear to us—thus owning kindred with them whose beauty is all soul,

“Oh, call it fair, not pale!”

enshrined for a short while on that perishable face! Do we not still regard these insensate flowers—so emblematical of what, in human life, we do most passionately love and profoundly pity—with a pensive emotion, often deepening into melancholy, that sometimes, ere the strong fit subsides, blackens into despair! Oh! what pain doubtless was in the heart of the Elegiac Poet of old, when he sighed over the transitory beauty of flowers,—“Quam brevis—gratia Florum!”—an imperfect remembrance of a beautiful lament! But over a perfectly pure expanse of night-fallen snow, when, unaffected by the gentle sun, the first fine frost has incrustated it with small sparkling diamonds, the prevalent emotion is Joy. So Cowper felt, when he simply said,

“The vault is blue,
Without a cloud, and white without a speck
The dazzling splendour of the scene below.”

There is a charm in the sudden and total disappearance even of the grassy green. All the “old familiar faces” of nature are for a while out of sight, and out of mind. That white silence shed by heaven over earth carries with it, far and wide, the pure peace of another region—almost another life. No image is there to tell of this restless and noisy world. The cheerfulness of reality kindles up our reverie ere it becomes a dream; and we are glad to feel our whole being complexioned by the passionless repose. If we think at all of human life, it is only of the young, the fair, and the innocent. "Pure as snow," are words then felt to be most holy, as the image of some beautiful and beloved being comes and goes before our eyes—brought from a far distance in this our living world, or from a distance—far, far, farther still—in the world beyond the grave—the image of virgin growth—insensibly to womanhood among her parents' prayers, or of some spiritual creature who expired long ago, and carried with her her native innocence unstained to heaven.

Such Spiritual Creature—too spiritual long to sojourn below the skies—wert Thou—whose rising and whose setting—both most starlike—brightened at once all thy native vale, and at once left it in darkness. Thy name has long slept in our heart—and there let it sleep unbreathed—even as, when we are dreaming our way through some solitary place, without speaking we bless the beauty of some sweet wild-flower, pensively smiling to us through the snow!

The Sabbath returns on which, in the little kirk among the hills, we saw thee baptized. Then comes a warbling glimmer of seven sweet years, that to Thee, in all their varieties, were but as one delightful season, one blessed life—and, finally, that other Sabbath, on which, at thy own dying request—between services thou wert buried!

How mysterious are all thy ways and workings, O gracious Nature! Thou who art but a name given by our souls, seeing and hearing through the senses, to the Being in whom all things are and have life! Ere two years old, she, whose dream is now with us, all over the small silvan world, that beheld the revelation, how evanescent! of her pure existence—was called the "Holy Child!" The taint of sin—inherited from those who disobeyed in Paradise—seemed from her fair clay to have been washed out at the baptismal font, and by her first infantine tears. So pious people almost believed, looking on her so unlike all other children, in the serenity of that habitual smile that clothed the creature's countenance with a wondrous beauty, at an age when on other infants is but faintly seen the dawn of reason, and their eyes look happy, just like the thoughtless flowers. No unlike all other children—but unlike only because sooner than they—she seemed to have had given to her—even in the communion of the cradle—an intimation of the being and the providence of God. Sooner, surely, than through any other clay that ever enshrouded immortal spirit, dawned the light of reason and of religion on the face of the "Holy Child."

Her lisping language was sprinkled with words alien from common childhood's uncertain speech, that murmurs only when indigent nature prompts;—and her own parents wondered whence they came in her simplicity, when first they looked upon her kneeling in an unbidden prayer. As one mild week of vernal sunshine covers the braes with primroses, so shone with fair and fragrant feelings—unfolded, ere they knew, before her parents' eyes—the divine nature of her who, for a season, was lent to them from the skies. She learned to read out of the Bible—almost without any teaching—they knew not how—just by looking gladly on the words, even as she looked on the pretty daisies on the green—till their meanings stole insensibly into her soul, and the sweet syllables, succeeding each other on the blessed page, were all united by the memories her heart had been treasuring every hour that her father or her mother had read aloud in her hearing from the Book of Life. "Suffer little children to come unto me and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of Heaven"—how wept her parents, as these the most affecting of our Saviour's words dropt silver-sweet from her lips, and continued in her upward eyes among the swimming tears!

Be not incredulous of this dawn of reason, wonderful as it may seem to you, so soon becoming morn—almost perfect daylight—with the "Holy Child." Many such miracles are set before us—but we recognise them not, or pass them by, with a word or a smile of short surprise. How leaps the baby in its mother's arms, when the mysterious charm of music thrills through its little brain! And how learns it to modulate its feeble voice, unable yet to articulate, to the melodies that bring forth all round its eyes a delighted smile! Who knows what then may be the thoughts and feelings of the infant awakened to the sense of a new world, alive through all its being to sounds that haply glide past our ears, unmeaning as the breath of the common air! Thus have mere infants sometimes been seen inspired by music, till like small genii they warbled spell-strains of their own, powerful to sadden and subdue our hearts. So, too, have infant eyes been so charmed by the rainbow irradiating the earth, that almost infant hands have been taught, as if by inspiration, the power to paint in finest colours, and to imitate with a wondrous art, the skies so beautiful to the quick-awakened spirit of delight. What knowledge have not some children acquired, and gone down scholars to their small untimely graves! Knowing that such things have been—are—and will be—why art thou incredulous of the divine expansion of soul—so soon understanding the things that are divine—in the “Holy Child?”

Thus grew she in the eye of God, day by day waxing wiser and wiser in the knowledge that tends towards the skies, and as if some angel visitant were nightly with her in her dreams, awakening every morn with a new dream of thought that brought with it a gift of more comprehensive speech. Yet merry she was at times with her companions among the woods and braes, though while they all were laughing, she only smiled; and the passing traveller, who might pause a moment to bless the sweet creatures in their play, could not but single out one face among the many fair, so pensive in its paleness, a face to be remembered, coming from afar, like a mournful thought upon the hour of joy!

Sister or brother of her own had she none—and often both her parents—who lived in a hut by itself up among the mossy stumps of the old decayed forest—had to leave her alone—sometimes even all the day long from morning till night. But she no more wearied in her solitariness than does the wren in the wood. All the flowers were her friends—all the birds. The linnet ceased not his song for her, though her footsteps wandered into the green glade among the yellow broom, almost within reach of the spray from which he poured his melody—the quiet eyes of his mate feared her not when her garments almost touched the bush where she brooded on her young. Shiest of the winged silvans, the cushat clapped not her wings away on the soft approach of her harmless footsteps to the pine that concealed her slender nest. As if blown from heaven, descended round her path the showers of the painted butterflies, to feed, sleep, or die—undisturbed by her—upon the wild flowers—with wings, when motionless, undistinguishable from the blossoms. And well she loved the brown, busy, blameless bees, come thither for the honey-dews from a hundred cots sprinkled all over the parish, and all high overhead sailing away at evening, laden and wearied, to their straw-roofed skeps in many a hamlet garden. The leaf of every tree, shrub, and plant, she knew familiarly and lovingly in its own characteristic beauty; and was loath to shake one dew-drop from the sweetbrier-rose. And well she knew that all nature loved her in return—that they were dear to each other in their innocence—and that the very sunshine, in motion or in rest, was ready to come at the bidding of her smiles. Skillful those small white hands of hers among the reeds and rushes and osiers—and many a pretty flower-basket grew beneath their touch, her parents wondering on their return home to see the handiwork of one who was never idle in her happiness. Thus early—ere yet but five years old—did she earn her mite for the sustenance of her own beautiful life! The russet garb she wore she herself had won—and thus Poverty, at the door of that hut, became even like a Guardian Angel, with the lineaments of heaven on her brow, and the quietude of heaven beneath her feet.

But these were but her lonely pastimes, or gentle task-work self-imposed among her pastimes; and itself, the sweetest of them all, inspired by a sense of duty, that still brings with it its own delight—and hallowed by religion, that even in the most adverse lot changes slavery into freedom—till the heart, insensit-ble to the bonds of necessity, sings aloud for joy. The life within the life of the "Holy Child," apart from even such innocent employments as these, and from such recreations as innocent, among the shadows and the sunshine of those silvan haunts, was passed, let us fear not to say the truth, wondrous as such worship was in one so very young—was passed in the worship of God; and her parents—though sometimes even saddened to see such piety in a small creature like her, and afraid, in their exceeding love, that it betokened an early removal from this world of one too perfectly pure ever to be touched by its sins and sorrows—forebore, in an awful pity, ever to remove the Bible from her knees, as she would sit with it there, not at morning and at evening only, or all the Sabbath long as soon as they returned from the kirk, but often through all the hours of the longest and sunniest week-days, when there was nothing to hinder her from going up to the hill-side, or down to the little village, to play with the other children, always too happy when she appeared—nothing to hinder her but the voice she heard speaking in that Book, and the hal-lalujahs that, at the turning over of each blessed page, came upon the ear of the "Holy Child" from white-robed saints all kneeling before His throne in heaven!

Her life seemed to be the same in sleep. Often at midnight, by the light of the moon shining in upon her little bed beside theirs, her parents leant over her face, dislur in dreams, and wept as she wept, her lips all the while murmuring, in broken sentences of prayer, the name of Him who died for us all. But plentiful as were her penitential tears—penitential, in the holy humbleness of her stainless spirit, over thoughts that had never left a dimming breath on its purity, yet that seemed, in those strange visitings, to be haunting her as the shadows of sins—soon were they all dried up in the lustre of her returning smiles! Waking, her voice in the kirk was the sweetest among many sweet, as all the young singers, and she the youngest far, sat together by themselves, and within the congregational music of the psalm, uplifted a silvery strain that sounded like the very spirit of the whole, even like angelic harmony blent with a mortal song. But sleeping, still more sweetly sang the "Holy Child;" and then, too, in some diviner inspiration than ever was granted to it while awake, her soul composed its own hymns, and set the simple scriptural words to its own mysterious music—the tunes she loved best gliding into one another, without once ever marring the melody, with pathetic touches interposed never heard before, and never more to be renewed! For each dream had its own breathing, and many-visioned did then seem to be the sinless creature's sleep!

The love that was borne for her, all over the hill-region, and beyond its circling clouds, was almost such as mortal creatures might be thought to feel for some existence that had visibly come from heaven! Yet all who looked on her, saw that she, like themselves, was mortal, and many an eye was wet, the heart wist not why, to hear such wisdom falling from her lips; for dimly did it prognosticate, that as short as bright would be her walk from the cradle to the grave. And thus for the "Holy Child" was their love elevated by awe, and saddened by pity—and as by herself she passed pensively by their dwellings, the same eyes that smiled on her presence, on her disappearance wept!

Not in vain for others—and for herself, oh! what great gain!—for these few years on earth, did that pure spirit ponder on the word of God! Other children became pious from their delight in her piety—for she was simple as the simplest among them all, and walked with them hand in hand, nor spurned companionship with any one that was good. But all grew good by being with her—and parents had but to whisper her name—and in a moment the passionate sob was hushed—the lowering brow lighted—and the household in peace. Older hearts owned the power of the piety, so far surpassing their thoughts; and time-hardened sinners, it is said, when looking and listening to the "Holy Child," knew the errors of their ways, and returned to the right path, as at a voice from heaven.

Bright was her seventh summer—the brightest, so the aged said, that had ever, in man's memory, shone over Scotland. One long, still, sunny, blue day followed another, and in the rainless weather, though the dewa kept green the hills, the song of the streams was low. But paler and paler, in sunlight and moonlight, became the sweet face that had been always pale; and the voice that had been always something mournful, breathed lower and sadder still from the too perfect whiteness of her breast. No need—no fear—to tell her that she was about to die! Sweet whispers had sung it to her in her sleep—and waking she knew it in the look of the piteous skies. But she spoke not to her parents of death more than she had often done—and never of her own. Only she seemed to love them with a more exceeding love—and was readier, even sometimes when no one was speaking, with a few drops of tears. Sometimes she disappeared—nor, when sought for, was found in the woods about the hut. And one day that mystery was cleared; for a shepherd saw her sitting by herself on a grassy mound in a nook of the small solitary kirkyard, miles off among the hills, so lost in reading the Bible, that shadow or sound of his feet awoke her not; and, ignorant of his presence, she knelt down and prayed—for a while weeping bitterly—but soon comforted by a heavenly calm—that her sins might be forgiven her!

One Sabbath evening, soon after, as she was sitting beside her parents at the door of their hut, looking first for a long while on their faces, and then for a long while on the sky, though it was not yet the stated hour of worship, she suddenly knelt down, and leaning on their knees, with hands clasped more fervently than her wont, she broke forth into tremulous singing of that hymn, which from her lips they now never heard without unendurable tears:

"The hour of my departure's come,
I hear the voice that calls me home;
At last, O Lord! let trouble cease,
And let thy servant die in peace!"

They carried her fainting to her little bed, and uttered not a word to one another till she revived. The shock was sudden, but not unexpected, and they knew now that the hand of death was upon her, although her eyes soon became brighter and brighter, they thought, than they had ever been before. But forehead, cheeks, lips, neck, and breast, were all as white, and, to the quivering hands that touched them, almost as cold as snow. Ineffable was the bliss in those radiant eyes; but the breath of words was frozen, and that hymn was almost her last farewell. Some few words she spoke—and named the hour and day she wished to be buried. Her lips could then just faintly return the kiss and no more—a film came over the now dim blue of her eyes—the father listened for her breath—and then the mother took his place, and leaned her ear to the unbreathing mouth, long deluding herself with its lifelike smile; but a sudden darkness in the room, and a sudden stillness, most dreadful both, convinced their unbelieving hearts at last, that it was death.

All the parish, it may be said, attended her funeral—for none staid away from the kirk that Sabbath—though many a voice was unable to join in the Psalm. The little grave was soon filled up—and you hardly knew that the turf had been disturbed beneath which she lay. The afternoon service consisted but of a prayer—for he who ministered, had loved her with love unspeakable—and though an old grey-haired man, all the time he prayed he wept. In the sobbing kirk her parents were sitting—but no one looked at them—and when the congregation rose to go, there they remained sitting—and an hour afterwards, came out again into the open air, and parting with their pastor at the gate, walked away to their hut, overshadowed with the blessing of a thousand prayers!

And did her parents, soon after she was buried, die of broken hearts, or pine away disconsolately to their graves? Think not that they, who were Christians indeed, could be guilty of such ingratitude. "The Lord giveth, and the Lord taketh away—blessed be the name of the Lord!" were the first words they had spoke by that bedside; during many, many long years of weal or woe, duly every morning and night, these same blessed words did they utter when on their knees together in prayer—and many a thousand times besides, when they were apart, she in her silent hut, and he on the hill—neither of them unhappy in their solitude, though never again, perhaps, was his countenance so cheerful as of yore—and though often suddenly amidst mirth or sunshine, her eyes were seen to overflow! Happy had they been—as we mortal beings ever can be happy—during many pleasant years of wedded life before she had been born. And happy were they—on to the verge of old age—after she had here ceased to be! Their Bible had indeed been an idle book—the Bible that belonged to “the Holy Child,”—and idle all their kirk-goings with “the Holy Child,” through the Sabbath-calm—had those intermediate seven years not left a power of bliss behind them, triumphant over death and the grave!

Poetry, one might imagine, must be full of beautiful Snow-scenes. If so, they have almost all dissolved—melted away from our memory—as the Snow-scenes in nature do, which they coldly pictured. Thomson’s Winter, of course, we do not include in our obliviousness—and from Cowper’s Task we might quote many a most picturesque description—none more so in poetry. But have frost and snow been done justice to by many poets? They have by two—Southey and Coleridge, of whose most poetical compositions respectively, “Thalaba” and the “Ancient Mariner,” in some future rhapsodical mood, we may speak. Thomson’s genius does not—very, very often—though often—delight us by exquisite minute touches in the description of nature—like that of Cowper. It loves to paint on a great scale—and to dash objects off sweepingly by bold strokes—such, indeed, as have almost always marked the genius of the mighty masters of the lyre, and the rainbow. Cowper sets nature before your eyes—Thomson before your imagination. Which do you prefer? Both. Be assured that both poets had pored night and day upon nature—in all her aspects—and that she had revealed herself equally to both. But they, in their religion, delighted in different modes of worship—and both were worthy of the mighty mother. In one mood of mind, we love Cowper best, in another Thomson. Sometimes the Seasons are almost a Task—and sometimes the Task is out of Season. There is a delightful distinctness in all the pictures of the Bard of Olney—glorious gloom or glimmer in most of those of the Bard of Ednam. Cowper paints trees—Thomson wooda. Thomson paints, in a few wondrous lines, rivers from source to sea, like the mighty Barampooter—Cowper, in many no very wondrous lines, brightens up one bend of a stream, or awakens our fancy to the murmur of some single waterfall. But a truce to antithesis—a deceptive style of criticism—and see how Thomson sings of snow. Why—in the following lines, almost—though not quite—as well as Christopher North in his Winter Rhapsody:

“The cherish’d fields
Put on their tender robe of purest white.
’Tis brightness all, save where the new snow melts
Along the merry current.”

Nothing can be more vivid. ’Tis of the nature of an ocular spectrum.

Here is a touch like one of Cowper’s. Note the beauty of the epithet “brown,” where all that is motionless is white:

“The foodless wilds
Pour forth their brown inhabitants.”

That one word proves the poet. Does it not?

The entire description from which these two sentences are selected by memory, a critic you may always trust to, is admirable—except in one or two places where Thomson seems to have striven to be strongly pathetic, and where he seems to us to have overshot his mark, and to have ceased to be perfectly natural. Thus,

“Drooping, the ox
Stands, cover’d o’er with snow, and then demands
The fruit of all his toil.”

The image of the ox is as good as possible. We see him, and roundly paint him in oils. But, to our mind, the notion of his “demanding the fruit of all his toil,”—to which we freely acknowledge the worthy animal was well entitled—sounds, as it is here expressed—rather fantastical. Call it doubtful—for Jeremy was never utterly in the wrong in any sentiment, Again,

"The blasting kind
Eye the bleak heaven, and next the glittering earth,
With looks of dumb despair."

The second line is perfect—but the Ettrick Shepherd agreed with us—one night at Ambrose's—that the third was not quite right. Sheep, he agreed with us, do not deliver themselves up to despair under any circumstances; and here Thomson transferred what would have been his own feeling in a corresponding condition, to animals who dreadlessly follow their instincts. Thomson redeems himself in what immediately succeeds,—

"Then sad dispersed,
Dig for the wither'd herb through heaps of snow."

For as they disperse, they do look very sad—and no doubt are so—but had they been in despair, they would not so readily, and constantly, and uniformly, and successfully, have taken to the digging—but whole flocks had perished.

You will not, we are confident, be angry with us for quoting a few lines that occur soon after, and which are a glorious example of the sweeping style of description which, we said above, characterised the genius of this sublime poet:—

"From the howling east,
In this dire season, oft the whirlwind's wing
Sweeps up the burden of whole wintry plains
At one wide waft, and o'er the hapless flocks,
Hid in the hollow of two neighbouring hills,
The billowy tempest whelms; till upwards urged
The valley to a shivering mountain swells,
Tipt with a wreath high-curling in the sky."

Well might the bard, with such a snow-storm in his imagination, when telling the shepherds to be kind to their helpless charge, address them in language which, in an ordinary mood, would have been bombast. "Shepherds," says he, "baffle the raging year!" How? Why, merely by filling their pens with food. But the whirlwind was up—

"Far off its coming groined," and the poet was inspired. Had he not been so, he had not cried, "Baffle the raging year;" and if you be not so, you will think it a most absurd expression. We, therefore, trust you are inspired—and if so, why, it must have been with reading our Rhapsody.

Did you ever see water beginning to change itself into ice? Yes. Then try to describe the sight. Success in that trial will prove you a poet. People do not prove themselves poets only by writing long poems. A line—two words—may shew that they are the Muses' sons. How exquisitely does Burns picture to our eyes moonlight-water undergoing an ice-change!

"The chilly frost, beneath the silver beam, Crept gently crusting o'er the glittering stream!"

Thomson does it with an almost finer spirit of perception—or conception—or memory—or whatever else you choose to call it; for our part, we call it genius,—

"An icy-gale, oft shifting, o'er the pool
Breathes a blue film, and in its mild career Arrests the bickering stream."

And afterwards, having frozen the entire stream into a "crystal pavement," how gloriously doth he conclude thus—

"The whole imprison'd river grows below."

Here again, how pleasant to see the peculiar genius of Cowper contrasted with that of Thomson. The gentle Cowper delighting—for the most part—in tranquil images—for his life was past amidst tranquil nature; the enthusiastic Thomson, more pleased with images of power. Cowper says,

"On the flood,
Indurated and fix'd, the snowy weight
Lies undissolved, while silently breath,
And unperceived, the current steals away."

How many thousand times the lines we are now going to quote have been quoted, nobody can tell; but we quote them once more for the purpose of asking you, if you think that any one poet of this age could have written them—could have chilled one's very soul as well as body, with such intense feeling of cold? Not one.

"In these fell regions, in Arina caught,
And to the stony sleep his idle ship

*Immediate soul, he with his hapless crew;
Each full exerted at his several task,
Press'd into statues—to the cordage glued
The sailor, and the pilot to his helm!"*

The oftener—the more we read the "Winter"—especially the last two or three hundred lines—the angrier is our wonder with Wordsworth for asserting that Thomson owed the national popularity that his "Winter" immediately won, to his commonplace sentimentalities, and his vicious style! Yet true it is, that he was sometimes guilty of both; and, but for his transcendent genius, they might have obscured the lustre of his fame. But such sins are not very frequent in the "Seasons," and were all committed in the glow of that fine and bold enthusiasm, which, to his imagination, arrayed all things, and all words, in a light that seemed to him at the time to be poetry—though sometimes it was but "false glitter." Besides, he was but young; and his Great Work was his first. He had not philosophized his language into poetry, as Wordsworth himself has done, after long years of profoundest study of the laws of thought and speech. But in such study, while much is gained, is not something lost? And is there not a charm in the free, flowing, chartered libertinism of the diction and versification of the "Seasons"—above all, in the closing strains of the "Winter," and in the whole of the "Hymn," which inspires a delight and wonder that is seldom breathed upon us—glorious poem, on the whole, as it is—from the more measured march of the "Excursion?"

All that part of the pensive Public who have been much at school, know Thomson's description of the wolves among the Alps, Apennines, and Pyrenees,

"Cruel as death, and hungry as the grave, Burning for blood, bouy and gnat and grim."

The first fifteen lines are equal to any thing in the whole range of English descriptive poetry; but the last ten are positively bad. Here they are:

"The godlike face of man avails him nought!
Even beauty, force divine, as whose bright glance

The generous lion stands in soften'd gaze,
New bloods, a hapless undistinguish'd prey;

But if, apprized of the severe attack,
The country be shut up, lured by the scent
Of churchyard drear, (inhuman to relate!)
The disappointed prowlers fall, and dig,
The shrouded body from the grave, o'er which,
Mix'd with soul shades and frighten'd ghosts, they howl."

Wild beasts do not like the look of the human eye—they think us ugly customers—and sometimes stand shilly-shallying in our presence, in an awkward but alarming attitude, of hunger mixed with fear. A single wolf seldom or never attacks a man. He cannot stand the face. But a person would need to have a god-like face indeed to terrify therewith an army of wolves some thousand strong. It would be the height of presumption in any man, though beautiful as Moore thought Byron, to attempt it. If so, then

"The godlike face of man avails him not,"

is, under these circumstances, ludicrous. Still more so is the trash about beauty, force divine! It is too much to expect of an army of wolves ten thousand strong, "and hungry as the grave," that they should all fall down on their knees before a sweet morsel of flesh and blood, merely because the young lady was so beautiful that she might have sat to Sir Thomas Lawrence for a frontispiece to Mr Watts's Souvenir. 'Tis all stuff, too, about the generous lion standing in softened gaze at beauty's bright glance. True, he has been known to look with a certain sort of soft surliness upon a pretty Cadfire girl, and to walk past without eating her—but simply because, an hour or two before, he had dined on a Hortentot Venus. The secret lay not in his heart, but in his stomach. Still the notion is a popular one, and how exquisitely has Spencer changed it into the divinest poetry in the character of the attendant lion of "Heavenly Una with her milk-white lamb!"

But Thomson, so far from making poetry of it, in this passage, has vulgarized and blurred by it, the natural and inevitable emotion of terror and pity. Famished wolves howling up the dead is a dreadful image—but "inhuman to relate," is not an expression heavily laden with meaning; and the sudden, abrupt, violent, and, as we feel, unnatural introduction of ideas, purely superstitious, at the close, is most revolting, and miserably mars the terrible truth.

"Mix'd with foul shades and frighten'd ghosts they howl."

Why, pray, are the shades foul, and the ghosts only frightened? And wherein lies the specific difference between a shade and a ghost? Besides, if the ghosts were frightened, which they had good reason to be, why were not they off? We have frequently read of their wandering far from home, on occasions when they had no such excellent excuse to offer. This line, therefore, we have taken the liberty to erase from our pocket-copy of the Seasons—and to draw a few keelavine strokes over the rest of the passage—beginning with man's godlike face.

But here is a passage which will live forever—in which not one word could be altered for the better—not one omitted but for the worse—not one added that would not be superfluous—a passage that proves that fiction is not the soul of poetry, but truth—but then such truth as was never spoken before on the same subject—such truth as shews that while Thomson was a person of the strictest veracity, yet was he very far indeed from being a matter-of-fact man:

"As thus the snows arise, and foul and fierce,
All Winter drives along the darken'd air;
In his own loose revolving fields, the swain
Disaster'd stands: sees other hills ascend,
Of unknown joyless brow; and other scenes,
Of horrid prospect, shag the trackless plain:
Nor finds the river, nor the forest, hid Beneath the formless wild; but wanders on
From hill to dale, still more and more astray;
Impatient flouncing through the drifted heaps,
Stung with the thoughts of home; the thoughts of home

Rash on his nerves, and call their vigour forth

In many a vain attempt. How sinks his soul!

What black despair, what horror fills his heart!

When for the dusky spot, which Fancy feign'd

His tufted cottage rising through the snow,
He meets the roughness of the middle waste,

Far from the track and blest abode of man;
While round him night resistless closes fast,

And every tempest howling o'er his head,
Renders the savage wilderness more wild.
Then throng the busy shapes into his mind,
Of cover'd pits, unfathomably deep,

A dire descent! beyond the power of frost;
Of faithless bogs; of precipices huge, Smooth'd up with snow; and, what is land, unknown,

What water, of the still unfrozen spring,
In the loose marsh or solitary lake,
Where the fresh fountain from the bottom boils.

These check his fearful steps; and down
he sinks

Beneath the shelter of the shapeless drift,
Thinking o'er all the bitterness of death,
Mix'd with the tender anguish Nature shoots

Through the wrung bosom of the dying man,

His wife, his children, and his friends unseen.

In vain for him th' officious wife prepares
The fire fair-blazing, and the vestment warm;

In vain his little children, peeping out into the mingling storm, demand their sire,

With tears of artless innocence. Alas!
Nor wife, nor children, more shall he behold;

Nor friends, nor sacred home. On every nerve

The deadly Winter seizes; shuts up sense;
And, o'er his inmost vitals creeping cold,
Lays him along the snows, a stiffen'd corse!"

Who wrote the affecting ballad-song called Donocht-head? "It is not mine," said Burns; "I would give ten pounds it were. It appeared first in the Edinburgh Herald, and came to the editor of that paper with the Newcastle post-mark on it." If we mistake not, Allan Cunningham tells us that it was written by an unfortunate of the name of Picken, who lived, suffered, and died in or about the town to which it would be a foolish work of supererogation to carry coals. Dr Currie felt its beauty—indeed, the Doctor was, on the whole, a good critic—though sometimes he subjected poets in their fever-fits to his favourite practice—the cold bath. “This affecting poem,” quoth he, “is apparently incomplete. The author need not be ashamed to own himself. It is worthy of Burns or of Macneil.” It bears perusal well, even immediately after Thomson’s Death in Snow.

DONOCHT-HEAD.

“Keen blaws the wind o’er Donocht-head,
Thesnaur drives snell through the dale,
The Gaberlunzie girls my sneek,
And shivering tells his waeft’ tale.
‘Could it be the night, O let me in,
And dinna let your minstrel fa’,
And dinna let his winding sheet
Be naething but a wreath o’ snaw.”

“Full ninety winters hae I seen,
And piped where gor-rocks whirling flew;

And mony a day I’ve danced, I ween,
To lilla which from my drone I blew.
My Eppie waked, and soon she cry’d, ‘Get up, gudeman, and let him in;
For weel ye ken the winter night
Was short when he began his din.’

“My Eppie’s voice, I woe it’s sweet,
Even though she bans and scoulds a wee;

But when it’s tuned to sorrow’s tale,
O, haith, it’s doubly dear to me.
‘Come in, auld carle, I’ll steer my fire,
I’ll make it bleeze a bonnie flame;
Your bluid is thin, ye’ve tait the gate,
Ye shouldna stray so far frae hame.’

“‘Nae hame hae I,’ the minstrel said,
‘Sad party-strife o’erturn’d my ha’;
And, weeping at the eve of life,
I wander though a wreath o’ snaw.’”

A fragment! and the more piteous because a fragment. Go in search of the pathetic, and you will find it tear-steeped, sigh-breathed, moon-muttered, and groaned in fragments. The poet seems often struck dumb by woe—his heart feels that suffering is at its acmé—and that he should break off and away from a sight too sad to be longer looked on—haply too humiliating to be disclosed. So, too, it sometimes is with the beautiful. The soul in its delight seeks to escape from the emotion that oppresses it—is speechless—and the song falls mute. Such is frequently the character—and the origin of that character—of our auld Scottish Songs. In their mournfulness are they not almost like the wail of some bird distracted on the bush from which its nest has been harried, and then suddenly flying away for ever into the woods? In their joyfulness, are they not almost like the hymn of some bird, that love-stricken suddenly darts from the tree-top down to the caresses that flutter through the spring? Yes, even such, too, are often the airs to which those dear auld songs are sung! From excess of feeling—fragmentary! Or of one divine part—to which genius may be defied to conceive another, for but one hour in all time could have given it birth!

“The moon was a-waning!”

Is not that ane o’ our ain Shepherd’s?
It is indeed a—snaw-sang.

DIRGE.

“The moon was a-waning,
The tempest was over;
Fair was the maiden,
And fond was the lover;
But the snow was so deep,
That his heart it grew weary,
And he sunk down to sleep,
In the moorland so dreary.

“Soft was the bed
She had made for her lover,
White were the sheets,
And embroider’d the cover;
But his sheets are more white,
And his canopy grander,
And sounder he sleeps
Where the hill foxes wander.

“Alas, pretty maiden,
What sorrows attend you!
I see you sit shivering,
With lights at your window;
But long may you wait
Ere your arms shall enclose him,
For still, still he lies,
With a wreath on his bosom!

“How painful the task
The sad tidings to tell you!—
An orphan you were,
Ere this misery befell you;
And far in yon wild,
Where the dead-tapers hover,
So cold, cold and wan,
Lies the corpse of your lover!”

Daughter of our soul! would that from thy lips, and set to thine own music, the Shepherd heard "The moon was a-waning," flow! The poet knows not the magic of his own strains, till he hears their inspiration in the breath of young and beautiful innocence. Then for the first time, perhaps, are his eyes wet with his own "repeated strains," and he feels that the virgin voice has, like a golden key, unlocked

"The sacred source of sympathetic tears!"

What sayeth our Shepherd himself, in one of the delightfully characteristic notes or notices, in the collection of his Songs—published this very day—of "The moon was a-waning?" "It is," quoth he, "one of the songs of my youth, written long ere I threw aside the shepherd's plaid, and took farewell of my barking colley, for a bard's perilous and thankless occupation. I was a poor shepherd half a century ago, and I have never got further to this day; but my friends would be far from regretting this, if they knew the joy of spirit that has been mine. This was the first song of mine I ever heard sung at the piano, and my feelings of exultation are not to be conceived by men of sordid dispositions. I had often heard my strains chanted from the ewe-bught and the milking-green with delight; but I now found that I had got a step higher; I, therefore, was resolved to cling to my harp, with a fondness which no obloquy should diminish—and I have kept the resolution. The song was first set to music and sung by Miss C. Forest, and has long been a favourite, and generally sung through a great portion of Scotland."

Yea, James—thou art but a poor shepherd still—poor in this world's goods—though Altrive Lake is a pretty little bit farmie—left to thee still—with its few laigh sheep—braes—its somewhat stony hayfield or two—its pasture where Cummie may unhungred graze—ayeuck for the potato's bloomy or ploomy shaws—and path-divided from the porch the garden, among whose flowers "wee Jamie" plays. But nature has given thee, to console thy heart in all disappointments, from the "false smiling of fortune beguiling," a boon which thou hast hugged to thy heart with transport on the darkest day—the "gift o' genie," and the power of immortal song!

And has Scotland to the Ettrick Shepherd been just—been generous—as she was—or was not—to the Ayrshire peasant—has she, in her conduct to him, shewn her contrition for her sin—whatever that may have been—to Burns? It is hard to tell. Fashion tosses the feathered head—and gentility turns away her painted cheek from the mountain bard; but when, at the shrine of true poetry, did ever such votaries devoutly worship? Cold, false, and hollow, ever has been their admiration of genius—and different, indeed, from their evanescent ejaculations, has ever been the enduring voice of fame. Scofn be to the scornors! But Scott, and Southey, and Byron, and the other great bards, have all loved the Shepherd's lays—and Joanna the palm-crowned, and Felicia the muse's darling, and Caroline the Christian poetess, and all the other fair female spirits of song. And in his native land, all hearts that love her streams, and her hills, and her cottages, and her kirks, the bee-humming garden, and the primrose-circled fold, the white hawthorn, and the green fairy-knowe, all delight in Kilmany and Mary Lee, and in many another vision that visited the Shepherd in the Forest. What more could he desire, than such sweet assurance that his name will never die—but be remembered among those of "The poets who, on earth, have made us heirs

Of truth and pure delight, by heavenly lays?"

Nor haply will the Old Man in future times be altogether forgotten, who, in moods of mirth or melancholy, still delighted to sound his dear Shepherd's praise! While others scowled, he smiled—nor was the Shepherd ungrateful for the sunshine that thus illumined the gloom, though it was poured from an urn which his own genius had filled with "golden light." We ever listened to his lyre—sounding sweetly to our ears in the wilderness—while all unheard by the ears of the worldlings amidst the smoke and air of their earthy life. We loved to look on his honest face by the light of his own ingle—or of his own Forest moon. And we, by aid of Gurney the Engrosser—have heaped up on his behalf, out of the exhaustless granary of his own genius, words not a few and many-coloured,

“All redolent of youth,” and of thoughts that, like perennial flowers, seemingly immortal in shade and sunshine, his imagination made rise from the seed it scattered lavishly and in profusion over a thousand hills. The face of the soul—is it not in its aspects—like the sky?

and when is that sky so beautiful—as when far-and-wide, and high-overhead, spread out in the bright or dim, the merry or mournful light of the star-studded Nocturns?

The most undefinable of all undefinable kinds of poetical inspiration are surely—Songs. They seem to start up indeed from the dew-prink-ed soil of a poet's soul, like flowers;
the first stanza being the hidden root, the second leaf, the third bud, and all the rest blossoms, till the song is like a stalk laden with its own beauty, and laying itself down in languid delight on the soft bed of moss—song and flower alike having the same “dying fall.”

Perhaps the above is pure nonsense—but then so pure that you need not fear to swallow it. All great song-writers, nevertheless, have been great thieves. Those who had the blessed fate to flourish first—to be born when “this auld cloak was new,”—the cloak we mean which nature wears—scrupled not to creep upon her as she lay asleep beneath the shadow of some single tree among

“The grave of forest-woods decay'd,
And pastoral melancholy,” and to steal the very pearls out of her hair—out of the silken snood which enamoured Pan himself had not untied in the Golden Age. Or if she ventured, as sometimes she did, to walk along the highways of the earth, they robbed her in the face of day of her dew-wrought reticule—without starting, however, the hand from which they brushed that net of gossam-er—a net of jewels and of diamonds

“Might ransom great kings from captivity.”

Then came the Silver Age of Song, the age in which we now live—and the song-singers were thieves still—stealing and robbing from them who had stolen and robbed of old; yet, how account you for that phenomenon—all parties remaining richer than ever —and Nature, especially, after all this thieving and robbery, and piracy and plunder, many million times richer than the day on which she received her dowry,

“The bridal of the earth and sky;”

and with “golden store” sufficient in its scatterings to enable all the sons of genius she will ever bear, to “set up for themselves” in poetry, accumulating capital upon capital, till each is a Cressus, rejoicing to lend it out without any other interest than cent per cent, paid in sighs, smiles, and tears, and without any other security than the silent promise of a quiet eye,

That broods and sleeps on its own heart!”

The most famous thieves in our time have been Rob, James, and Allan. Burns never saw or heard a jewel or a tune of a thought or a feeling, but he immediately made it his own—that is, stole it. He was too honest a man to refrain from such thefts. The thoughts and feelings—to whom by divine right did they belong? To Nature. But Burns beheld them “waif and stray,” and in peril of being lost for ever. He seized then on those “snatches of old songs,” wavering away into the same oblivion that lies on the graves of the nameless bards who first gave them being; and now spiritually in-terfused with his own lays, they are secured against decay—and like them immortal. So hath the Shepherd stolen many of the Flowers of the Forest—whose beauty had breathed there ever since Flodden's fatal overthrow; but they had been long fading and pining away in the solitary places, wherein so many of their kindred had utterly disappeared, and beneath the restoring light of his genius their bloom and their balm were for ever renewed. But the thief of all thieves is the Nithdale and Galloway thief—called by Sir Walter, most characteristically, “Honest Allan!” Thief and forger

as he is—we often wonder why he is permitted to live. Many is the sweet stanza he has stolen from Time—that silly auld carle who kens not even his own—many the lifelike line—and many the strange single word that seems to possess the power of all the parts of speech. And having stolen them, to what use did he turn the treasures? Why, unable to give back every man his own—for they were all dead, buried, and forgotten—by a potent prayer he evoked from his Pool-Palace, overshadowed by the Dalawinton woods, the Genius of the Nith, to preserve the gathered flowers of song for ever unwithered, for that they all had grown ages ago beneath and around the green shadows of Criffel, and longed now to be embalmed in the purity of the purest river that Scotland sees flowing in unsullied silver to the sea. But the Genius of the Nith—frowning and smiling—as he looked upon his son alternately in anger, love, and pride—refused the votive offering, and told him to begone—for that he—the Genius—was not a Cromek—and could distinguish with half an eye what had once belonged to antiquity, from what had undergone, in Allan's hands, change into "something rich and rare," and above all, from what had been blown to life that very year by the breath of his—Allan's—own genius, love-inspired by "his ain lassie," the "lass that he lo'd best," springing from seeds itself had sown, and cherished by the dew of the same gracious skies, that filled with motion and music—the transparency of his—that is, the river-god's—never-failing urn.

There will be no mystery in all this to the readers of a Winter Rhapsody by Christopher North. There, too, was Chatterton,

The sleepless soul that perish'd in his pride, like Burns, the Shepherd, and Allan Cunningham, Thief and Forger. And would not Horace Walpole O Lord! Orford—have punished him as a felon? "The sleepless boy" had committed forgery on old Rowley, and deserved death. Ay—he "perished in his pride," and his lordship lived on in his—till he became a lean and shrivelled panta-leon—and then withering heartlessly away to dust, left the legacy of an artificial light—which for a considerable period of time—by the by—really looks almost as well as the natural light of immortality—but which, in his case, is now wellnigh burnt out—left it in legacy to that—in our ears—somewhat ludicrously, though not unappropriately, named locality—Strawberry-hill, on which that illustrious lord—at once pantaloons and harlequin—clown he was not—by a few strokes of his lath built up that fantastic and unsubstantial Castle of Otranto—long ago fallen into rubbish.

Then what say you to the two Irelands—father and son? The junior—poor fellow—we pity him—for trying to pass himself off for—Shakespeare! As well might the new member for Preston—Mr Hunt—with a pot of his best blacking in his hand, pretend to be the old member for Paradise—the Angel Gabriel, with a cup in his hand of drink divine distilled from flowers of amaranth. But if the poor lad was a little—after all, not much—of a small knave in his own insignificant, yet not unisolemn way—why his attempt at deception was, in point of moral delinquency, the merest trifle—especially when you take his filial piety into account on the other side—in comparison with the more than Durham-ox-sized stupidity of the fat, if not stall-fed fools, who swore on their knees, that a bit of fusty musty fustian was a shred of the robes of light, which on earth the spirit of Shakespeare wore! Such a fool—fat if not stall-fed—we use these epithets, you will perceive, metaphorically—above the rest

"In shape and gesture proudly eminent," was Dr Parr! What could he—who thus bowed down before an image as expressionless as the block on which his own buzz-wig was trimmed, believing it to be the living Shakespeare—what could he, who, after looking steadfastly a hundred times, and for many minutes at a time, on a miserable grey-goose that had been having his quills plucked out of their sockets for months in a Lincolnshire earthenware, should swear before the whole ornithological world, by Jupter and Leda, that the waddling—live from the cavey was a Swan—we ask, what could such a sand-blind, wood-and-waddle worshipper, with all his knowledge of Greek roots and branches, know of the poetry of Homer, Pindar, and Æschylus?

But let us retrace our footsteps along the snow—for lo! there has been a fresh fall—to the Mausoleum of Burns. Scotland is abused by England for having starved Burns to death, or for having suffered him to drink himself to death, out of a cup filled to the brim with bitter disappointment and black despair. England “lies most foully in her throat;” there is our gage-glove, let her take it up, and then for mortal combat with sword and spear—only not on horseback—for, for reasons on which it would be idle to be more explicit, we always fight now on foot, and have sent our high horse to graze all the rest of his life on the mountains of the moon. Well then, Scotland met Burns, on his first sun-burst, with one exulting acclaim. Scotland bought and read his poetry, and Burns, for a poor man, became rich—rich to his heart’s desire—and reached the summit of his ambition, in the way of this world’s life, in a Farm. Blithe Robin would have scorned “an awmous” from any hands but from those of nature; nor in those days, needed he help from woman-born. True, that times began by and by to go rather hard with him, and he with them; for his mode of life was not

and as we sow we must reap. His day of life began to darken ere meridian—and the darkness doubtless had brought disturbance before either had been perceived by any eyes but his own—for people are always looking to themselves and their own lot; and oh! how much mortal misery may for years be daily depicted in the face, figure, or manners even of a friend, without our seeing or suspecting it, till all at once he makes a confession, and we then know that he has been long numbered among the most wretched of the wretched—the slave of his own sins and sorrows—or thrall’d beneath those of another to whom fate may have given sovereign power over his whole life! Well, then—or rather ill them—Burns behaved as most men do in misery—and the farm going to ruin—that is crop and stock to pay the rent—he desired to be—and was made—an Exciseman. And for that—you almsy—you are whinnying scornfully at Scotland! Many a better man than yourself—beg your pardon—has been, and is now, an Exciseman. Nay, to be plain with you—we doubt if your education has been sufficiently intellectual for an Exciseman. We never heard it said of you,

“And even the story ran that he could gauge.”

Burns then was made what he desired to be—what he was fit for—though you are not—and what was in itself respectable—an Exciseman. His salary was not so large certainly as that of the Bishop of Durham—or even of London—but it was certainly larger than that of many a curate at that time doing perhaps double or treble duty in those dioceses, without much audible complaint on their part, or outcry from Scotland against blind and brutal English bishops, or against beggarly England, for starving her pauper-curates, by whatever genius or erudition adorned. Burns died an Exciseman, it is true, at the age of thirty-seven; on the same day died an English curate we could name, a surpassing scholar, and of stainless virtue, blind, palsied, “old and miserably poor,”—without as much money as would bury him; and no wonder, for he never had the salary of a Scotch Exciseman.

Two blacks—nay twenty—won’t make a white. True—but one black is as black as another—and the Southern Pot, brazen as it is, must not abuse with impunity the Northern Pan. But now to the right ball, and let us knock it on the head. What did England do for her own Bloomfield? He was not in genius equal to Burns—but he was beyond all compare, and out of all sight, the best poet ever produced by England’s lower orders. He was the most spiritual shoemaker that ever handled an awl. The Farmer’s Boy is a wonderful poem—and will live in the poetry of England. Did England, then, keep Bloomfield in comfort, and scatter flowers along the smooth and sunny path that led him to the grave? No. He had given him, by some minister or other, we believe Lord Sidmouth, a paltry place in some office or other—most uncongenial with all his nature and all his habits—of which the shabby salary was insufficient to purchase for his family even the bare necessities of life. He thus dragged out for many long obscure years a sickly existence, as miserable as the existence of a good man can be made by narrow circumstances—and all the while Englishmen were scoffingly scolding, with haughty and bitter taunts, the patronage that, at his own earnest desire, made Burns an Exciseman! Nay, when Southey, late in Bloomfield's life, and when it was drawing mournfully to a close, proposed a contribution for his behoof, and put down his own L.5, how many purse-strings were untied? How much fine gold was poured out for the indigent son of genius and virtue? Shame shuffles the sun out of sight—for it was not sufficient to have bought the manumission of an old negro slave!

With many noble virtues, Burns was at last a man of a troubled, a distempered, a diseased moral mind—and even to know how to have done good to him—permanently—was most difficult; while in those disturbed and distracted times, still more difficult was it to carry into execution any designs for his good—and much was there even to excuse his countrymen then in power for looking upon him with an evil eye. But Bloomfield led a pure, peaceable, and blameless life. Easy, indeed, would it have been to make him happy—but he was as much forgotten as if he had been dead—and when he died—did England mourn over him—or after having denied him bread, give him so much as a stone? No. He dropt into the grave with no other lament, we ever heard of, but a few copies of indifferent verses in some of the Annals, and seldom or never now does one hear a whisper of his name. O fie! well may the white rose blush red—and the red rose turn pale! Let England then leave Scotland to her shame about Burns—and, thinking of her own treatment of Bloomfield, cover her own face with both her hands—and confess that it was most base. At least let her not impudently abuse us for the same sin—committed against greater genius, but less halloved by virtue;—and if she will not hang down her head in humiliation for her own neglect of her own "poetic child," let her not hold it high over Scotland for the neglect of hers—justified as that neglect was by many things—and since, in some measure, expiated by a whole nation's tears, shed over the laurels on her great poet's grave!

Whew! here have we been absolutely working ourselves up into a passion about two dead men!

"After life's fitful fever they sleep well," and peace now lies on both their graves in a shroud of snow!

Snow! Beautiful as it yet is to our eyes, even through our spectacles, how grey—in imagination—it looks beside the snow that used to come with the long winters that glorified the earth in our youth, till the white lustre was more delightful even than the green—and we prayed that the fine fleecy flakes might never cease falling waveringly from the veil of the sky. No sooner comes the Winter now, than he is away again to one of the poles. Then, it was a year in itself—a whole life. We remember slides a quarter of a mile long, on level meadows; and some not less deep, down the sides of hills that to us were mountains. No boy can slide on one leg now—not a single shoe seems to have sparables. The florid style of skating shews that that fine art is degenerating; and, except in a Torry, we look in vain for the grand simplicity of the masters that spread-eagled in the age of its perfection. A change has come over the spirit of the curler's dream. They seem to our ears indeed to have "quart their roaring play." The cry of "swoop-swoop" is heard still—but oh! a faint, feeble, and unimpassioned cry, compared with that that used, on the Mearns Brother-Loch, to make the welkin ring, and for a moment to startle the moon and stars—those in the sky, as well as those below the ice—till again the tumult subsided—and lo! all the host of heaven above and beneath serene as a world of dreams. Is it not even 40, Shepherd? Oh! what is a rink now on a pond in Duddingstone pottle, to the rinks that rang and roared of old on the Loch o' the Lowes, when every stone, circled in a glorious halo of spray, seemed instinct with spirit, to obey, along all its flight, the voice of him that launched it on its unerring aim, and sometimes, in spite of his awkward skilllessness, when the fate of the game hung on its own single crank, went cannonading through all obstacles, till it fell asleep, like a beauty as it was, just as it kissed the Tee!

Again we see—again we sit in the Snow-House, built by us boys out of a drift in the minister's glebe, a drift—judging by the steeple—which was sixty—about twenty feet high—and pure as marble. The roof was all strewn with diamonds, which frost saved from the sun. The porch of the Palace was pillared—and the character of the building outside, was, without any servile imitation—for we worked in the glow of original genius—and none of us had then ever seen itself or its picture—wonderfully like the Parthenon. Entering, you found yourself in a superb hall, lighted up—not with gas, for up to that era, gas had never been used except, in Pandemonium—but with a vast multitude of farthing-candles—each in a turnip stuck into the wall—while a chandelier of frozen snow-branches pendent from the roof set that presence-chamber in a blaze. On a Throne at the upper end sat Young Christopher North—then the king of boys, as now of men—and proud were his subjects to do him homage. In niches all round the side-walls were couches covered with hare, rabbit, foinmart, and foxes skins—furnished by those animals slain by us in the woods and among the rocks of that siltan and moorland parish—the regal Tytus alone being spread with the dun-deer's hide from Lochiel Forest in Locharber. Then old airs were sung—in sweet single voice—or in full chorus that startled the wandering night-traveller on his way to the lone Kingswell—and then in the intermediate push, old tales were told “of goblin-groom or fairy”—or of Wallace Wight at the Barns of Ayr, or the Brigg o' Stirling—or a glorious outlaw, harbouring in caves among the Cartlane Craigs,—or of Robert Bruce the Deliverer, on his sheltie, cleaving in twain the skull of Bohun the English knight, on his thundering war-steed, armed cap-à-pie, while the King of Scotland had nothing on his unconquered head but his golden crown. Tales of the Snow-house! Oh, that we had but the genius to recall you to life in undying song!

Nor was our Frozen Hall at times uncheered by the smiles of beauty. With those smiles was heard the harmless love-whisper, and the harmless kiss of love. For the cottages poured forth their little lasses in flowerlike bands, nor did their parents fear to trust them in the Fairy Frozen Palace, where Christopher was king. Sometimes the old people themselves came to see the Wonders of the Lamp, and on a snow-table stood a huge bowl—not of snow—that steamed with nectar that made Hyems smile as he hung his beard over the fragrant vapour. Nay, the minister himself—with his mother and sister—whose souls are now in heaven—were with us in our fantastic festivities—and gave to the architecture of our Palace their wondering praise. Then Andrew Lyndsey, the blind Paisley musician, a Latin scholar, who knew where Cremona stood—struck up on his famous fiddle, jig or strathspey—and the swept floor, in a moment, was alive, with a confused flight of four-some reels, each begun and ended with kisses, and inaddened by many a whoop and yell—so like savages were we in our glee, dancing at the marriage of some island king!

Fifty years have fled since that Snow-Palace melted away—and of all who danced there, how many are now alive! Pshaw! as many probably as then danced any where else. It would never do to live for ever—let us then live well and wisely—and when death comes—from that sleep how blessed to awake! In a region where is no front—no snow—but the sun of eternal life. Dreaming of that Snow-Palace—we remember the description of another by Cowper—more magnificent, no doubt—but to our imagination not half so dear!

“ Less worthy of applause, though more admired,
Because a novelty, the work of man,

Imperial mistress of the fur-clad Russ,
 Thy most magnificent and mighty freak,
 The wonder of the North. No forest fell,
 When thou wouldst build; no quarry sent its stores
 To enrich thy walls; but thou didst hew
 the floods,
 And make thy marble of the glassy wave.
 In such a palace Aristæus found
 Cyrene, when he bore the plaintive tale
 Of his lost bees to her maternal ear;
 In such a palace Poetry might place
 The armoury of Winter; where his troups,
 The gloomy clouds, find weapons, arrowy
 sleet,
 Skins-piercing volley, blossom-bruising
 hail,
 And snow, that often blinds the traveller's course,
 And wraps him in an unexpected tomb.
 Silently as a dream the fabric rose;
 No sound of hammer or of saw was
 there.
 Ice upon ice, the well-adjusted parts
 Were soon conjoin'd, nor other cement ask'd
 Than water interfused to make them one.
 Lamps gracefully disposed, and of all hues,
 Illumined every side, a watery light
 Glan'd through the clear transparency, that seem'd
 Another moon now risen, or meteor fall'n
 From Heaven to Earth, of lambent flame serene.
 So stood the brittle prodigy; though smooth
 And slippery the materials, yet frost-bound,
 Firm as a rock. Nor wanted aught within,
 That royal residence might well befit.
 For grandeur or for use. Long wavy vergas
 Of flowers, that fear'd no enemy but warmth,
 Blosh'd on the pannels. Mirror needed
 none
 Where all was vitreous; but in order due Convivial table and commodious seat (What seem'd at least commodious seat) were there;
 Sofa, and couch, and high-built throne
 august,
 The same lubricity was found in all,
 And all was moist to the warm touch;
 a sores
 Of evanescent glory, once a stream,
 And soon to slide into a steam again.
 Alas! 'twas but a mortifying stroke
 Of undesign'd severity, that glanced (Made by a monarch) on her own estate,

On human grandeur and the courts of kings.

'Twas transient in its nature, as in show
 'Twas durable; as worthless, as it seem'd Intrinsically precious; to the foot Treacherous and false; it smiled, and it was cold."

Mercy on us! what a hubbub!—
 Can the harriers be hunting in such a snow-fall as this, and is poor pussy in view before the whole murderous pack, opening in full cry on her haunches? Why—Imagination, thou art an ass, and thy long ears at all times greedy of deception! 'Tis but a Country School-house pouring forth its long imprisoned stream of life, as in a sudden sunny thaw, the Mad Master flying in the van of his helter-skelter scholars, and the whole yelling mass precipitated, many of them headlong, among the snow. Well do we know the fire-eyed Poet-Pedagogue, who, more outrageous than Apollo, has "ravished all the Nine."
 Ode, elegy, epic, tragedy, or farce—all come alike to him; and of all the bards we have ever known—and the sum-total cannot be under a thousand—he alone, judging from the cock and the squint of his eye, labours under the blessing or the curse—we wot not which it be—of perpetual inspiration. A rare eye, too, is his at the setting of a spring for wood-cocks, or tracking a mawkin on the snow. Not a dare-devil in the school that durst follow the indentations of his toes and fingers up the wall of the old castle to the holes just below the battlements, to thrust his arm up to the elbows harrying the martins' nests. The corbies ken the shape of his shoulders, as craftily he thrids the wood; and let them build their domicile as high as the swinging twigs will bear its weight, agile as squirrel, and as fourmart ferocious, up speels, by the height undizzied, the Dreadless Dominie; and should there be sledged or puddock-haired young ones among the wool, whirling with guttural cawings down a hundred feet descent, on the hard rooty ground-floor from which springs pine, oak, or ash, driven out is the life, with a squelsh and a squash, from the worthless carrion.
 At swimming we should not boggle to back him for the trifle of a cool hundred against the best survivor among those water-serpents, Mr.

Turner, Dr Bedale, Lieutenant Ekenhead, Lord Byron, Leander, and Ourselves—while, with the steel shiners on his soles, into what a set of ninnies in their ring would he not reduce the Edinburgh Skating Club!

Saw ye ever a Snow-ball Bicker? Never! Then look there with all the eyes in your head—only beware of a bash on the bridge of your nose, a bash that shall dye the snow in your virgin blood. The Port-Pedagogue, alias the Mad Dominie, has chosen the six stoutest stripplings for his allies, and, at the head of that Sacred Band, offers battle to Us at the head of the whole School. Nor does that formidable force decline the combat. Lo! how war levels all foolish distinctions of scholarship! Booby is Dux now, and Dux Booby—and the obscure dunce is changed into an illustrious hero.

"The combat deepens—on ye brave,
Who rush to glory or the grave!
Wave, Nitton," all thy banners wave,
And charge with all thy schoolery!"

Down from the mount on which it had been drawn up in battle array, in solid square comes the school-army, with shouts that might waken the dead, and inspire with the breath of life the nostrils of the Great Snow-Giant built up at the end of yonder avenue, and hardened like marble by last night's frost. But there lies a fresh fall—and a better day for a Bicker never rose flakily from the yellow East. Far out of distance, and prodigal of powder, lying three feet deep on the flats, and heaped up in drifts to tree and chimney-top, the tirailleurs, flung out in front, commence the conflict by a shower of balls that from the bosom of the yet untrodden snow between the two battles, makes spin the shining surface like spray. Then falling back on the main body, they find their places in the foremost rank, and the whole mottled mass, grey, blue, and scarlet, moves onwards o'er the whiteness, a moment ere they close,

"Calm as the breeze, but dreadful as the storm!"

"Let fly," cries a clear voice—and the Snow-ball-Storm hurtles through the sky. Just then the valley-mouth blew sleety in the faces of the foe—their eyes, as if darkened with snuff or salt, blinked bat-like—and with erring aim flew their feckless return to that shower of frosty fire. Incessant is the silent cannonade of the resistless School—silent but when shouts proclaim the fall or flight of some doughty champion in the adverse legion.

See—see—the Sacred Band are broken! The cravens take ignominiously to flight—and the Mad Dominie and Bob Howie alone are left to bear the brunt of battle. A dreadful brotherhood! But the bashing balls are showered upon them right and left from a hundred catapultic arms—and the day is going sore against them, though they fight less like men than devils. Hurra! the Dominie's down, and Bob staggers. "Guards, up and at them!" "A simultaneous charge of cocks, hens, and earrocks!" No sooner said than done. Bob Howie is buried—and the whole School is trampling on its Master!

"Oh, for a blast of that dread horn.
On Foutarabian echoes borne,

That to King Charles did come,
When Rowland brave and Olivier,
And every paladin and peer,

On Roncesvalles died!"

The smothered ban of Bob, and the stifled denunciations of the Dominie, have echoed o'er the hill, and, lo!

"Fierce as ten furies, terrible as hell,"

The Runaways, shaking the snows of panic from their shoulders,

"Like dew-drops from the lion's mane," come rushing to the rescue. Two of the Six tremble and turn. The high heroic scorn of their former selves urge the Four to renew the charge, and the sound of their feet on the snow is like that of an earthquake. What bashes on bloody noses! What bungings-up of eyes! Of lips what slittings! Red is many a spit-tle! And as the coughing urchin groans, and claps his hand to his mouth, distained is the snow-ball that drops unlaunched at his feet!

The School are broken—their hearts die within them—and—can we trust our blasted eyes?—the White Livers shew the white feather, and fly! O shame! O sorrow! O sin! they turn their backs and fly! Disgraced are the mothers that bore them—and “happy in my mind,” wives and widows, “were ye that died,” undoomed to hear the tidings of this wretched overthrow! Heavens and earth! sixty are flying before six!—and half of sixty—oh! that we should record it!—are pretending to be dead!! Would indeed that the snow were their winding-sheet, so that it might but hide their dishonour!

Lo! the Mad Dominie! like Hector issuing from the gates of Troy, and driving back the Greeks to their ships; or rather—heaf, Spirit of Homer!—like some great, shaggy, outlandish Wolf-Dog, that hath swum ashore from some strange wreck, and, after a fortnight's famine on the bare sea-cliffs, been driven by the hunger that gnaws his stomach like a cancer, and a thirst-fever that can only be slaked in blood, to venture prowling for prey up the vale, till, snuffing the scent of a flock of sheep—after some grim tiger-like creeping on his belly—he springs at last, with huge long spangs, on the woolly people, with bull-like growlings quailing their poor harmless hearts—and then fast throttling them, one after another—as it might seem rather in wantonness of rage than in empty pangs—he lies down at last in the midst of all the murdered carcases, licking the blood off his flews and paws—and then, looking and listening round with his red turbid eyes, and sharp-pointed ears savagely erect, conscious of his crime, and fearful of punishment—soon as he sees and hears that all the coast is clear and still, again he glowingly fastens his tusks behind the ears, and then eats into the kidneys of the fattest of the flock, till, sated with gore and tallow, he sneaks stealthily into the wood, and coiling himself up all his wiry length—now no longer lank, but swollen and knotted like that of a deer-devouring snake—he falls sullenly asleep, and re-banquets in a dream of murder!

That simile was conceived in the spirit of Dan Homer, but delivered in that of Kit North. No matter.

Like two such Wolf-Dogs are now Bob Howie and the Mad Dominie—and the School like such silly sheep. And lo! those other bell-dogs are leaping in the rear—and to the eyes of fear and flight each one of the Six seems more many-headed than Cerberus, while their mouths kindle the frosty air into fire, and thunderbolts pursue the pell-mell of the panic.

Such and so imaginative is not only mental but corporal fear! What though it be but a Snow-Bicker! The air, so far from being darkened, is brightened by the balls, as in many a curve they describe their airy flight—some hard as stones—some soft as slush—some blae and drippy in the cold-hot hand that launches them on the flying foes, and these are the teasers—some almost transparent to the cerulean sky, and broken ere they reach their aim, abortive “armamentaria cœli”—and some useless from the first, and felt, as they leave the palm, to be fozier than the foziest turnip, and unfit to bash a fly!

Far and wide, over hill, bank, and brae, are spread the flying School! Squads of them, and at sore sixes and sevens, are making for the frozen woods. Alas! poor covert now in their naked leaflessness for the stricken deer! Twos and threes, in miserable plight, floundering in drift-wreaths! And here and there—wofullest sight of all—single boys distractedly etling at the sanctuaries of distant houses—and with their heads all the while insanely twisted back over their shoulders, and the glare of their eyes fixed frightfully on the swift-footed Mad Dominie, souse over neck and ears, bubble and squeak, precipitated into traitorous pitfall, and in a moment vanished from this upper world!

Disturbed crows fly away a short distance—and alight silent—the magpies chatter pert even in alarm—the lean kine collected on the lown sides of braes, wonder at the ripple—their horns moving—but not their tails—while the tempest-tamed bull—almost dull now as an ox—gives a short sullen growl as he feebly paws the snow.

But who is he—the tall slender youth—slender, but sinewy—a wiry chap—seemingly six feet on his stocking-soles—and on his stocking-soles he stands—for the snow has sucked the shoes from his feet—that plants himself like an oak sapling, rooted ankle-deep on a knoll, and there, like a juvenile Jupiter Stator, with voice and arm arrests the flight, and fiercely gesticulating vengeance on the insolent foe, recalls and rallies the shattered School, that he may re-lead them to victory? The Phantom of a visionary dream! KIT NORTH HIMSELF—

“ In life’s morning march when his spirit was young.”

And once on a day was that Figure—Ours! Then like a chamois-hunter of the Alps! Now, alas, like—

“ But be hush’d, my dark spirit—for wisdom condemns,

When the faint and the feeble deplore;
Be strong as a rock of the ocean that stems

A thousand wild waves on the shore.
Through the perils of chance and the scowl of disdain,

Let thy front be unalter’d, thy courage elate;

Yea! even the name we have worshipp’d is vain

Shall awake not a pang of remembrance again;

To bear, is to conquer fate.

Half a century is annihilated as if it never had been—it is as if young Kit had become not old Kit—but were standing now as then front to front—with but a rood of trampled snow between them—before the Mad Dominic and Bob Howie—both the bravest of the brave in snow or stone-bicker—in street, lane, or muir-fight—hand to hand, or single-pitched with Black King Carey of the Gipsies—or in an irregular high-road row—two to twelve—with a gang of Irish horse-couper, from the fair of Glasgow returning by Portpatrick to Donaghadee. ’Tis a strange thing so distinctly to see one’s self as he looked of yore—to lose one’s present frail personal identity in that of the powerful past! Or rather to admire one’s self as he was, without consciousness of the mean vice of egotism, because of the pity almost bordering on contempt, with which one regards one’s self as he is, shrivelled up into a sort of shrimp of a man—or blown out into a flounder!

The Snow-Bicker owns an armie-tice—and Kit North—that is, We of the Olden and the Golden Time—advance into the debateable ground between the two armies with a frozen branch in our hand as a flag of truce. The Mad Dominic loved us, because then-a-days—bating and barring the cock and the squint of his eye—we were like himself a Poet, and while a goose continued standing on one leg, could have composed one jolly act of a tragedy, or book of an epic, while Bob, God bless him, to guard us from scathe, would have risked his life against a whole craal of tinkers. With open arms they come forward to receive us—but our blood is up—and we are jealous of the honour of the School which has received a stain which must be wiped out in blood. Oh! from what mixed motives act boys and men in the deeds deemed most heroic, and worthy of the meed of everlasting fame! Even so is it now with us—when sternly looking at the other Six, and then respectfully eying the Mad Dominic, to speak of ourselves almost in the language of Shakspeare—

“ The Prince of Wales stepp’d out before the king,

And challenged either of them to single fight:”

not at long bowls—but toe to toe at the scratch on the snow, with the naked mawlies—especially “ Yon trembling coward who forsook his master,”

the brawny boy with the red shock-head, the Craven with the carrots, who, by moonlight nights, had dared to stand between us and the Ladye of our Love. (Off fly our jackets and stocks—it is not a day for buff—and at it like bull-dogs. Twice before had we fought him—at our own option—over the bonnet—for ’twas a sturdy villain, and famous for the cross-buttock. But now, after the first close, in which we lose the fall—with straight right-handers, we keep him at off-fighting—and lo! a gush of blood from his sneller. “ How do you like that, Ben?” Giving his head, with a mad rush, he makes a plunge with his heavy left—for he was kerr-handed—at our stomach.

“ Round the stacks with the lasses at bogles to play.”

But a dip of our right elbow caught the blow, to the loud admiration of Bob Howie—and even the Mad Dominie—the umpire—could not choose but smile. Like lightning, our left returns between the ogles—and Ben bites the snow. Three cheers from the school—and, lifted on the knee of his second, Jamie Wallace, since signalized at Waterloo, and now a Colonel of Horse—

"He grins horribly a ghastly smile," and is brought up staggering to the scratch. We know that we have him—and ask considerably, "what he means by winking?" And now we play around him,

"Just like unto a trundling mop,
Or a wild goose at play."

He is brought down now to our own weight—then ten stone jump—his eyes are momentarily getting more and more piglike—water-logged, like those of Queen Bleary, whose stone-image lies in the echoing aisle of the old Abbey-church of Paisley—and, bat-blind, he hits past our head and body—like an awkward hand at the flail, when drunk, thrashing corn. Another hit on the smeller—and a stinger on the throat-apple—and down he sinks like a poppy—deaf to the call of time—and victory smiles upon us from the bright blue skies. "Hurra—hurra—hurra! Christopher for ever!" and perched aloft, astride on the shoulders of Bob Howie—He, the Invincible, gallops with us all over the field, followed by the shouting School, exulting that Ben the Bully has at last met with an over-throw. We exact an oath from him that he will never again meddle with Meg Whitelaw—shake hands cordially—and

"Off to some other game we all together flaw."

And so ended the famous Snow-Bicker of Pedmount, now immortalized in our Prose-Poem.

FYTTE IV.

SOME men, it is sarcastically said, are boys all life-long, and carry with them their pucillity to the grave. 'Twould be well for the world were there in it more of those

"Sound, healthy children of the God of heaven."

By way of proving their manhood, we have heard grown-up people abuse their own boyhood—forgetting what our great philosophical poet has told them, that

"The boy is father of the man."

and thus libelling the author of their existence. A poor boy indeed must he have been, who submitted to misery when the sun was new in heaven. Did he hate or despise the flowers around his feet, congratulating him on being young like themselves? The stars, young always, though heaven only knows how many million years old, every night sparkling in happiness which they manifestly wished him to share? Did he indeed in his heart believe that the moon, in spite of her shining mid-night face, was made of green cheese? Or as Bloomfield said of Suffolk kibbock,

"Of three-times skimm'd sky-blue?"

Not only are the foundations dug and laid in boyhood, of all the knowledge and the feelings of our prime, but the ground-flat too built, and often the second story of the entire superstructure, from the windows of which, the soul looking out, beholds nature in her state, and leaps down, unafraid of a fall on the green or white bosom of earth, to join with hymns the front of the procession. The soul afterwards perfects her palace—building up tier after tier of all imaginable orders of architecture—till the shadowy roof, gleaming with golden cupolas, like the cloud-region of the setting sun, sets the heavens a-blaze.

Gaze up on the most glorious idea—gaze down on the most profound emotion—and you will know and feel in a moment that it is not a new birth. You become a devout believer in the Pythagorean and Platonic, and Wordsworthian doctrine of metempsychosis and reminiscence, and are awed by the mysterious consciousness of the thought "BEFORE!" Try then to fix the date of any high feeling, and back travels your soul, now groping its way in utter darkness, and now in darkness visible—now launching along long lines of steady lustre, such as the moon throws on the broad bosoms of starry lakes

—now arrayed in sudden contrast,
and

“Blind with excess of light!”

But back let it travel as best or worst it may, through and amidst eras after eras of the wan or radiant past, yet never, never, except for some sweet instant of delusion breaking dew-drop-like at a touch, a breath—never, never during all that perilous pilgrimage—and perilous must it be, haunted by so many ghosts—may the soul reach or rest at the shrine it seeks—at the fountain from which first flowed that feeling whose origin seems to have been out of the world of time—dare we say—in eternity!

Read now Wordsworth's sublime
Ode, “Intimations of Immortality from Recollections of Early Childhood,” and acknowledge—Thou who hast so foolishly scorned that Season so near the Sources—that there are “more things in heaven and earth than are dreamt of in your philosophy.” Study but this one stanza—and ever after let thy cradle—creaking and uncomfortable though it may have been to thy peerish self and all the household—ideally rock in the light of consecration.

“Our birth is but a sleep and a forgetting
The soul that rises with us, our life's star,
Hath had elsewhere its setting,

And cometh from afar

And not in utter nakedness,

Not in entire forgetfulness,

But trailing clouds of glory, do we come

From God, who is our home

Heaven lies about us in our infancy!

Shades of the prison-house begin to close

Before the growing boy,

But he beholds the light, and whence it flows—

He sees it in his joy;

The youth, who daily farthest from the east

Must travel, still is nature's priest,

And by the vision splendid

Is on his way attended;

At length the man perceives it die away,
And fade into the light of common day.”

But let us make our escape from the Eleusinian Mysteries of this esoteric creed—and present a plain practical exposition of exoteric doctrine to our pupils, the people—the great run of the race. “Be ye educated all,” we cry, but that cry being interpreted, means, “Educate yourselves;” and that again signifies, “In whatever school you study, let the head master—we beg her pardon—the head mistress—be Nature! A man or woman may be taught many things out of primers when well-stricken in years. But there are far more things needful for them to know, beyond the communicating power of Brougham or Birkbeck.

Oh! that life were so constituted in our land, that every human soul might have fair play in this world of trial! But alas! how many millions of them we call free are born—and bred—live and die—slaves! Here in this Island,

“Set like an emerald in the silver sea,” hath slavery, and the slave-trade, established their strongholds. No day-denied diggers.

“Plunged deep down beneath the swarthy mine,”

are more hopelessly shut out from the “Sun's glad beams,” than are the melancholy millions whom we insult, by telling them that they are free, because, forsooth, Briton-born!
Plutus is our God—and all his idolaters are at once tyrants and slaves.
True—and thank God for it—the lash falls not here, on the bare back of the pauper—if he withhold his horny hands from crime. If he do not, then away with him to the Hulks—
the Bermudas, or the Gallows. But a lash of scorpions is inflicted on his heart. The scourge of the mid-day sun smites him—the moon sees his wan face at work—and yet, the wretch—toil as he may, till he is sweated to the briek of death—starves mid a starving family—and is buried at the expense of the parish
—a skeleton.

What an exaggerated picture!

“Methinks we hear some gentle spirit cry.”

Yes—it is exaggerated far beyond the truth—as a picture of the common condition of the common people. But not more so—not so much so—as the pictures of female negro-slaves, kneeling, with fettered legs and arms, under the cart-whip of Saracen-headed overseers. Both are true—and both are false—true as individual pictures—alas! too many—false as general pictures of slavery, either in corn and cotton, or sugar and rum Islands. But here the misery is at our own doors—and within reach not only of our open eyes, but of our open hands—yet it groans and growls unheeded by those sensual sentimentalists that run in search of wretchedness that raves beyond seas, and turn aside—not that they may not trample upon—but that they may escape relieving him—the beggar perishing on the pavement, within a few steps of their own porch. And this is—Charity!

Under such a system, the political economist comes forward with his Manual of the Best Means of removing Misery—and let us for a moment notice his nostrums—let Christopher North, in his Winter Rhapsody, follow John Ramsay McFulloch in his—and let the world decide to which Rhapsodist the greater portion of common sense belongs—whether in our poetical-prose, or his prose-prose, be embarked the richest freightage of truth.

"The weavers and other mechanics of Glasgow, Manchester, and Birmingham," quoth our rhapsodizing sage, "possess infinitely more general and extended information than is possessed by the agricultural labourer of any county in the empire. And this is exactly what a more unprejudiced enquiry into the subject would have led us to anticipate. The various occupations in which the husbandman is made necessarily to engage, their constant liability to be affected by so variable a power as the weather, and the perpetual change in the appearance of the objects which daily meet his eyes, and with which he is conversant, occupy his attention, and render him a stranger to that ennui and desire for extrinsic and adventitious excitement which must ever be felt by those who are constantly engaged in burnishing the point of a pin, or in performing the same endless routine of precisely similar operations. This want of excitement cannot, however, be so cheaply or effectually gratified in any other way as it may be by cultivating—that is, by stimulating—the mental powers. The generality of workmen have no time for dissipation; and if they had, the wages of labour in all old-settled and densely peopled countries are too low, and the propensity to save and accumulate too powerful, to permit any very large proportion of them seeking to divert themselves by indulging in riot and excess. They are thus driven to seek for recreation in mental excitement; and the circumstances under which they are placed, afford them every possible facility for amusing and diverting themselves in this manner. By working together, they have constant opportunities of entering into conversation; and a small individual contribution enables them to obtain large supplies of newspapers, and of the cheaper kinds of periodical publications."

This does not seem to us to be by any means an example of the successful application of Moral to Economical Science. The Rhapsodist attributes the mental inferiority of the agricultural labourer to the very causes which all other enquirers have agreed in considering of most beneficial influence on the moral and intellectual being of the peasant—to the various occupations in which he is engaged, under all varieties of weather—the perpetual change in the appearance of the objects which daily meet his eye—and all the alternations of employment which, throughout all the seasons of the year, enliven and diversify rural life. These, all other people we ever heard of, have agreed in thinking to be in themselves an innocent and salutary excitement; but the Rhapsodist laments that they leave the peasant a stranger to that far more beneficial ennui and desire for extrinsic excitement which is ever felt by those who are constantly engaged in burnishing the point of a pin! Why, worthy sir, if the feelings and thoughts—the moral and intellectual being of the peasant be awakened by his occupations—and who dare deny they are?—what better excitement would you, a Christian moralist and political economist, desire that he should enjoy? The business is already done to your hands by the hands of nature—and little or nothing left to be done by you or similar sages.

Ennui! Why, we had no notion that this fashionable complaint had become epidemic among the weavers and other mechanics of Glasgow, Manchester, and Birmingham. How romantic a pensive cotton-spinner pining in ennui! The blue-devils plaguing the spinning-jenny and the power-loom, and moping in a pin-manufactory!

But our Rhapsodist could not have had all his wits about him when he represented his friends the weavers, and other mechanics, preyed upon by this moon-eyed demon. "By working together," quoth he, "they have constant opportunities of entering into conversation." Have they? How then, our good but inconsistent and self-contradicting sir, can they be subject to ennui, though "engaged in burnishing the point of a pin?" They must be all as joyous as larks—stored as their minds must be "by large supplies of newspapers, and of the cheaper kinds of periodical publications." Pray, sweet Rhapsodist, do explain to us how, and why, and wherefore, those extensively informed mechanics, all enjoying "constant opportunities of entering into conversation," should be the victims of ennui, and of the blue-devils?

But we ask our Rhapsodist, and surely one Rhapsodist may question another, without offence, on the common subject-matter of their Rhapsodies,—is the peasant less disposed to cultivate his mind by reading or conversation at his own fireside, after his day's darg in the field, than the artificer, or artisan, or mechanic of any kind, after his day's darg in his crowded workshop? Or, is he less capable—more incapacitated for then and there doing so? We should think not. Let them be held equally disposed and equally capable—and no sincere lover of his kind, or of truth, will wish more for the one than for the other—yet few will deny that the rural labourer has some advantage here in the comparative calm, in the quiet and seclusion, and in the old-established simplicity of the primeval life of man, of which the spirit has not yet altogether left our land, and of which may the traces, however faint in too many places, never be obliterated.

The character of the peasantry of Scotland can speak for itself—nobly and well—and some of its finest spirits have by their genius consecrated to every feeling and thinking heart, their habits, their manners, their customs, their affections, their living abodes, and the graves in the kirkyard, where

'The rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep!'

Scotland has yet just reason to be proud of her peasantry, who can understand and rejoice in the pictures of their own life, painted by Ramsay, Hogg, Cunningham, and Burns. Our Rhapsodist may care little or nothing for any of these things; what he desiderates in the Scotch peasant is "more general and extended information," such as is possessed by the mechanics of Glasgow, Manchester, and Birmingham; and from what sources—pray—is this kind of general and extended information of those mechanics derived? Our Rhapsodist has been so kind and considerate as to tell us, "from a large supply of newspapers, and of the cheaper kinds of periodical works!" Not much amiss in their way, perhaps, sometimes—but why may not the peasant too occasionally drink from the same pure and consecrated source? "A large supply," indeed, he can hardly hope for, either in solitary hut or social clachan—he desires it not—nor, in our poor opinion, would he be the better of it—but if whiggishly inclined, he can contrive regularly to see The Scotsman—now much more wholesome food for the poor man, be he mechanic or peasant, than it once was—and if he be a Tory—which we hope he is—then he may let the cheaper class of periodical works go to the dogs, and brighten his heart and his hearth with Blackwood's Magazine. But besides Maga and the Scotsman—who live like man and wife—that is like cat and dog—there are other works to be found in the "Peasant's Nest," which we fear may be too often looked for in vain in the dwellings of the mechanics of Glasgow, Manchester, and Birmingham, with all their more "general and extended information." Our peasants have their old songs and ballads that brighten up antiquity before their eyes—they have their fireside tales and traditions—they have histories, true or fabulous, or a mixture of truth and fable—no bad reading in its way—they have not seldom a few books of still more serious and solemn import—What say you, Mr M'Culloch, to some volumes of sermons, odd or in sets—with other works on Theology or Divinity—perhaps natural as well as revealed—forming on the window-sole of the spence, or on the top of the chest of drawers in the gudeman's ain room, or haply in the awmery, safe from moth, fly, or spider, a small moral and religious library, which, when they have read it all through once, they may e'en read again;—and to crown all—and oftener read of old than all, they have

"The big Ha'-bible, since their father's pride."

It is no easy matter, we hold, to ascertain the comparative acuteness and intelligence of classes of men so very different from each other in all their habits, manners, and ways of life, as the mechanics of great manufacturing towns, and men employed in agriculture. We presume that in all things immediately appertaining to their own respective occupations, they are pretty much on a par; but the townsman will probably be more ready and communicative than the countryman, and more fluent in speech. Many things too, of a fleeting interest, he will know something about, probably not much—of which the other is entirely ignorant; and perhaps it may be said with truth, that his information is likely to be rather more miscellaneous. But can the quantity of mere knowledge possessed by the generality of weavers, or by the generality of rural labourers either, be very considerable? We suspect not. We must look, therefore, rather to the quality; and to us—we confess, though we speak if not hesitatingly, not dogmatically—the quality of the knowledge of the rural labourer seems to be, in general, the better of the two—for his, in general, is a knowledge more strictly appertaining to his own essential interests—his interests not as a labourer only, anxious, and properly anxious, about the rise or fall of wages, and thinking himself, not so properly, acquainted with the laws by which they are regulated, but as a human being with a heart and a soul that can overflow with rational happiness, when the implements of labour are laid aside for the night, and he may, for an hour or so before going to bed, refresh himself with an hour's reading, an hour's thought, or an hour's conversation with his household. Mere information, such as an intellectual weaver may possess—however useful and honourable to him—cannot of itself constitute real worth; and we must find something else in him of far higher value, before we can speak proudly of his character. We must not, in our estimation of a man's worth, rate too highly his mere knowledge, however "general and extensive," after the fashion of that of the more enlightened among the weavers and other mechanics of Glasgow, Manchester, or Birmingham. It is a tendency of the times to do so; and philanthropists seem now-a-days satisfied, if the lower orders be what is called tolerably intelligent, not looking into their hearts with a humane concern for that far better well-being, without which they may be good men in the market, but any thing but good men in their own houses—and seldom or never at church. This is not said with any view of disparaging plans for the Education of the People; for he who would deny education to any one of his brethren, would thereby shew that his own had been neglected or perverted; but it is said with the view of condemning as worthless—or worse than worthless—such education as our Rhapsodist eulogizes, one derived from "a large supply of newspapers, and the cheaper kinds of periodical works;" or if that be not his meaning, an education which, when "perfected," induces the "weaver or other mechanic," whom it has enlightened, to devote all his leisure hours to such sources of that "more general and extended information," by which he is made so very inferior a being to the poor peasant who may rarely see but one newspaper, and that one not till it be as old at least as the full moon. Granting then, for a moment, to our Rhapsodist, that the "weavers and other mechanics of Glasgow, Manchester, and Birmingham," are generally much more acute—which, now that the moment is gone, we beg leave most peremptorily to deny, and utterly to "reprobate the idea"—than the peasants of the Carse of Gowrie, or the shepherds of Tweeddale—that acuteness would weigh little with us in our estimate of the worth of their character; for such sort of acuteness is very often found to belong to men of little or no moral feeling, and of the most profligate habits. It is not a quality—however useful it may be—that of itself excites much respect; nor ought it, on any account, to be singled out as the quality by which we are to try, as by a test, even the intellectual—much less surely the moral characters—of different orders of men.

With regard to the general and extended information of the weavers and other mechanics of Glasgow, Manchester, and Birmingham, we confess ourselves somewhat sceptical. Very remarkable men sometimes appear among them; and generally speaking, their information is creditable to the class. But Scotland this day as of old—and we speak of Scotland, simply because we happened to be born and now live there—has many men among her rural population of a far higher and nobler stamp. Perhaps to the formation or upholding of such characters, a rural life is essential. Setting them out of the question—such peasants, shepherds, and herdsmen as would try the intellectual strength of both us Rhapsodists, and haply give us a fall—and whose moral and religious character is worthy not of admiration but reverence; the inhabitants of the country—in the northern part of our island—have hitherto been far better educated than those of any of the towns in Britain, and taking one with another, have been a higher order of human beings. The education that made them so, has never been of the kind eulogised by our Rhapsodist; for, by his own account, they have never had “a large supply of newspapers, and of the cheaper sort of periodical works.”

Our Rhapsodist, in speaking of human nature, speaks like an Oracle. We do not mean that he speaks as if he were inspired; but, sitting like a priest, on the stuffed leather of a tripod, in the penetralia of his own study-shrine, he thence, in a gruff voice, coughs forth responses, which, wise as they may look, are far indeed from setting at rest the General Question. Thus, our Oracular Rhapsodist declares that the mechanics in large towns are not permitted by the laws of human nature to divert themselves by indulging in riot and excess. “The propensity to save and accumulate is too powerful!” That propensity, powerful as it is, it seems to us, who are no Sir Oracle, is often met by another as powerful, and

“When Greek meets Greek, then comes the tug of war!”—

We mean the propensity to spend and scatter. Many, it is true, are the close-fisted fellows among mechanics in large towns—absolute misers—who contrive to sneak through social life without ever paying their shot. Such scamps are generally sober—they have not the souls to get drunk. But treat them to blazes of blue ruin—and they make their first appearance, with distinguished success, in the character of David’s Sow. But how many open-handed lads there are, who are miserable till they have melted their wages—whether paid in paper or gold—into the curse of life! The country mechanics are neither misers nor spend-thrifts—but anxious, from the dictates of reason, to save and accumulate, and desirous, from the dictates of passion, to spend and scatter—and hence their mixed and melancholy life—its lights and shadows—one week drunk and another sober—for nature permits, nay, impels, her children to display inconsistencies of conduct that must often perplex our Rhapsodist, in his most dogged determination to see all men who live in large towns, in old-settled countries, not only unable, from low wages, to divert themselves, by indulging in riot and debauchery, but not permitted to do so, by “the powerful propensity to accumulate and save;” all setting their faces against every kind of intoxication, whether of women or wine; and by the saving grace of the “auri sacra fames,” (our Rhapsodist’s darling quotation from the Classics,) led past the temptation of the open doors of sin!

That mechanics, in great towns, in old-settled countries, have seldom wages high enough to enable or induce any great part of them to indulge in dissipation, we must, in spite of our Rhapsodist’s imperious dictum, say that nobody who knows any thing of the ruinous fluctuations incident to manufactures through commerce, can for a moment believe. That the majority are tolerably well-behaved and sober, in ordinary times, we cheerfully grant; but a man must shut his eyes, and put cotton into his ears, who intends to walk the streets of a great manufacturing town, even by day—and if by night, he had better leave both his eyes and ears at home—without seeing and hearing the din and disorder of a wide-spread and profligate dissipation. Ennui itself—the plague it seems of unwashed artificers—although it possibly may make those who suffer under it, fly for relief to newspapers and the cheaper sort of periodical works—will far more frequently, we should opine, drive them to the gin-shop, or worse places—or to the druggists' shops—for we have heard that there are vulgar opium-eaters. But banishing Ennui to fashionable or genteel life—our Rhapsodist is a dreamer among men indeed, if he seriously believes that in old-settled countries, mechanics do not too often, and in miserable numbers—get drunk. His creed looks like the crotchet of some hare-brained rural sentimentalist, poetizing about towns, and not like an opinion adopted from reflection, observation, experience, and reason, by the Professor of Political Economy in the University of London.

Our Rhapsodist says by "cultivating, that is, stimulating—the mental powers." With what an air of grand simplicity he lets his dogmata drop from his lips, or trickle from his pen! You may stimulate a mechanic's or a peasant's mental powers by such reading as shall poison or kill his soul. You may stimulate them so as to impel him to burn stacks and break machinery—and thus elevate him to the gallows. Nor do we know any other kind of reading more likely to do so than that of "a large supply of newspapers, and the cheaper kinds of periodical works"—for they are not all like the tracts circulated by the Society for Useful and Entertaining Knowledge—and many of them are as inflammatory—as stimulative, as if edited by "Swing." Strong spirits stimulate—but they destroy—and cheap gin, bad as it is for soul and body, for the corporeal and for the mental powers, is not more so than the cheap paper-poison of the incendiary Press. "Cultivating, that is, stimulating!" and this is the secret—of Education for the People!

To know what is the real character and condition either of the town or country population of this kingdom, we must look a little deeper into both than our Rhapsodist, and not content ourselves with such a very superficial survey. The condition of rural labourers is certainly more steadfast than that of manufacturing workmen; and therefore whatever good and useful qualities of mind, or habits of conduct, are naturally formed and fostered by such influences, will and must belong to the one rather than to the other. Such qualities and habits are of vast importance to the virtue and happiness of human beings; and therein the rural population certainly have the advantage. It is a blessing belonging to their condition, and breathing its influence over their whole life. Nor does it at all disprove the truth of this, that bad governments have it in their power to break in upon and disturb, and even, indeed, reverse this law. To such thwarting and counteracting causes all modes and conditions of life are alike subject; but we have spoken of what would happen, were the agency of natural laws not grievously nullified or worse, by the ignorance and folly of pretended science.

Finally, will our Rhapsodist doubt or deny, that in large towns and cities vice has its haunts and its strongholds? There is comparative innocence in the country. The human heart, indeed, is the same in a crowded lane and in a lonely valley; and it often remains the same—nay, the virtue of self-denial, and of "holding fast its integrity," and of turning away in stern disdain of pollution, is often witnessed—oftener it triumphs unwitnessed—in the corruption of a great city, than in the untainted air of rural life. Such conquests are great, and "verily they shall have their reward." But on the whole, is there not a lower tone of morality—more laxity of manners among the inhabitants of cities—high as well as low—but of the low alone we now speak—than among country people? A greater license in all things is allowed—one family is not such a check upon another—that moral inquisition, which conscience herself establishes in the country, cannot be in cities—evil deeds can be concealed there, or lost in the crowd—and there is the infection and the contagion of the Plague of Evil.

Gentle and judicious reader! to the side of which Rhapsodist dost thou incline?

But let us away like a Flamingo to other scenes over the trackless snow.

What do you mean by original genius? By that fine line in the Pleasures of Hope—

“To muse on Nature with a poet’s eye?”

Why—genius—one kind of it at least—is transfusion of self into all outward things. The genius that does that—naturally, but novelly—is original—and now you know the meaning of one kind of original genius. Have we, then, Christopher North, that gift? Have you? Yea, both of us. Our spirits animate the insensate earth, till she speaks, sings, smiles, laughs, weeps, sighs, groans, goes mad, and dies. Nothing easier, though perhaps it is wicked, than for original genius like ours, or yours, to drive the earth to distraction. We wave our wizard hand thus—and lo! list! she is insane. How she howls to heaven, and how the maddened heaven howls back her frenzy! Two dreadful maniacs raging apart, but in communion, in one vast bedlam! The drift-snow spins before the hurricane, hissing like a nest of serpents, let loose to torment the air. What fierce flakes! furies! as if all the wasps that ever stung had been revived, and were now careering part and parcel of the tempest. We are in a Highland Hut in the midst of mountains. But no land is to be seen any more than if we were in the middle of the sea. Yet a wan glare shews that the snowstorm is strangely shadowed by superincumbent cliffs; and though you cannot see, you hear the mountains. Rending are going on, frequent, over your head—and all around the blind wilderness—the thunderous tumbings down of avalanches, mixed with the moanings, shriekings, and yellings of caves, as if spirits there were angry with the snow-drift choking up the fissures and chasms in the cliffs. Is that the creaking, and groaning, and rocking, and tossing of old trees, afraid of being uprooted and flung into the spate?

“Red comes the river down, and loud and oft

The angry spirit of the water shrieks, more fearful than at midnight in this nightlike day—whose meridian is a total sun eclipse. The river runs by, bloodlike, through the snow—and, short as is the reach you can see through the flaky gloom, that short reach shews that all his course must be terrible—more and more terrible—as, gathering his streams like a chieftain his clan—ere long he will sweep shieling, and hut, and hamlet to the sea, undermining rocks, cutting mounds asunder, and blowing up bridges that explode into the air with a roar like that of cannon. You sometimes think you hear thunder, though you know that cannot be—but sublimer than thunder is the nameless noise so like that of agonized life—that eddies far and wide around—high and huge above—fear all the while being at the bottom of your heart—an objectless, dim, dreary, undefinable fear, whose troubled presence—if any mortal feeling be so—is indeed sublime. Your imagination is troubled, and dreams of death, but of no single corpse, of no single grave. Nor fear you for yourself, for the Hut in which you enjoy the storm, is safer than the canopied cliff-calm of the eagle’s nest; but your spirit is convulsed from all its deepest and darkest foundations, as if by a soul-quake, and all that lay hidden there of the wild and wonderful, the pitiful and the strange, the terrible and pathetic, is now upturned in dim confusion, and imagination working among the secret treasures of the heart, creates out of them moods kindred and congenial with the hurricane, intensifying the madness of the heaven and the earth, till that which sees, and that which is seen, that which hears, and that which is heard, undergo alternate mutual transfiguration; and the blind Roaring Day—at once substance, shadow, and soul—is felt to be one with ourselves, and the blended whole, either the Live-Dead, or the Dead-Alive!

We are in a Highland Hut—if we called it a Shieling, we did so merely because we love the sound of the word Shielling, and the image it at once brings to eye and ear—the rustling of leaves on a summer silvan bower, by simple art slightly changed from the form of the growth of nature, or the waving of fern on the turf-roof and turf-walls, all covered with wild-flowers and mosses, and moulded by one single season into a knoll-like beauty, beside its guardian birch-tree, insupportable to all evil spirits, but with its silvery stem and drooping tresses, dear to the Silent People that won in the land of peace. Truly this is not the sweet Shielling-season, when, far away from all other human dwellings, on the dip of some great mountain, quite at the head of a day's-journey-long glen, the young herdsman, haply all alone, without one single being with him that has the use of speech, liveth for months retired far from kirk and cross—Leath his sole companion—his sole care the pasturing flocks—and when their beat is silent, the sole sounds he hears the croak of the raven on the cliff, or bark of the eagle in the sky! O sweet, solitary lot of lover! Haply in some oasis in the wilderness, some steadfast gleam of emerald light amid the hyacinthine-bue of the heather, that young herdsman hath pitched his tent, by one Good Spirit haunted morning, noon, and night, through all those sunny, moonlight, starry months,—the Orphan-girl, whom years ago her dying father gave into his arms—the old blind soldier—knowing that the boy would shield her innocence—when every blood-relation had been buried—now Orphan-girl no more, but sitting—growing there—like a lily at the Shielling porch, or winging sweeter than any bird—the happiest of all living things—her own dark-haired Ronald's Bride.

We are in a Highland Hut among a Highland Snow-storm—and all at once the dreams of fancy and imagination fade, and is heard by the heart amidst the roar of the merciless hurricane. We remember the words of Burns—the peerless Peasant—and simple as they are, with what profound pathos are they charged!

“The still sad music of humanity”

“List’ning the doors an’ winnocks rattle,
I think me on the ourle cattle,
Or silly sheep, wha bide this brattle
O’ winter war,
And thro’ the drift, deep-lairing sprattle,
Beneath a scour!

Ilk happing bird, wee, helpless thing,
That, in the merry months o’ spring,
Delighted me to hear thee sing,
What comes o’ thee?
Whar wilt thou cow’r thy chittering wing,
An’ close thy ee?

Ev’n you on murdering errands toll’d,
Lone from your savage homes exiled,
The blood-stain’d roost, and sheep-cote
spoil’d,

My heart forgets,
While pitiless the tempest wild
Sore on you beats.”

Burns is our Lowland bard—but poetry is poetry all over the world, when streamed from the life-blood of the human heart. So sang the Genius of inspired humanity in his tree-sheltered “auld clay-biggie,” in one of the vales of Coila, where gently swell the “banks and braes o’ bonny Doon;” and now our heart responds the strain, high up among the Celtic cliffs, central among a sea of mountains lurking hidden in a snow-storm that enshrouds the daylight. Aye—the one single door of this Hut—the one single “winnock,” does “rattle”—by fits—as the blast smites it, in spite of the white mound drifted hill-high all round the almost buried dwelling. Dim through the peat-reek cower the figures in tartan—fear has hushed the cry of the infant in the swinging cradle—and all the other imps are mute. But the household is thinner than usual at the meal-hour; and feet that loved to follow the red-deer along the bent, now fearless of pitfalls, have been, since the first lower of morning light, traversing the tempest. The shepherds, who sit all day long, when summer hues are shining, and summer flowerets blow, almost idle in their plaids, beneath the shadow of some rock watching their flocks feeding above, around, and below, now expose their bold breasts to all the perils of the pastoral life. This is our Arcadia—a realm of wrath—woe—danger, and death. Here are bred the men whose blood—when the bagpipe blew—has been prodigally poured forth on a thousand shores. The limbs strung to giant-force by such snows as these, moving in line of battle within the shadow of the Pyramids,

"Brought from the dust the sound of liberty,"

while the Invincible standard was lowered before the heroes of the Old Black Watch, and victory out of the very heart of defeat arose on "that thrice-repeated cry" that quells all foes that madly rush against the banners of Albion. The storm

"That keeps the paven quiet in her nest," and has frozen in his eyry the eagle's wing, driven the deer to the comb beneath the cliffs, and all night imprisoned the wild-cat in his cell, hand in hand, as is their wont when crossing a stream or flood, bands of Highlanders now face in its strongholds, all over the ranges of mountains, come it from the wrathful inland or the more wrathful sea.

"They think upon the curie cattle
And silly sheep,"

and man's reason goes to the help of brute instinct—of them "whose life is hidden with God!"

How passing sweet is that second stanza, heard like a low hymn amidst the noise of the tempest! Let our hearts recite it—even once more!

"Ilk happy bird, wee, helpless thing,
That, in the merry mouths o' spring,
Delighted me to hear thee sing,

What comes o' thee?

Whar wilt thou cow'r thy chattering wing,
An' close thy ee?"

The whole earth is in a moment green again—trees whisper—stream-lets murmur—and the "merry mouth o' Spring" is musical through all her groves. But

"A change comes o'er the spirit of our dream," and in a moment we know that almost all those sweet-singers are now dead—or that they

"Cover the chattering wing," never more to flutter through the woodlands, and "close the ee" whose wild brightness, now dim, shall never more be re-illuminated with love, when the Season of Nests is at hand, and bush, tree, and tower are again all a-twitter with the survivors of some gentler clime!

The poet's heart, humanized to utmost tenderness by the beauty of its own merciful thoughts, extends its forgetfulness—that is, its forgiveness—to all the poor beasts of prey. That, say we, is true Christian poetry, and then expressed in what powerful words!

"Ev'n you on murdering errands told, Lays from your savage homes called!"

Each syllable tells—each stroke of the poet-painter's pencil depicts the life and sufferings of the poor beast of prey! And then, feeling that at such an hour all life is subject to one lot, how profound the pathos reflected back upon our own selves and our mortal condition, by these few simplest words—

"My heart forgets,
While pitiless the tempest wild
Sore on you beats!"

They go to help the "curie cattle" and the "silly sheep;" but who knows that they are not sent on an errand of higher mercy, by Him whose ear has not been shut to the prayer almost frozen on the lips of them about to perish! A Tale of Truth and Tears long forgotten, comes across our heart—long forgotten, though on the eve of that day on which the deliverance happened, so passionately did we all regard it, that we felt that interference providential—as if we had indeed seen the hand of God stretched down through the mist and snow from heaven! We all said that it would never all our lives long desert our memory. But all of us forgot it—and now, while the tempest howls, it seems again but of yesterday!

One family lived in Glen-Creran, and another in Glenco—the families of two brothers—seldom visiting each other on working-days, for their sheep mingled not on the hill; seldom meeting even on Sabbaths, for theirs was not the same parish-kirk; and seldom coming together on rural festivals or holidays, for in the Highlands now these are not so frequent as of yore; yet all these sweet seldoms, taken together, to loving hearts made a happy many, and thus, though each family passed its life in its own home-felt wilderness, there were many invisible threads stretched out through the intermediate air, connecting the two dwellings together—even as the dew-gemmed gossamer keeps floating from one tree to another, each with its own secret nest. And nestlike both dwellings were. That in Glenco, built beneath a treeless but high-heathered rock—lown in all storms—with greensward and garden on a slope down to that rivulet, the clearest of the clear, (oh! once wofully reddened!) and growing—so it seems in the mosses of its own roof, and the huge stones that overshadow it—out of, and belonging to, the solid earth. That in Glencreran, more conspicuous, on a knoll among the pastoral meadows, midway between mountain and mountain, so that the grove which shelters it, except when the sun is shining in his meridian-tower, is darkened by both their shadows, and dark, indeed, even in the sunshine, for 'tis a low but wide-armed grove of old oaklike pines. A little farther down, and Glencreran is truly "a silvan scene" indeed; but this dwelling is the highest up of all, the first you descend upon, near the foot of that wild hanging staircase now between you and Glen-Elvie, and, except this old oaklike grove of pines, there is not a tree, and hardly a bush, on bank or brae, pasture or hay-field, though these are kept, by many a rill, mere mingling themselves into one stream, in a perpetual green lustre that seemeth "unborrowed from the sun," and to be as native to the grass as its light is to the glow-worm. Such are the two Huts—for they are huts and no more—and you may see them still, if you know how to discover the beautiful sights of nature from descriptions treasured in your heart—and if the spirit of change, now nowhere at rest on the earth, not even in its most solitary places, have not swept violently from the scenes they beautified, the humble but hereditary dwellings that ought to be allowed, in the fulness of the quiet time, to relapse back into the bosom of nature, through insensible and unperceived decay.

These Huts belonged to brothers—and each had an only child—a son and a daughter—born on the same day—and now blooming on the verge of youth. A year ago, and they were but mere children—but what wondrous growth of spirit and of the spirit's frame does nature, at that season of life, often present before our eyes, so that we almost see the very change going on between morn and morn, and feel that these objects of our affection are daily brought closer to ourselves, by their partaking daily more and more in all our most sacred thoughts, in our cares and in our duties, and in knowledge of the sorrows as well as the joys of our common lot. Thus had these cousins grown up before their parents' eyes, Flora Macdonald—a name hallowed of yore—the fairest, and Hamish, the brightest of all the living flowers in Glencreran and Glenco. It was now their sixteenth birth-day—and never had a winter sun smiled more serenely over a hush of snow. Flora, it had been agreed on, was to pass that day in Glencreran, and Hamish to meet her among the mountains, that he might bring her down the many precipitous passes to his parents' Hut. It was the middle of February, and the snow had lain for weeks with all its drifts unchanged, so calm had been the weather, and so continued the frost. At the same hour, known by horologe on the cliff touched by the finger of dawn, the happy creatures left each their own glen, and mile after mile of the smooth surface glided away past their feet, almost as the quiet water glides by the little boat that, in favouring breezes, walks merrily along the sea. And soon they met at the trysting-place—a bank of birch-trees, beneath a cliff that takes its name from the Eagles.

On their meeting, seemed not the whole wilderness to their souls and senses suddenly inspired with beauty and with joy? Insects unheard by them before hummed and glittered in the air—from tree-roots, where the snow was thin, little flowers, or herbs flowerlike, now for the first time were seen looking out as if alive—the trees themselves seemed budding as if it were already spring—and rare as, in that rocky region, are the birds of song, a faint trill for a moment touched their ear, and the flutter of a wing, telling them that somewhere near there was preparation for a nest. Deep down beneath the snow they listened to the tinkle of rills unreach'd by the frost—and merry, thought they, was the music of these contented prisoners. Not Summer's self, in its deepest green, so beautiful had ever been to them before, as now the mild white of Winter; and when their eyes were lifted up to heaven, when had they ever seen before a sky of such perfect blue—a sun so gentle in its brightness, or altogether a week-day in any season, so like a Sabbath in its stillness, so like a holy day in its joy! Lovers were they—although as yet they knew it not—for from love only could have come such bliss as now was theirs—a bliss, that while it beautified, they felt came from and belonged to the eternal skies.

In that wilderness Flora sang all her old songs to those wild Gaelic airs that sound like the sighing of winds among fractured cliffs, or the branches of storm-tossed trees, when the subsiding tempest is about to let them rest. Monotonous music! but irresistible over the heart it has once awakened and enthralled, so sincere seems to be the mournfulness it breathes in its simplicity—a mournfulness brooding and feeding for ever and ever on the same note that is at once its natural expression and its sweetest aliment, of which the dreaming singer never wearyeth in her woe, while her heart all the time is haunted by all that is most piteous in memory, by the faces of the dead in their paleness returning to the shades of mortality, only that once more they may pour from their fixed eyes those strange showers of unaccountable tears!

How merry were they between those mournful airs! Oh how Flora trembled to see her lover's burning brow and flashing eyes, as he told her tales of great battles fought in foreign lands, far, far across the sea—tales which he had drunk in with greedy ears from the old heroes scattered all over Lochaber and Badenoch, on the brink of the grave still garrulous of blood!

"The sun sat high in his meridian tower," but time had not been with the youthful lovers, and the blessed beings believed that yet 'twas but a little hour since beneath the Eagle Cliff they had met in the prime of the full-brightened morn!

The boy starts to his feet—and his keen eye looks along the ready rifle—for his sires had all been famous deer-stalkers, and the passion of the chase was hereditary in his blood. Lo! a deer from Dalness, dog-driven, or sullenly astray, slowly bearing his antlers up the glen, then stopping for a moment to sniff the air, and like lightning away—away! The rifle-shot rings dully from the scarce echoing snow-cliffs, and the animal leaps aloft, struck by a mortal but not sudden-death wound. Oh! for Fingal now to pull him down like a wolf—but labouring and lumbering heavily along, the snow spotted, as he bounds, with blood, the huge animal at last disappears round some rocks at the head of the glen. "Follow me, Flora!" the boy-hunter cries—and flinging down their plaids, they turn their bright faces to the mountain, and away up the long glen after the stricken deer. Fleet was the mountain-girl as an Oread—and Hamish, as he ever and anon looked back to wave her on, with pride admired the beauty of her lightsome motion as she bounded along the snow. Redder and redder grew that snow, and more heavily trampled, as they winded round the rocks—and, lo! the deer staggering up the mountain, not half a mile off, and there standing at bay, as if before his swimming eyes came a vision of Fingal, the terror of the forest, whose howl was known to all the echoes, and quailed the herd while their antlers were yet afar off! "Rest, Flora! rest! while I fly to him with my rifle—and shoot him through the heart!"

Up—up—up—far far far up the interminable glen, that kept winding and winding, round many a jutting promontory, and many a castled cliff, the red-deer kept dragging its gore-oozing bulk, sometimes almost within, and then, for some hundreds of yards, beyond rifle-shot, while the boy, maddened by the chase, pressed forwards, now all alone, nor any more looking behind for Flora, who had entirely disappeared; and thus he was hurried on for miles by the whirlwind of passion—till at last he struck the noble quarry, and down sank the antlers in the snow, while the air was spurned by the convulsive beatings of feet. Then leapt Hamish upon the Red-deer like a beast of prey—and lifted up a look of triumph to the mountain tops.

Where is Flora? Her lover has forgotten her—and he is alone—nor knows it—in the wilderness—he and the Red-deer—an enormous animal—fast stiffening in the frost of death.

Some large flakes of snow are in the air—and they seem to waver and whirl, though, an hour ago, there was not a breath all over the region. Faster they fall and faster—the flakes are almost as large as leaves—and over-head, whence so suddenly has come that huge yellow cloud? “Flora, where are you? where are you, Flora?”—and from the huge hide the boy leaps up, and sees that no Flora is in the glen. But yonder is a moving speck far off upon the snow! ‘Tis she—’tis she—and again Hamish turns his eyes upon the quarry, and the heart of the hunter burns within him like a new-stirred fire. Shrill as the eagle’s cry, disturbed in his eyry, he sends his voice down the glen—and Flora, with cheeks pale and bright by fits, is at last at his side. Panting and speechless she stands—and then dizzily sinks fainting on his breast. Her hair is ruffled by the wind that revives her, and her face all moistened by the snow-flakes, now not falling, but driven—for the day has undergone a dismal change, and all over the skies are now lowering savage symptoms of a fast-coming night-storm.

Bare is poor Flora’s head, and sorely drenched her hair—that an hour or two ago glittered in the sunshine. Her shivering frame misses now the warmth of the plaid which almost no cold can penetrate, and which had kept the vital current flowing freely in many a bitter blast. What would the miserable boy give now for the coverings lying far away, which, in his foolish passion, he flung down to chase that fatal deer! “Oh! Flora! if you would not fear to stay here by yourself—under the protection of God, who surely will not forsake you—soon will I go and come from the place where our plaids are lying; and under the shelter of the deer, we may be able to outlive the hurricane—you wrap up in them —and folded—O my dearest sister—in my arms!”—“I will go with you down the glen, Hamish!” and she left his breast—but, weak as a day-old lamb, tottered—and sank down among the snow. The cold—intense as if the air were ice—had chilled her very heart, after the heat of that long race; and it was manifest that here she must be for the night—to live or to die! And the night seemed already come, so full was the lift of snow; while the glimmer every moment became gloomier, as if the day was expiring long before its time. Howling at a distance down the glen was heard a sea-born tempest from the Linnhe-Loch, where now they both knew the tide was tumbling in, bringing with it sleet and snow blasts from afar; and from the opposite quarter of the sky an inland tempest was raging to meet it, while every lesser glen had its own uproar, so that on all hands they were environed with death.

“I will go—and, till I return, leave you with God.”—“Go, Hamish!” and he went and came—as if he had been endowed with the raven’s wings!

Miles away—and miles back had he flown—and an hour had not been with his going and his coming—but what a dreary wretchedness meanwhile had been hers! She feared that she was dying—that the cold snow-storm was killing her—and that she would never more see Hamish, to say to him a right last farewell. Soon as he was gone, all her courage had died. Alone, she feared death—and wept—and wept—and wept in the wilderness—thinking how hard it was for one so young thus miserably to die! He came—and her whole being was changed. Folded up in both the plaids—she felt as if she were in heaven. “Oh! kiss me—kiss me, Hamish—for thy love—great as it is—or never hadst thou travelled so the long snows for my sake—is not as my love—and you must never forget me, Hamish—when your poor Flora is dead!”

Religion with these two young creatures was as clear as the light of the Sabbath-day—and their belief in heaven just the same as in earth. The will of God they thought of just as they thought of their parents’ will—and the same was their loving obedience to its decrees. If she was to die—supported now by the presence of her brother—Flora was utterly resigned; if she were to live, her heart imaged to itself the very forms of her worshipping gratitude! But all at once she closed her eyes—spoke not—breathed not—and, as the tempest howled and rumbled in the gloom that fell around them like blindness, Hamish almost fell down, thinking that she was dead!

"Wretched sinner that I am!—my wicked madness brought her here to die of cold in the snow!" And he smote his heart—and tore his hair—and feared to look up, lest the angry eye of God were looking on him through the storm.

All at once, without speaking a word, Hamish lifted Flora in his arms, and walked away up the glen—here almost narrowed into a pass. Distraction gave him supernatural strength, and her weight seemed that of an infant. Some walls of what had once been a house, he had suddenly remembered, were but a short way off—whether or not they had any roof, he had forgotten; but the thought even of such shelter seemed a thought of salvation. There it was—a snow-drift at the opening that had once been a door—snow up to the holes once windows—the wood of the roof had been carried off for fuel, and the snow-flakes were falling in, as if they would soon fill up the inside of the ruin! The snow in front was all trampled as if by sheep; and carrying in his burden under the low lintel, lo! the place was filled with a flock that had foreknown the hurricane, and all huddled together, looked on him as on the shepherd come to see how they were faring in the storm.

And a young shepherd he was, with a lamb apparently dying in his arms. All colour—all motion—all breath seemed to be gone—and yet something convinced his heart that she was yet alive. The ruined hut was roofless, but across an angle of the walls, some pine-branches had been flung as a sort of shelter for the sheep or cattle that might repair to them in cruel weather—some pine-branches left by the wood-cutters, who had felled the few trees that once stood at the very head of the glen. Into that corner the snow-drift had not forced its way, and he sat down there with Flora in the cherishing of his embrace, hoping that the warmth of his distracted heart might be felt by her who was as cold as a corpse. The chill air was somewhat softened by the breath of the huddled flock, and the edge of the cutting wind blunted by the stones. It was a place in which it seemed possible that she might revive—miserable as it was with unre-mixed snow—and almost cold as one supposes the grave. And she did revive—and under the half-open lids the dim blue appeared to be not yet life-deserted. It was yet but the afternoon—nightlike though it was—and he thought, as he breathed upon her lips, that a faint red returned, and that they felt his kisses poured over them to drive death away.

"Oh! father, go seek for Hamish, for I dreamt to-night he was perishing in the snow!"—"Flora, fear not, God is with us."—"Wild swans, they say, are come to Loch-Phoil—let us go, Hamish, and see them—but no rifle—for why kill creatures said to be so beautiful?" Over them where they lay, bended down the pine-branch roof, as if it would give way beneath the increasing weight of snow;—but there it still hung—though the drift came over their feet and up to their knees, and seemed stealing upwards to be their shroud. "Oh! I am overcome with drowsiness, and fain would be allowed to sleep. Who is disturbing me—and what noise is this in our house?"—"Fear not—fear not, Flora—God is with us."—"Mother! am I lying in your bosom? My father surely is not out in the storm! Oh! I have had a most dreadful dream!" and with such mutterings as these, Flora relapsed again into that perilous sleep—which soon becomes that of death.

Night itself came—but Flora and Hamish knew it not—and both lay now motionless in one snow-shroud. Many passions—though earth-born, all divine—pity, and grief, and love, and hope, and at last despair—had prostrated the strength they had so long supported—and the brave boy—who had been for some time feeble as a very child after a fever—with a mind confused and wandering, and in its perplexities, sore afraid of some nameless ill, had submitted to lay down his head beside his Flora's, and soon became like her insensible to the night and all its storms!

Bright was the peat-fire in the hut of Flora's parents in Glenco—and they were among the happiest of the humbly happy, blessing this the birth-day of their blameless child. They thought of her singing her sweet songs by the fireside of the hut in Glencreran—and tender thoughts of her cousin Hamish were with them in their prayers. No warning came to their ears in the sigh or the howl; for Fear it is that creates its own ghosts, and all its own ghostlike visitings, and they had seen their Flora in the meekness of the morning, setting forth on her way over the quiet mountains, like a fawn to play. Sometimes, too, Love, that starts at shadows, as if they were of the grave, is strangely insensible to things that might well strike it with dismay. So was it now with the dwellers in the hut at the head of Glencreran. Their Hamish had left them in the morning—night had come, and he and Flora were not there—but the day had been almost like a summer-day, and they in their infatuation never doubted that the happy creatures had changed their minds, and that Flora had returned with him to Glenco. Hamish had laughingly said, that haply he might surprise the people in that glen by bringing back to them Flora on her birth-day—and, strange though it afterwards seemed to her to be, that belief prevented one single fear from touching the mother's heart, and she and her husband that night lay down in sleep unhaunted by any woful dream!

What could have been done for them, had they been told by some good or evil spirit, that their children were in the clutches of such a night? As well seek for a single bark in the middle of the misty main! But the inland storm had been seen brewing among the mountains round King's-House, and but had communicated with hut, though far apart, in that wilderness where the traveller sees no symptoms of human life. Down through the long cliff-pass of Mealanomy, between Buchael-Etve and the Black-Mount, towards the lone House of Dalness that lives in everlasting shadows, went a band of shepherds, trampling their way across a hundred frozen streams. Dalness joined its strength—and then away over the drift-bridged chasms toiled that Gathering, with their sheep-dogs scouring the loose snows—in the van, Fingal, the Red Reaver, with his head aloft, on the look-out for deer, grimly eying the Correi where last he tasted blood. All “plaided in their tartan array,” these shepherds laughed at the storm—and hark! you hear the bagpipe play—the music the Highlanders love both in war and in peace.

“They think then of the ourie cattle,
And silly sheep;”

and though they ken 'twill be a moonless night—for the snow-storm will sweep her out of heaven—up the mountain and down the glen they go, marking where flock and herd have betaken themselves, and now, at nightfall, unafraid of that blind hollo, they descend into the depth where once stood the old Grove of Pines. Following the dogs, who know their duties in their instinct, the band, without seeing it, are now close to that ruined hut. Why bark the sheep-dogs so—and why howls Fingal, as if some spirit passed athwart the night? He scents the dead body of the boy who so often had shouted him on in the forest, when the antlers went by! Not dead—nor dead she who is on his bosom! Yet life in both is frozen—and will the iced blood in their veins ever again be thawed? Almost pitch-dark is the roofless ruin—and the frightened sheep know not what is the terrible Shape that is howling there. But a man enters, and lifts up one of the bodies, giving it into the arms of them at the door-way—and then lifts up the other; and by the flash of a rifle, they see that it is Hamish and Flora Macdonald, seemingly both frozen to death. Some of those reeds that the shepherds burn in their huts are kindled, and in that small light they are assured that such are the corpses. But that noble dog knows that death is not there—and licks the face of Hamish, as if he would restore life to his eyes! Two of the shepherds know well how to fold the dying in their plaids—how gentlest to carry them along; for they had learnt it on the field of victorious battle, when, without stumbling over the dead and wounded, they bore away the shattered body—yet living—of the youthful warrior, who had shewn that of such a Clan he was worthy to be the Chief.

The storm was with them all the way down the glen—nor could they have heard each other's voices had they spoke—but mutely they shifted the burden from strong hand to hand—thinking of the Hut in Glenco, and of what would be felt there on their arrival with the dying or dead. Blind people walk through what to them is the night of crowded day-streets—unpausing turn round corners—unhesitatingly plunge down steep stairs—wind their way fearless through whirlwinds of life—and reach in their serenity, each one unharmed, his own obscure house. For God is with the blind. So is he with all who walk on works of mercy. This saving band had no fear—and therefore there was no danger—on the edge of the pitfall or the cliff. They knew the countenances of the mountains shewn momentarily—by ghastly gleamings—through the fitful night and the hollow sound of each particular stream beneath the snow—at places where in other weather there was a pool or a waterfall. The dip of the hills—in spite of the drifts—familiar to their feet, did not deceive them now; and then, the dogs in their instinct were guides that erred not, and as well as the shepherds knew it themselves, did Fingal know that they were anxious to reach Glen. He led if he were in moonlight; and often stood still when they were shifting their burden, and whined as if in grief. He knew where the bridges were—stones or logs; and he rounded the marshes where at springs the wild-fowls feed. And thus Instinct, and Reason, and Faith conducted the saving band along—and now they are at Glenco—and at the door of the Hut!

To life were brought the dead—and there at midnight sat they up like ghosts. Strange seemed they—for a while—to each other's eyes—and at each other they looked as if they had forgotten how dearly once they loved! Then as if in holy fear they gazed on each other's faces, thinking that they had awoke together in heaven. "Flora?" said Ha-amish—and that sweet word, the first he had been able to speak, reminded him of all that had passed, and he knew that the God in whom they had put their trust had sent them deliverance. Flora, too, knew her parents, who were on their knees—and she strove to rise up and kneel down beside them—but powerless was she as a broken reed—and when she thought to join with them in thanksgiving—her voice was gone. Still as death sat all those simple shepherds in the hut—and one or two who were fathers were not ashamed to weep. * * * * *

Who were they—the solitary pair—all alone by themselves save a small image of her on whose breast it hung—whom—seven summers after—we came upon in our wanderings, before their shieling in Correi-Vollach at the foot of Ben Chruslas who sees his shadow in a hundred lochs: Who but Hamish and Flora! sitting on the greensward.

Nay, dry up—daughter of our soul! Dry up thy tears! and lo! a vision set before thine eyes that shall fill them with unmoistened light.

Start not back, nor let the soul within thee be afraid. Oft before have those woods and waters—those clouds and mountains—that sun and sky, held thy spirit in Elysium. Thy spirit, that then was disembodied, and living in the beauty and the glory of the elements. 'Tis WINDERMERE—WINDERMERE! Never canst thou have forgotten the imperishable beam-of the late those thrice-blessed Isles! But when last we saw them within the still heaven of thy smiling eyes, summer suns had overloaded them with beauty, and they stooped their flowers and foliage down to the blushing—the burning deep, that glowed in its transparency with other Druid groves as gorgeous as themselves, the whole mingling mass of reality and of shadow forming one undistinguishable creation. But now, lo! Windermere in Winter! All leafless now the groves that girdled her, as if shifting rainbows were in love perpetually letting fall their colours on the Queen of Lakes. Gone are her banks of emerald, that carried our calm gazings with them, sloping away back into the cerulean sky. Her mountains, shadowy in sunshine, and seeming restless as seas, where are they?—And the cloud-cleaving cliffs that shot up into the blue region where the buzzard sailed? All gone. But mourn not for that loss. Accustom thine eye—and through it thy soul, to that transcendent substitution, and deeply will they be reconciled. Sawest thou ever the bosom of the Lake, hushed into profounder rest? No white-winged pinnace glides through the sunshine—no clanking oar is heard leaving or approaching cape, point, or bay—no music of voice, stop, or string wakens the sleeping echoes. How strangely dim and confused on the water the fantastic frost-work imagery, yet more steadfastly hanging there than ever hung the summer banks when all the heavens were still as the breath of a sleeping child! For all one sheet of ice now—clear as the Glass of Glamoury in which that Lord of old beheld his Geraldine—is Windermere, the heaven-loving and the heaven-beloved. Not a wavelet murmurs in all her bays, from the silvan Brathay to where the southern straits narrow into a river, now chained, too, on his silvan course, towards that perilous Estuary afar off raging on its wreck-strewn sands. The frost came after the last fall of snow—and not a single flake ever touched that surface; and now, that you are contented to miss—or rather no longer miss—the green twinkling of the large July leaves, does not imagination love those motionless frozen forests, cold but not dead, serene but not sullen, and inspirative in the strangeness of their appareling wild and dreamy thoughts and feelings about the scenery of foreign climes, far, far away among the regions of the North, where Nature works her wonders aloof from human eyes, and that wild architect the Frost, during the absence of the sun, employs his long nights in building and dissolving his ice-palaces, magnificent far beyond the reach of any power set to work at the bidding of earth's crowned and sceptered kings? All at once a hundred houses, high up among the hills, seem on fire. The setting sun has smitten them, and the snow-tracts are illuminated by harmless conflagrations. Their windows are all lighted up by a lurid and ghastly splendour, in its strong suddenness sublime. But look—look, we beseech you, at the sun—the sunset—the sunset region—and all that kindred and corresponding heaven effulgent, where even now lay in its cold glitter the blue bosom of the frozen lake. Who knows the laws of light and the perpetual miracle of their operation? God, not thou. The snow-mountains are white no more, but gorgeous in their colouring as the clouds. Lo! Pavy-Ark—magnificent range of cliffs—seeming to come forward, while you gaze—how it glows with a rosy light, as if a flush of flowers decked the precipice in that ineffably delicate splendour! Langdale-Pikes, methinks, are tinged with faintest, finest purple—and the thought of violets is with us as we gaze on the slight tinted beauty of the bosom of the mountains dearest to the setting sun. But that long broad slip of orange-coloured sky is yellowing with its reflection almost all the rest of our Alps—all but yon stranger—the summit of some mountain base belonging to another region—ay—the Great Gabel—silent now as sleep—when last we clomb his cliffs, thundering in the mists of all his cataracts. In his shroud he stands like a ghost—pallid and colourless;—beyond the reach of the setting sun he lowers in his exclusion from the rejoicing light—and imagination, personifying his solitary vastness into forsaken life, pities the doom of the forlorn Giant. Ha! just as the eye of day is about to shut, one smile seems sent afar to that lonesome mountain, and a crown of crimson encompasses his forehead.

On which of the two sunsets art thou now gazing? Thou who art to our old loving eyes so like the "mountain nymph, sweet liberty?" On the sunset in the heaven—or the sunset in the lake? The divine truth is—O Daughter of our Age—that both sunsets are but visions of our own immortal spirits, creative in their immortality. Lo both are gone from the outward world—and nought remains behind but a forbidding frown of the cold bleak snow! But imperishable in thy imagination will be the sunset that owed all its beauty to the beauty of thine own soul—and though

It will sometimes fade away into oblivion—say rather retire into the recesses of thy memory, and lie there among the unsuspected treasures of forgotten imagery that have been unconsciously accumulating there since first those gentle eyes of thine had perfect vision given to their depths of blue—yet, mysteriously brought back from vanishment by some one single silent thought, to which power has been yielded over that bright portion of the Past, will that sunset sometimes re-appear to thee in solitude—or haply when in the very heart of life. And then surely a few tears will fall for sake of him by whose side thou stoodest, when first that double sunset, confusing Windermere with heaven, enlarged thy sense of beauty, and capacities of joy, and made thee—in thy father's eyes—the sweetest—best—and brightest poetess—whose whole life is musical inspiration—ode, elegy, and hymn, sung not in words but in looks—sigh-breathed, or speechlessly distilled in tears!

So much, though but little, for the beautiful—with, perhaps, a tinge of the sublime. Are the two emotions different and distinct—think ye—or modifications of one and the same? 'Tis a puzzling question—and we, the Sphinx, might wait till doomsday, before you, Œdipus, could solve the enigma. Certainly a Rose is one thing and Mount Ætna is another—an antelope and an elephant—an insect and a man-of-war, both sailing in the sun—a little lucid well, in which the fairies bathe, and the Greenland Sea, in which Leviathan is "wallowing unwieldy, enormous in his gait"—the jewelled finger of a virgin bride, and grim Saturn with his ring—the upward eye of a kneeling saint, and a comet, "that from his horrid hair shakes pestilence and war." But let the rose bloom on the mouldering ruins of the palace of some great king—among the temples of Balbeck or Syrian Tadmor—and in its beauty, methinks, 'twill be also sublime. See the antelope bounding across a raging chasm—up among the region of eternal snows on Mont Blanc—and deny it, if you please—for assuredly we think that there is sublimity in the fearless flight of that beautiful creature, to whom nature grudged not wings, but gave, instead, the power of plumes to her small delicate limbs, unfractured by alighting among the pointed rocks. All alone, by your single solitary self, in some wide, lifeless desert, could you deny sublimity to the unlooked-for hum of the tiniest insect, or to the sudden shiver of the beauty of his gauze-wings? Not you, indeed. Stooping down to quench your thirst in that little lucid well where the fairies bathe, what if you saw the image of the evening star shining in some strange subterranean world? We shrewdly suspect that you would hold in your breath and swear devoutly that it was sublime. Dead on the very evening of her marriage day is that virgin bride whose delicate hands were so beautiful—and as she lies in her white wedding garments that serve for a shroud—that emblem of eternity and of eternal love—the ring upon her finger—with its encased star shining brightly still now that her eyes, once stars, are closed—would, methinks, be sublime to all Christian hearts. In comparison with all these beautiful sublimities, Mount Ætna, the elephant, the man-of-war, Leviathan swimming the ocean-stream, Saturn with his ring, and with his horrid hair the comet—would be all less than nothings. Therefore beauty and sublimity are twin-feelings of the soul—one and the same birth of imagination—

THE WINTER WILD.

BY DELTA.

I.

How sudden hath the snow come down !
Last night the new moon shew'd her horn,
And, o'er December's moorland brown,
Rain on the breeze's wing was borne ;
But, when I ope my shutters, lo !
Old Earth hath changed her garb again,
And, with its fleecy whitening, Snow
O'ermantles hill, and cumpers plain.

II.

Bright Snow, pure Snow, I love thee well,
Thou art a friend of ancient days ;
Whene'er mine eyes upon thee dwell,
Long-buried thoughts 'tis thine to raise ;—
Far—to remotest infancy—
My pensive mind thou hurriest back,
When first, pure blossoms of the sky,
I watch'd to earth your mazy track—

III.

And upward look'd, with wondering eyes,
To see the heavens with motion teem,
And butterflies, a thousand ways,
Down flaking in an endless stream ;
The roofs around all clothed with white,
And leafless trees with feathery claws,
And horses black with drapery bright,—
Oh, what a glorious sight it was !

IV.

Each season had its joys in store,
From out whose treasury boyhood chose :
What though blue Summer's reign was o'er,
Had Winter not his storms and snows ?
The Giant then aloft was piled,
And balls in mimic war were toss'd,
And thumps dealt round in trickery wild,
As felt the passer, to his cost.

V.

The wintry day was as a spell
Unto the spirit—'twas delight
To note its varying aspects well,
From dawn to noon, from noon to night,
Pale morning on the hills afar.—
The low sun's ineffectual gleam,—
The twinkling of the Evening Star
Reflected in the frozen stream :

VI.

And when the silver moon shone forth
O'er lands and lakes, in white array'd,
And dancing in the stormy North
The red electric streamers play'd ;

'Twas ecstasy, 'neath tinkling trees,
 All low-born thoughts and cares exiled,
 To listen to the Polar breeze,
 And look upon "the winter wild."

VII.

Hollo! make way along the line:—
 Hark how the peasant scuds along,—
 His iron heels, in concord fine,
 Brattling afar their under-song:
 And see, that urchin, ho-ieroe!
 His truuant legs they sink from under,
 And to the quaking sheet below,
 Down thwacks he, with a thud like thunder!

VIII.

The skater there, with motion nice,
 In semicirque and graceful wheel,
 Chalks out upon the dark clear ice
 His chart of voyage with his heel;
 Now skimming underneath the boughs,—
 Amid the crowd now gliding lone,—
 Where down the rink the curler throws,
 With dext'rous arm, his booming stone.

IX.

Behold! upon the lapsing stream
 The frost-work of the night appears,— Beleaguer'd castles, round which gleam
 A thousand glittering crystal spears;
 Here galleys sail of shape grotesque;
 There hills o'erspread with palmy trees;
 And, mix'd with temples Arabesque,— Bridges and pillar'd towers Chinese.

X.

Ever doth Winter bring to me
 Deep reminiscence of the past:
 The opening flower, and leaping tree,—
 The sky without a cloud o'ercast,— Themselves of beauty speak, and throw
 A gleam of present joy around,
 But, at each silent fall of snow,
 The heart to boyhood's pulses bound—

XI.

To boyhood turns reflection back, ●
 With mournful pleasure to behold
 'Life's early morn, the sunny track
 Of feet, now mingled with the mould:
 Where are the playmates of those years:
 Hills rise and oceans roll between:
 We call—but scarcely one appears—
 No more shall be what once hath been.

XII.

Yes! gazing o'er the bleak, green sea,
 The snow-clad peaks and desert plain,
 Mirror'd in thought, methinks to me
 The spectral Past comes back again:
 Once more in Retrospection's eyes,
 As 'twere to second life restored,
 The perish'd and the past arise,
 The early lost, and long deplored!

PARLIAMENTARY SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

No. II.

THE numerous matters important to the public interest, submitted to the consideration of Parliament during the last ten days previous to the Christmas Recess, leave us but little room in our review for prefatory comment. These are serious times, in which a plain, straight-forward, practical view of what our legislature is doing, becomes highly important to almost every man of every station; it seems as if the time were not far distant, when our private men may be forced by the extraordinary complexion of affairs, to take a more decisive attitude with regard to politics than they have hitherto done, and nothing can be more useful in such a case than a clear and vigorous comprehension of the things actually said and done at the fountain-head of government. It is a certain truth, that men ignorantly cry out, "Reform," without knowing what it is they would reform, and suffer their minds to run riot in theoretical fancies, while the practical business of the country is hastily glanced at as a something for the conversation of the day, and then forgotten. We wish, then, to fasten men's attention upon what the Parliament is about; not by a mere dry chronicle of their proceedings, but by a fair off-hand telling of the story in our own fashion, accompanied by such commentaries of our own, as may seem necessary to give further information on the subjects noticed, to expose absurdity and quackery, to maintain sound British principles, and, in short, to make the honest truth apparent, to the best of our ability. We, of course, do not pretend to notice everything that takes place in Parliament; to do this would require a Double Number in every month during the sitting of the Houses; and we would not that the thrilling delight, which the public receives by the occasional duplication of Magn's charms, should pall upon the sense by such frequent repetition. Our topics, if not strictly original, will be select, and we shall not cause our light to shine upon the mere dross and chaff of Parliamentary discussion.

Now to our task. In the last Number we took leave of the House of Lords on the 14th of December, and made our retiring bow to the Bishop of London. We now turn to the House of Commons of the same evening, and find the corruption of the electors of the borough of Evesham under discussion, to the considerable discomfort of our reforming Ministers, whose particular convenience it would have been to let a new writ go forth, and a new election be had for this place, with the usual accompaniment of bribery and corruption. To Lord Chandos the merit is due of stopping this piece of ministerial expedency, and he gave notice of a motion for a supersedeas on the writ, which we shall notice in its proper place. This matter was followed by a conversation respecting the Stamford petition, complaining of the undue interference of the Marquess of Exeter at the last election, which Mr Tennyson had given notice to present that evening. Mr Maberly, whom, were we a Marquess, we should consider rather a strange political godfather to adopt, appeared for the noble lord, and condescended to say, that he, John Maberly, would be "infinitely obliged" to Mr Tennyson to postpone the presentation of the petition. All this matter had of course been arranged beforehand by the parties, and the present was merely a scene got up for the public satisfaction. Mr Tennyson took occasion briefly to compliment himself and the petitioners: to describe the charges in the petition as involving a breach of the privileges of the House, and a violation of the constitutional liberties of the people; yet, "hoping that Mr Maberly's request might, in some degree, have been prompted by a conviction on his part, of a probability that the noble Marquess might, before the period for presenting the petition should arrive, consent to withdraw the discharges served upon his tenants, who did not vote at the last election accessably to his wishes," he withdrew the petition until after Christmas; and, in fact, the understanding of the House was, that the Marquess gave in to his refractory tenants, and that the petition was abandoned altogether. This Mr Tennyson, be it remembered, is the public-spirited gentleman who was affected with such patriotic indignation at the corruption of East Retford, because he was sure of becoming member for Birmingham, if, as he hoped, he should succeed in transferring the franchise to that town. Now, his zeal burns for Stamford, and the violated constitutional liberties of the people; and on what condition does he abandon this high charge against a peer of England,—this accusation of a violation of the people's liberties? Why this—that the peer in question will not turn out of doors some of his tenants in Stamford who have betrayed him, and broken their implied promises. The simple facts are these—in many of the English boroughs the right of voting belongs to the occupancy of houses within the borough. Persons of wealth,—peers or commoners,—purchase the property in these houses, and then allow tenants to occupy them at a nominal rent, whose votes, when they are required, are understood to be the equivalent for the house that covers them.

But these men, who are thus mean and base enough to be bribed by anticipation, take it into their heads, by and by, that they are to have their bribe and their independence both—vote against the man whose house they use without paying for it, and then, when he proceeds to kick them out, as turnspits that run backward instead of forward, with the wheel to which they are tied for their master's convenience, they raise a loud cry about tyranny and violated public liberty, and get such men as Mr Tennyson and Sergeant Wilde to be their champions. This is the real state of the case at Newark and at Stamford, and it is not when the patrons of these places are turning the worthless people out, that they should be complained of, but while they keep them in, and while they use such vile instruments to procure returns of members to the House of Commons. This is the real violation of public liberty, wherein paltry slaves are fee'd for base subserviency, and when, in the end, they forget themselves and are turned out, it is but a too tardy punishment. Lord Exeter, it seems, has been frightened into giving way to a part of his regiment of rogues who have mutinied. He will find his reward in the desertion of another batch of them upon the first convenient opportunity. This special jobber in reform, Mr Tennyson, has got a place in the Ordnance, because places in that department were going a-begging to any one who could command a seat in Parliament. We should like to hear Lord Grey explain what were the qualifications which moved him to this appointment.

Following the conversation on the Stamford petition, there was a brief discussion on the bringing up of the petition of the city of London, for a repeal of the duty on sea-borne coals. The whole amount of this duty was stated to be eight hundred thousand pounds, of which one-half is paid by the inhabitants of London. A tax in every way more impolitic, more injurious to the productive industry of the country, more grindingly oppressive to the poor, than this coal-tax, does not exist. If coals were the production of France or Russia, and not of England, the free-trade gentlemen would, no doubt, have long ere this thundered forth their opinions of its enormity, with all the enthusiasm of political philosophers and cosmopolitan philanthropists. But coals are the produce of our own soil, and therefore unworthy of the notice of these men of "enlarged views." It is perfectly monstrous, that a commodity of this kind, the cost of which enters into the price of almost every manufacture, and which, in a climate like ours, is as necessary to the comfortable existence of the poor as food itself, should be heavily taxed to those who are obliged to obtain it by sea, and should continue to be taxed, while the duties on foreign luxuries are diminished or taken away. There seems to be a mental blindness, which is not inaptly termed "The free-trade insanity," in our policy with regard to customs duties, which is at once amazing and pitiable to behold in a country like this, of which the greatness so much depends upon a whole.

some policy in the administration of the affairs of trade. We take off the duty from Russian tallow, and we keep on the duty on English coals—What palpable madness! By increasing the import of tallow from Russia, we, no doubt, increase the export to that country of our goods, or perhaps our gold; but at the same time we discourage our own produce of tallow, and thus almost wholly annihilate a very important profit of the cattle farmer. By taking off the coal-duty, we would immediately increase the consumption, and cheapen the innumerable articles in the manufacture and carriage of which coals are used—we would greatly add to the comfort of the poor, by enabling them to increase the quantity of their fuel, and by affording an additional demand for labour at the collieries, which again would lead to a greater consumption of excisable articles. Thus in every way there would be an advantage, and no corresponding disadvantage, except the abandonment of a small item in the custom's revenue, which is never heeded when the object is to promote foreign trade. What magic there is in this word "foreign," which so completely turns people's heads, and stupifies them to a sense of the infinitely superior advantages of the home-trade, we have never been able to see; and we are not without fear that shameful motives of private interest might too often be found at the bottom, with many who have not hesitated to sacrifice our domestic interests to the encouragement of the use of foreign shipping and foreign productions. If the city of London would persevere respecting this pernicious coal-duty, they would very soon succeed in its removal; and we trust they will not be content to let the matter drop with the presentation of this petition.

Mr Littleton's motion for leave to bring in a bill to prevent the payment of wages otherwise than in money; that is to say, to abolish the "Truck System," gave rise to a very lengthened debate, which, if not distinguished by the display of any very brilliant ability, was yet ably and sensibly conducted. The question is an important one, both as to the principle involved, and the practical effect of the truck system upon large bodies of the working people. As to the principle, it was pleasant to observe the advocates of free-trade railing upon the pernicious system of truck, which, if it be indeed pernicious, their "general principle," repeated out of political economy books till we are sick, and unfortunately acted upon till we are sore from its effects, is blown to atoms. In the late Ministry, and in the Liverpool Ministry, we always found Sir Robert Peel the abettor and the advocate of the "liberal and scientific principles," as their disciples are pleased to call them, of the free-trade gentry, and the Whigs soused him with their praises, and turned the man into a milk-sop; the same Sir Robert has now found out, that while he is convinced of the necessity of abolishing the truck system, he is yet aware that the measure is not in perfect accordance with the strict rules of political economy. "The rules of that science," he continues, "have reference to the production of wealth in a nation; but I must enquire what effect the application of them, in a given case, is likely to have on the morals of a country. If it were shewn to me, that the application of those rules added to the stock of wealth, but tended at the same time to the destruction of morals amongst the people, I certainly, to preserve those morals pure, would overlook and throw aside the principles of political economy." This, to be sure, is very indifferent speaking, and dreadfully Peel-ish in its style; but it is not that, but the heresy which shocks us. What, then, can the principles of the golden science of political economy, or "the application of them in a given case," as Sir Robert hath it, be adverse to purity of morals? Peter McCulloch, where are thy thunderbolts? Lift up your voice, O most learned Professor in Lord Brougham's university of Cockaigne, and let it be heard, "volumed, and vast, and rolling far," against a calumny so grievous! Your friend Hume, however, is still true as steel; let that be your comfort amid the awful backsliding of others.

As to the practical part of the matter, we are not quite so clear as some members, for whom we have a high respect, seem to be, that the truck system is so very injurious to the working people. There is an old saying to this effect, that "though Solomon was wise, and Samson was strong, neither of them could pay money if they hadn't it." The master manufacturers are not a whit more able in this respect than Solomon and Samson. The political philosophers have abolished by law the small notes, wherewith workmen were wont to be paid; gold is too expensive for those whose works proceed principally on credit, and they are forced upon the system of using the commodities themselves, instead of the money which represents commodities. No doubt it would be better for the workmen to be paid in money, but still it is better to be paid in goods than to get no payment at all, and in many cases this would be the necessary alternative. We should recommend Mr Littleton to be very cautious how he meddles in this matter, while the money of the country remains in its present restricted state, lest he should find, that instead of conferring a boon, he has inflicted a very serious evil on the working-people, by his bill. Mr Atwood, in a very able speech, of course, in this light; upon which Mr Poulett Thompson, Vice-President of the Board of Trade, who unites in himself as much flippancy, confidence, and shallowness, as can be found in any man in England, arose and spoke the following nonsense: "Sir, if I agreed with my honourable friend who has just sat down, that the introduction of paying wages in goods has been resorted to as a substitute for paper credit, I should find in that an additional argument for supporting this measure. Until the House decides upon a new system of currency, I think we are bound to maintain that which exists; and I am quite convinced that a paper currency, bad as it was, was much preferable to a currency of cheese and butter, and I know not what else as worthless, as a medium of exchange." Now, this foolish, flippant gentleman should have been told, that the goods given by masters to workmen, are not intended as "currency," but as articles of consumption; that small notes were objected to by him and his tribe as having no intrinsic value, and being liable to indefinite increase for purposes of speculation,—two objections which do not apply to butter and cheese, suppose they were made "currency;" and that whatever he may think (being a mighty fine gentleman) of the worthlessness of butter and cheese, they are good and valuable things,—nay, prized by some quite as much as Russian tallow, for which the Vice-President of the Board of Trade has, from certain mercantile habits, a much greater taste.

At the time the debate took place, the bill had not been printed; it has since been put into the hands of members—it sets out with enumerating and repealing eighteen previous acts of Parliament, and the principal of the new provisions are, that all contracts for the hiring of artificers must be made in the current coin of the realm—that contracts for hiring must not contain any stipulation as to the manner in which wages shall be expended—and that all wages must be paid to the workman in cash, or with his consent in bank-notes, and not otherwise.

On the 15th, Mr Robert Grant, who represents the Jews in Parliament, at a very considerable expense to that high-minded and eminently national body, gave notice of a motion for the 17th of February, for the removal of their civil disabilities, unless a bill now in progress for the repeal of the oath of abjuration should accomplish his purpose otherwise.

General Gascoigne said, he would feel it his duty very narrowly to watch any measure, the effect of which would be to admit Jew, Gentile, and Pagan, to the House. This is from a soldier. Should the measure make its way to the Upper House, we shall be curious to see what the Bishops will say to it. Surely they will be to the Jews a stumbling-block. A good deal of time was taken up this evening by a discussion on a motion for returns respecting the magistrates of Ireland, introduced by a Mr O'Gorman Mahon, who seems to be rather a rough and unpolished specimen from the sister island. It appeared in the course of the debate, that he was a Roman Catholic, and had himself been dismissed from the Irish magistracy, by a preemptory order of the Lord Chancellor. As his motion was framed, it seemed to be a very improper one. It was happily ridiculed by Sir Charles Wetherell, to the great amusement and satisfaction of the House.

On the 16th, the proceedings of the early part of the evening had much variety. Mr Hobhouse was consecutively eloquent on the subject of select vestries in general, and St James's parish in particular. The elective franchise in Galway, and the treatment of insane persons in madhouses, which last subject, he hinted more than once, was of particular interest to his honourable friend the member for Cricklade. We hope there was no ugly insinuation in this. Mr Ewart presented a petition from certain of his Majesty's subjects residing in Liverpool, and professing the Jewish religion, praying "to be removed from the disabilities at present imposed upon them." This petition was ordered to lie on the table, but if the Liverpool Jews wish to be "removed," their petition should with more propriety have been referred to the Emigration Committee. Then came "Negro Slavery"—"Parish Registers"—"Parliamentary Reform and Retrenchment"—"Galway Franchise" again—upon which Mr Wyse, the wisest of the Irish Roman Catholic members, made a set speech, and a good one. After this Mr Trevor fired a shot-preliminary against Cobbett's Register. Mr Wyse argued the propriety of extending the elective franchise in Ireland to household property, and Mr Hume presented a petition for reform from Southampton, and availed himself of the opportunity, to read a severe lecture to the members for that town. One of them, Mr Barton Hoy, retorted with some smartness upon the member for Middlesex, and a personal scene, which is always interesting to the House, and generally amusing when Mr Hume is one of the parties militant, was the consequence. "Sir," said Mr Hoy, "the honourable member for Middlesex has lately assumed a tone and manner in this House, in his conduct to other members, in which he is, I must say, by no means warranted. He dictates to them what course they should take, and takes them to task for their conduct. He is, by his own appointment, receiver-general of petitions, and redresser-general of wrongs. Like a true Indian sportsman, he goes at all kinds of game, from an elephant to a snipe. I regret that the honourable member has not, on this occasion, come in contact with some one more able to enter into contest with him than I am, but I hope that on some occasion, when, Quixote-like, the honourable member sallies forth to redress grievances, real or imaginary, he may mistake some powerful giant for a windmill, and be vanquished in the encounter. If he should fall, I shall be satisfied with writing his epitaph "procurabit humbos." We wish honourable gentlemen would be a little more accurate in their learned allusions. Don Quixote did not mistake a giant for a windmill, but a windmill for a giant, which makes all the difference. Certainly Mr Hume has grown prodigiously authoritative since the wheel of torture turned him up member for Middlesex; but if he continue in this strain, it will require neither windmill nor giant to bring him down. To be humbly useful, is the character for which his qualifications fit him—it he persists in endeavouring to climb above this, he will tumble down below it.

The petitions being disposed of, Lord Chandos brought forward his motion for a supersedeas of the Evesham Election Writ, grounded on the necessity of an enquiry respecting the bribery that had been committed at the previous election, before the same parties should be allowed again to exercise the elective franchise. Upon this motion a very interesting debate took place, the progress and the result of which spoke little for the sincerity or the strength of the new government. The Ministry and their supporters, notwithstanding their zeal for a general reform, of their own manufacture, would by no means give their assistance to the checking of flagrant abuse in this particular case. Anxious to avail themselves of two purchasable seats, and nettled to find an individual case of their favourite grievance taken up by honest hands, who would not suffer any jobbing advantage to be made of it, they suddenly found out the vast iniquity of suspending the elective rights of all the voters, on account of the delinquency of a part—a view of the question which no suggestion would enable them to take in the East Retford case—and with sundry symptoms of extreme ill-temper, they avowed a decided hostility to the motion. They were, however, destitute of strength to resist the party of the Marquess of Chandos, and he carried his motion in the teeth of their opposition. With respect to the real merits of the question, it is scarcely to be denied, that many cases, as bad as that of Evesham, notoriously exist, and have occasionally been brought before committees of the House of Commons, without any such special notice having been taken of them, as has been on the present occasion; but if it be true, as has been so loudly stated on one side, and not denied on the other, that in consequence of the pressure of public opinion, reform is a thing of more urgent necessity now, than it has hitherto been, there is no inconsistency in laying hold of a flagrant case of corruption, which is presented with the proper and formal evidence, and demanding that the evil should be remedied. Mr Warburton, who is, for a man affecting science, sometimes strangely illogical, would persuade us, that it is unjust to punish one borough, without a sweeping measure for the punishment of the whole—he might as well argue, that one of a gang of thieves having been found guilty by good evidence, we should let him go, until evidence can be found for the prosecution of the whole party. But the most important view of the matter is this, that expediency and sound practical policy demand, that whatever produces so very important a change in the circumstances of society, as Parliamentary Reform, should be accomplished gradually, so as to afford opportunity for the new relations of men and things to adjust themselves peaceably, and in a solid and permanent form. What infatuation is it, that makes men blind to the rash folly of attempting, at one legislative blow, to destroy the institutions of a thousand years? If reform is to be accomplished peaceably, it must be done gradually, taking up the worst cases as they arise, or perhaps seeking them out. A sudden and general reform in a matter of such high national importance as the representation of the people in Parliament, is revolution; and if it were done without popular tumult, and general terror, and consequent misery, it would be a miracle. In the present crisis, therefore, nothing could be more politic, than to stop the progress of the writ for such a place as Evesham, and put the abused franchise into better hands; and it must tend, along with many other things, very much to lower the character of Lord Grey's government, that for the paltry sake of a temporary convenience, to be derived from the corrupt purchase of two seats, they should, in this instance, have not only eaten up their own words, but their own principles.

The question respecting Evesham election writ being settled, the remainder of the evening was devoted to the lawyers; first, Mr John Campbell moved for leave to bring in a bill for establishing a general register for all deeds and instruments affecting real property in England and Wales. Sir Edward Sugden said, that the question was as great and as important as one as ever was introduced to the attention of the House, and announced his intention of opposing the bill upon the second reading. Sir Charles Wetherell also gave notice of his intended opposition, and treated the proposition with ridicule and some asperity. As neither of these eminent lawyers entered into any argument upon the motion, we must be content to remain in expectation, until the debate on the second reading shall develop what the objections are to making a system general throughout England, which already prevails in the great counties of York and Middlesex, and in the kingdoms of Scotland and Ireland. Though not in general disposed to very profound admiration of the wisdom, or the manner of its display in Mr John Campbell, we cannot help thinking, while we remain unenlightened by the arguments of his learned opponents, that a general public registry of deeds is an establishment of most important necessity, and it is a matter of some astonishment that the kingdom should remain at this day without such an important security in the transfer of landed property. "With regard to the in-interest in land," says Mr Campbell, "the occupier may be tenant at will—tenant for a year—tenant for his own life—tenant in tail, or tenant in fee. The nature of his tenure can only be ascertained by reference to title-deeds or other writings, and these must be procured and consulted before a purchase can be made. But then a difficulty immediately presents itself—how do you know that the writings which the vendor produces are all the writings which can be presented to shew that the title to the estate is good? He may suppress or conceal some; while, on the other hand, documents may exist which he would be willing to produce, but which he is entirely ignorant of." Every one at all conversant with such matters, knows that this statement is true, and it will be for those who oppose a general registry, to shew in what other manner this doubtfulness in so serious a matter as the conveyance of landed property is to be done away with. In England it is no uncommon thing for the agent of a purchaser of property to be furnished with a mass of parchments in support of an abstract of title, which if spread out, would almost carpet the whole estate, meadow and pasture, loft and croft, park and paddock—a mass which no human patience can ever carefully examine; and after all, there is no certainty that some others may not exist, which render all those no better than so much waste paper. How much more safe, expeditious, and satisfactory would it not be, to have an authentic abstract from a registry-office, where you would be certain that all valid deeds respecting the property must be entered, and where its various transfers would be briefly set forth, while for particular investigations copies at length of the conveyances could be had. The talk about "exposure" is mere affectation. If a man be honest and not a fool, he will not care about his transfer of landed property being entered in a public office; if he be not honest, so much the better that he should have a registry-office to thwart and perplex his plans.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

Sir Edward Sugden then brought forward his motion respecting improvements in the administration of justice in the Court of Chancery. It is a great pity that his statement was so prolix, and so devoid of force and spirit, for few persons, except those particularly interested, will have courage to attempt reading the speech, and yet it would be well that the country at large knew the abuses of the present system in the Chancery Court, and cried out as one man for their reformation. There seems to be no clearness, no certainty, no provision for dispatch in any one stage of the proceedings of a cause, while the profits of counsel, solicitors, masters, clerks, and others that we have neither memory, time, nor space, to enumerate, are in direct proportion to the delay of justice which takes place. But so shamefully loose is the system, that even when all the delays are overcome, and a decree obtained, the controversy may possibly have to begin afresh, to find out what the decree was, and the unfortunate suitor be as far from an actual decision as ever. Let it be remembered that the following statement is from no ranting Oppositionist, who talks at random about what he does not accurately know, but has been given in the House of Commons by the ablest Chancery lawyer in the kingdom, and the one most constantly employed. Sir Edward Sugden says, "the pressure of business is such, that after every decision, no one can distinctly say what it is, and one barrister having one, and another another, the registrar is not able to draw it up. Then come hearings and re-hearings in the registrar's office, before a person incompetent to decide the matter, to settle what the decree of the court was; and after an enormous expense for attendances, not to mention the loss of two or three months' time perhaps, the parties again come to the court—when judge, barristers, and every one have forgotten every thing about the cause—to have decided what the court decided three months before."
VOL. XXIX. NO. CLXXVII.

"That," continued the lawyer, "is not the way that justice should be administered in a free country." Why, no, truly! it requires but little profundity of knowledge to arrive at that conclusion. Not the way that justice should be administered! How wretchedly tame is this manner of speaking! It is most abominably wrong, and so incredibly stupid and absurd withal, that, unless with such grave authority as that under which we have received it, we should have found it impossible to believe that a thing so monstrous could occur in the English Court of Chancery. Sir Edward announced his determination, however, to be so fixed for the removal of this evil, that if it were not taken up by the government, he would himself bring forward a measure for its remedy. In the present instance, he contented himself with a statement of his view of the evils existing in the Chancery administration generally, and made no motion with a view to their remedy, leaving that in the hands of the government. Mr Hume, it appears, has invented a term to designate these speeches, which lead to nothing specific—he calls them “splash;” and poor Sir Edward was astounded in the midst of his grave speech, by hearing Mr Hume announce, in a tone loud enough to be distinctly heard, “This is mere splash.” The honourable member for Middlesex subsequently explained, that he was merely talking aside at the time, and did not intend to address the House at large, or to offend the learned ex-Solicitor-General.

Sir Edward Sugden, who is a bold little man in professional matters, and not a little confident in his reputation as a lawyer, thought proper to inform the House, in the course of his speech, that the present Chancellor was “entirely uninformed on the law of equity, which he was called upon to administer,” and in any case, nothing was more likely than that he should decide wrong. This, from the greatest practitioner in the Court, concerning the judge before whom he must daily plead the causes of his clients; this, stated in the House of Commons, respecting the principal judge in the kingdom, is sufficient to fill the public with disgust against a system which makes such a gross anomaly possible. The selection of a judge, on the ground of political ability merely, is, after all, just as absurd as it would be to choose a man for political office, on account of his legal knowledge. What would be thought of Mr Justice Littledale, as a Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs?

On the 17th, the House of Lords discussed the subject of the Scotch representation, and the desire existing in Scotland for a reform therein. Lord King, a worthy champion for any thing having a dash of absurd extravagance, mingled with its radical principles, presented what purported to be the Reform petition of the county of Renfrew. The reception of the petition was opposed by the Earl of Haddington, on account of the violence of the expressions it contained; and his Lordship's speech, after Lord King had consented to withdraw the petition, was one of that description which always makes us honour the House of Lords—deliberate and manly, well considered and well expressed; with the moderation that belongs to truth, and the dignity that belongs to high station. The Marquis of Bute, too, spoke with a zeal and spirit worthy of the country which takes “Nemo me impune lacesset” for its motto. “Epithets,” said the noble Lord, “have been applied to the people of Scotland, which will justify the observations which I am about to make. These expressions have not only been used by a noble English Peer (King), but they also fell from a noble Viscount, connected with Scotland. (Duncan.) They stated that the people of Scotland are oppressed and degraded; but I tell these noble lords, as well as the rest of your Lordships, that if the people of Scotland considered themselves oppressed and degraded, they would not tamely submit without addressing your Lordships in a very different manner; they would make their complaints heard throughout the empire. I will assert that the people of Scotland are well satisfied with the conduct of their representatives, or we should before now have heard of their dissatisfaction. It is quite a new thing to hear that Scotland is not well represented in the United Parliament. I defy any man in the House to say, that out of the forty-five Scotch Members, there is any one man who is corruptly returned. I do not hesitate to affirm, that at least forty-four out of the forty-five members returned for Scotland, are directly connected with the place which they represent—this cannot be alleged of the English Members. I say the people are well satisfied with their representation, and do not desire a change."

This is something like what a speech should be—it stirs a man's blood, and relieves one from the dull insipidity which is the ordinary inflection of speeches.

In the House of Commons, Mr Wilson Patton drew the attention of the House to the duties on printed cottons. It appears that two millions a-year are levied for this tax, of which, at least three-fourths are paid back in the shape of drawbacks, and no more than from four to five hundred thousand pounds reaches the Exchequer. The tax, moreover, presses very unequally, as the dearest and the cheapest printed cottons pay the same duty per yard. A tax, in every respect so objectionable, cannot long continue to exist in its present form.

Lord Nugent postponed his "Labouring Poor Bill," until after the holidays. He attempted an apologetic explanation of the postponement; but he need not have given himself the trouble. Every one knows how necessary postponement is at present to the health of any measure, to which a member of the government stands godfather.

A conversation arose on the presentation of some petitions by Mr Curteis, as to the benefit of supporting the labouring poor by small grants of land, to be cultivated by spade labour, when Sir John Sebright, member for Hertfordshire, maintained the extraordinary doctrine, that a free gift of ground, beyond the quantity necessary for a kitchen-garden, would be not a boon, but a disadvantage, to the labourers. What dogma is there so strange that will not find some supporters in the British House of Commons? There were some men there who supported McCulloch's insanity about absentees.

The enlightened and liberal Alderman Waithman said, there was scarcely a position in political economy that experience did not contradict—Et tu Brute! The worthy alderman said, that, on the 15th of February, he would lay on the table "a string of resolutions," to exhibit the cause of all our misfortunes. There are less sensible fellows in the world than Alderman Waithman; but he had better take care of Hunt. Two stars cannot shine at once in the same firmament.

On the 20th, in the Lords, Lord Stanhope poured forth upon the Lord Chancellor the wrath which had been swelling in his bosom since the 10th, when Lord Brougham thought fit to be sarcastically witty at his lordship's expense. Lord Stanhope's severity was bitter and contemptuous enough; it produced no reply.

The Lord Chancellor announced his intention of looking particularly to the care of the numerous lunatics of whom he is the official guardian; and spoke of the appointment of a small medical board, as a kind of cabinet council, to advise the Lord Chancellor respecting these unhappy persons. We hope there is no job in this. There are many "doctors" about the London University, who would be happy to accept the assurances of the Lord Chancellor's distinguished consideration, conveyed in the form of a snug little appointment of this sort.

In the Commons, Mr Robinson presented a petition complaining of the proceedings at the late Liverpool election; upon which Mr Ewart, the member returned at that election, said, that he came in for the representation of Liverpool by the support of the most respectable middle classes of society, and with the most cordial and enthusiastic demonstrations of popular approbation. "Even this circumstance," he continued, "however gratifying and delightful it is to my feelings, is nothing when compared with my own deep consciousness of rectitude;—with that meus conscia recti, within my breast, to which extraneous circumstances can add little or nothing." All this is modest; and very pleasant, after the notorious and prodigious bribery, at that seat of cotton and the muses, which lieth by the western main, a few weeks ago. How hard it is to come at truth!

Sir George Clerk took advantage of Mr Ellice's motion for the third reading of the Consolidation Fund Bill, to put a question to the Vice-President of the Board of Trade, respecting the reduction of the duty on foreign barilla by an order from the Treasury. Mr Poulett Thomson, in his peculiarly disagreeable style, avowed this repeal of a tax, without the consent of Parliament, and coolly stated, that he would be ready to justify the conduct of the government when he brought in the bill, which is intended to give legislative sanction to what the executive is now doing out of its mere absolute will, and in defiance of an unrepealed act of Parliament. Barilla is one of the articles on which, some years ago, a heavy importation duty existed, for the protection of our domestic manufacture of kelp, which, on the coast of Scotland, and, we believe, on the western shore of Ireland also, gave profitable employment to a vast number of poor people. Since the prevalence of the "enlightened and liberal" doctrines of free trade, the supporters of which are for the most part persons of understanding too sublime to trouble themselves about what concerns the welfare of the poor, this protecting duty has been gradually diminished, first from L.14 to eight guineas, and then to five guineas. The late government, whose knowledge upon matters of trade was equal to their knowledge on most other subjects, and who had a strange alacrity in sinking into the worst errors of the worst political quacks, had an intention of submitting to Parliament a measure for the further reduction of the duty, but Mr Poulett Thomson, who, on a three days' notice of the willingness of Lord Grey to give him a place, contrived to separate himself from a mercantile concern, the principal branch of which was dominated in Saint Petersburg, and who therefore cannot be supposed not to have any interest in the advance on Russian tallow, which the order in council has caused, was determined to be impeded by no such old-fashioned delays as an application to Parliament, to undo what Parliament had done, but advised an instant reduction of the duty to L.2, and the Custom-house officers received directions to admit it at that duty—the importer giving bond to pay the difference between L.2 and L.5, or, in the event of Parliament not sanctioning the measure. Now, any thing more audacious than this, while Parliament was actually sitting, and in a matter in which no urgent necessity existed, we can hardly suppose possible. No doubt, a government might attempt to impose a tax, as well as to take one off, without the consent of Parliament, but as this is probably a stretch beyond the reach of even Mr Poulett Thomson's liberal off-hand way of managing affairs, we may set down this act of arbitrary authority as about the extremity of executive assurance, and, for the first month of office, it is pretty well. What is to become of the home manufacture of kelp, the Vice-President of the Board of Trade did not condescend to explain, and probably the awkwardness of having to answer such a question may have been one of the reasons for doing the thing first, and coming to ask leave afterwards—doubtless it will be permitted to enjoy the same glorious martyrdom to the principles of free trade that has already fallen upon British lead, and wool, and tallow, and gloves. How happy it is to live in times when philosophy guides the principles of government!

The delivery of sundry speeches on the state of Ireland, and the recent dismissals and appointments there, and a continuation of the debate on the administration of justice in the Court of Chancery, which we have already noticed, occupied the rest of the evening of the 20th.

On the 21st, Lord Wynford introduced to the House of Lords a bill for better enabling creditors to avail themselves of the property of their debtors. The present system of the law is to afford a remedy chiefly against the person of the debtor, and the chance of payment for the creditor mainly depends upon it being the desire of the debtor, rather to pay the debt than suffer the penalty awarded by the law against his person. It frequently happens, however, that the debtor, either by escaping beyond the jurisdiction of the courts of law, or by submitting to that fiction of imprisonment, called "living within the rules of the King's Bench," may continue to enjoy his landed or funded property in England, to live sumptuously, and laugh at his creditor, upon the proceeds of whose credulity he may perhaps be enjoying himself. Lord Wynford's bill, therefore, is "to prevent debtors from defrauding their creditors by lying in prison, or absconding from England," and this he proposes to accomplish by certain alterations in the law respecting outlawries, and by giving power to the judges to appoint receivers of the rents of debtors during their lives, for the payment of their debts. In these days, when it is so usual for people to run a brief career of criminal extravagance, and then to run off to the continent, and live well upon their means, while their creditors at home are left und, a measure of the kind that Lord Wynford proposes, if it can be brought into "working order," must be of very important benefit.

In the House of Commons, Mr Hume presented the petition agreed to at the Middlesex County Reform Meeting. The principal matters contained in the petition, the honourable member described to be, the necessity of economy and retrenchment, the mal-administration of the poor-laws, and the misapplication of the rates—the odious system of tithe collection—the necessity of parliamentary reform, and of extending the right of voting for representatives to every individual paying rates and taxes, and finally the petitioners ask for the establishment of vote by ballot, without which no reform can be productive of substantial or permanent benefit to the country. Mr Hume stated that he was convinced that no government could exist under the present state of the country, unless it followed the advice urged in this petition. This is not the place to enter into so large a discussion as that of the topics of the Middlesex petition, but we may observe, that Mr Hume's declaration is tantamount to his saying that no government can exist without a revolution. Some very good speeches were made in the course of the debate on the petition—that of Mr Atwood was the best which has been delivered against the new government since its formation. There are few men now in the House of Commons who can compete with this gentleman in practical knowledge, or in the power of sound and vigorous reasoning on the most important questions of domestic policy which come under discussion.

The evening's business was concluded by a long discussion on the subject of a petition from Essex, respecting tithes, presented by the eternal Mr Joseph Hume. At the close of some observations by Sir Robert Inglis, he was so injudicious as to notice the obstreperous cheering of the talking member for Clare, who "spake upon that hint," until, becoming rather unendurable, he was stopped by Mr Courtenay's motion for counting the House. The Hibernian was in a towering passion at the interruption, though he was himself the person who seconded a motion of the same description the evening before, when Sir Charles Wetherell was speaking—the difference between his motion and Mr Courtenay's lay in this, that the latter was not marked by rudeness of speech.

A great deal of business was crowded into the evening of the 23d in the House of Commons. Our limits will not permit us to allude to more than two of the topics, which we shall think it convenient to take in a different order from that which they held in the House of Commons' discussion. First, then, we have to notice Mr Guest's motion for a copy of the warrant, or other document, granting a pension of £1200 per annum to Mrs Harriette Arbuthnot. A question of this nature, which inevitably connects the names and circumstances of private individuals with a financial document, which, when brought before the public as it has been, the public has an undoubted right to sift and examine, is one which cannot be approached without some feelings of delicate reluctance, and yet it is one, which, from the interest it excites, and which it ought to excite, cannot be passed by without a remark.

The return of the pensions charged on the civil list is, taking it for all in all, a document which we scarcely think the Ministry were justified in permitting to be printed for the general information of the public. It was granted as a bait for popularity, which has failed of its effect, and it exhibited a disrespect towards the privacy generally understood to belong to royal bounties of this kind, which is as unbecoming in Ministers of the Crown, as it is embarrassing in its effects to individuals who neither supposed, nor had reason to suppose, that they were receiving allowances which the public at large were to examine and comment upon. It may be a very proper subject for discussion in the House of Commons, whether the monarch ought to have a large sum placed at his disposal, to be granted away by him in pensions to such persons as, from his own knowledge, or the recommendation of others, he may deem deserving of such bounty; but such a sum having been granted and disposed of by the King, it is scarcely fair now to drag before the public the names of all those among whom it has been shared. It is true that the King could only grant a pension on his civil list for his own life, and therefore, at the formation of a new Civil List, it may be proper to see whether the persons favoured in the former distribution ought to be continued in the receipt of money, to which, without the aid of Parliament, they have no further claim; but this is a matter in which they at least should be parties, and every pensioner should have had the option of saying—"What I received hitherto, I received from the King, and I do not choose to submit my name to the public for a continuation of the bounty."

The document being now before the public, they have, we shall not deny, much reason to regret that the money which they placed at the King's disposal should have been appropriated as in many instances it has been; and we are free to confess, that many items in this paper cannot be read without disgust, while there are but few indeed attached to names which the public will recognise as being worthy of a special interference of royal bounty. The public should therefore take care that, for the future, a sum should not be thus placed, nominally in the hands of the King, but actually in the hands of his servants, to be wasted upon objects to which, from their profligacy, they have become attached. The power should be taken away from the King's Ministers to grant away annuities, as if they were a private donation from the King; and whatever pensions are not from the privy purse, should be on the consolidated fund, and come yearly before the public in the financial accounts.

It is not merely by the pensions on the civil list that the public is blinded to the sum actually spent by the country in this manner—there is no source of revenue that has not pensions saddled upon it in its progress to the Exchequer—Customs, Excise, Stamps, Post Office, &c., &c., all have their deductions for pensions before they reach the consolidated fund, and then that general fund is loaded with another most formidable list. There are also lists of pensions on the four and a half per cent sugar duties, and on the shilling, and the sixpenny, pension duties. Everywhere there are pensions—and some names there are so fortunate, as to be found in almost all the lists. It is, therefore, very desirable that all pensions should be carried to one account—that all the branches of revenue should be paid in, without any deduction but the actual expenses of collection, and a sum be taken from the aggregate to defray the whole amount of the pension list.

The other subject of this evening's debate, with which we shall conclude our Parliamentary review for this month, was the adjournment of the House to the 3d of February. Upon the consideration of this motion, it seems natural to ask what the government had done since its appointment,—or in what state of flourishing security had it left the country, that it should have been deemed reasonable or politic to take six weeks' holidays from Parliamentary labours, after about a month's exertion; and inevitably to deprive the country for all that time of the aid to be derived from Parliamentary control or advice, no matter what emergency might arise to call for it. Had the government shewn itself very powerful, or had its proceedings met with such undivided approbation as to warrant the supposition, that whatever it might be called upon to do, would be done in accordance with the views of Parliament and the people, there would have been—at all events in the popular view—some excuse for this long suspension of Parliamentary interference and control ; but this has not been the case—on the contrary, in looking back at what the new government has done, we find nothing to give satisfaction to any party, except themselves, which does not consist in mere promises and pledges, while every act upon which they have ventured, has been productive of loud complaint, and has been decidedly despotic in its character, and inimical to the feelings of the people. They pledged themselves to peace, and increased the standing army by six thousand men ; they pledged themselves to economy, and made new legal appointments in Ireland, which have saddled the country with a large unnecessary expense, while they have filled the bar of Ireland with indignation, and the people with rage. They pledged themselves to reform, and endeavoured to procure a new writ of election for a place which had just been convicted of gross bribery and corruption in the return of members of Parliament, and to crown all these, they abolish a tax laid on for the protection of a domestic manufacture, without asking the consent of Parliament, or any consent but that of their own absolute will.

On which of these acts, we should like to know, do they ground their claims for that perfect confidence which alone would justify them, in such times as these, in adjourning the parliament for six weeks ? Is it the tranquillity of Ireland, the content of England, the settled state of affairs in France, or all these things together, that they rely upon for not requiring parliamentary advice for six weeks ?

The truth is, that Whigs always have that enormously high opinion of their own abilities, which makes them essentially despotic in temper and inclination. Because they can talk with smartness, they suppose they can judge of every thing better than those who do not talk so smartly, and they would feel no diffidence whatever in setting about governing the country without any Parliament, if that, according to the constitution of the country, were possible. As far as it is possible, we find them endeavouring to do so, and as usual, with the cry of liberality and popular liberty in their mouths, tyranny and jobbing mark their acts. Happily, this overweening conceit, which makes a Whig government so odious, carries with it the principle of that government's dissolution. Each individual is so vain of himself, and his own plans, that no dozen of them can continue for any length of time to act in harmony together—their councils become disturbed by disagreements and bickerings, and they soon fall asunder, and find themselves again on the Opposition benches, where they may indulge themselves in saying that which, in government, they are incapable of doing.

We have not the least doubt that this would almost immediately be the fate of Lord Grey's Ministry, were there any party formed, ready and competent to take up the government in its place ;—but old associations are dreadfully shaken in this country ; political confidence has gone ; hope has almost withered, and with a raging desire in the people for change, men shrink from political responsibilities.

SONNETS ON THE GIANTS' CAUSEWAY.

I.

WHENCE rose ye? on what basement are ye stayed,
 Ye forms of wondrous grandeur? Who hath hewn
 These matchless strong proportions? Who hath strewn
 This mass of glorious power? Whom obeyed
 Nature in rearing thee, Dread Colonnade?
 Answers come sounding forth from depth and height!
 While ocean bears me on, hark from these caves
 A thousand echoes tell,—and as it raves Against yon headland shores, its voice of might Thunders the Name at which Heaven's pillars bow!
 E'en ye too mean to prop his footstool-world—
 Down at His presence shall ye quickly flow—
 Soon from your sunless rests shall ye be hurled;
 When in one flame the Universe shall glow!

II.

WHERE are the deep-laid chymic cisterns, whence Precipitate congealed these crystals vast?
 Or what the forges, whose wild vehemence,
 Fanned by the bellows of an earthquake-blast,
 Into these moulds the molten mineral cast?
 O! far from scenes like these be banished hence Proud theory and arrogant pretence!
 Memorials of a world adjudged and past!
 Ye solemn monuments, of nothing vain,
 Over some guilty race like tombs ye rise!
 Or, sweeter thought, ye shaped to Heaven's strain
 Attuning mighty order from the skies,—
 The trophied architecture of a reign
 With whose mysterious harmony it vies!

III.

A HIGHWAY for your God! and lo! the Sea
 Gave way, and wondering Spectator stood:
 Its boiling fury was at once subdued,
 And its waves kissed the mole, no longer free!
 A highway for your God! and suddenly
 The promontory cross-way gave the flood:
 And still the surge repeats that "all is good"
 To the Primeval Mandate, "Let it be!"
 So, when Thy Footsteps, Lord, are still unknown
 As through the waters deep Thou hold'st thy course,
 Thy people onward pass, not overflown,
 The wildest billows soon have spent their force,—
 Soft gales just breathe where tempests long have blown,
 All stilled and hushed to ocean's deepest source!

IV.

ARE ye not bulwarks to this lovely Isle,—
 Isle of the shamrock, of the harp and saint?
 Where verdure doth its greenest beauties paint,
 And hill, glen, lake, in each proportion smile,
 Framed in by every mountain's grim defile!
 What though among its legends, strangely quaint,
 We trace the spread of superstition's taint,
 As flaws deform thee, thou great Barrier Pile:
 The trefoil twined around Life's healing tree,—
 The song of holy burden filled the air,—
 Wide flew the seed of the devout Culdee,
 And grateful harvests well repaid his care!

And Thou wast as the Porch to which to flee,
When Erin was Earth's purest House of Prayer!

V.

AND stretches outward,—to yon Wondrous Rock,
In magic pillars rising from the deep,
Of lightest cluster or with bending sweep,
Braving the eddy's waste and billow's shock,
As placed the works of human art to mock,— Stretches this platform's massive masonry,
As if a pathway leading through the main,
To the ne'er-closing threshold of this Fane,
Paving the ocean's dark immensity?
That hidden cloister shall no eye discern:
That sunken passage shall no plummet sound:
There only monsters plunge who may not learn
Why reaches on this sea-dividing bound,— Secrets, till Sea shall dry and Earth shall burn!

VI.

DREAD Temple of the Waters! Ocean-Shrine!
Oft beneath pointed roof, through lengthened aisle,
Of superstition's dight and columned style,
The Pattern we recall of Truth divine,
And as we gaze, deplore the strange decline.
No sin thy self-hewn pillars can defile!
No cheat thy self-sprung arches can beguile!
Far nobler than where golden altars shine!
Ages have seen thee! while the piles of earth
Have mouldered: if indeed thou wast not flung
In all thy majesty from Nature's birth:
And when the Morning Stars blest jubilee sung,
Didst thou not all reverberate their mirth?
Here Pilgrim Waves aye bowed, and Choir-Winds rung!
LEODIENSIS.

GOOD-NIGHT.

TO MARY —.

Good-night, good-night, our lamp expiring
Now sheds around still softer light,
'Tis time for friends from friends retiring,
To whisper low, Good-night, good-night.

Dim age, in chimney corner dozing,
Now sees no more thine eyes still bright,
And tired wight from toil reposing,
Stops not to say, Good-night, good-night.

And now the tale and jest no longer
Circle round with laughter gay,
And Morpheus soothes with magic stronger
Than storied page or poet's lay.

Thou haste, beneath your pillow placing
The bride-cake, charn'd with mystic spell;
Doubt not, dear girl, some dream's wild tracing
The secret of your soul shall tell.

Oh! should some kind propitious Fairy Amid the darkness wandering be,

May she trip lightly round my Mary,
And fill her sleep with thoughts of me!

But when her snowy hands have braided
In glossy folds her flowing hair,
And platted borders closely shaded
That gentle face, so kind and fair;

Ere, dear maiden, sleep has bound you
In his soft and unfelt chain,
Cast a parting glance around you
From your woodbine-latticed pane.

Faint the lonely taper gleameth
From some cottage home afar,
Its little ray but feebly streameth
Through the dark and silent air.

No sound is heard at this still hour,
Save leaf of aspen quivering light;
And nought but scent of fragrant flower
Is borne upon the breath of night.

And silent nature, deep reposing,
Sheds around a holy calm,
And mortal eyelids softly closing,
Find her sweet and gentle balm.

But while to peaceful rest betaking,
Weary man is sunk in sleep,
In heaven ten thousand eyes awaking,
Their bright immortal vigils keep.

Star beyond star for ever shineth,
Radiant in yon vast profound,
Whose dark blue depths no bound confineth,
Nor winged thought hath power to sound.

Shall fancy seek, such height ascending,
Amid their glittering orbs to soar,—
Read their bright page, and lowly bending,
Deep in your inmost soul adore?

And in that mighty Power confiding,
Who gave to beam their living light,
Oh, fear not aught of ill betiding,
But peaceful sleep—good-night, good-night!

THE EARLY LOST.

BY DELTA.

FARE-thee-well, fair flower, that opening
To the genial smile of day,
By the storm-blast, in a twinkling,
From our sight wert swept away!
Never more thy voice shall cheer us,
Never more thy form be seen,
In our solitude we startle
But to think that thou hast been!

Now the sun illumes our dwelling,
 Sings the bird, and buds the tree;
 Nature starts as from her slumber,
 But no wakening rouseth thee!
 Never more for thee the morning
 Shall its golden gates unfold;
 Past alike are joy and sorrow,
 Summer's heat and winter's cold.

Vainly would our tears restore thee—
 Thou art now a thing of yore.
 Waves, that lull the ear with music,
 Melt for ever on the shore;
 Yet at eve, when sings the tame bird,
 By thy hand once duly fed,
 Seem its notes not nature's wailing
 Over thee, the early dead?

Softly, softly gleam'd thy ringlets,
 Braided in their auburn hue
 Keenly, keenly lustre darted
 From thine eyes of floating blue;
 Now the mould lies scatter'd o'er thee,
 And, with deep and dirge-like tone,
 Pipes at eve the haunting blackbird,
 O'er thy mansion, low and lone.

Dark, anon, shall storms be rolling,
 Through the waned autumnal sky,
 Winds be raving, waves be roaring,
 Sullen deep to deep reply;
 Winter shall resume his sceptre
 O'er the desolated earth,
 But no more wilt thou, like sunlight,
 Brighten up our cheerless hearth.

When around that hearth we gather,
 Jocund mirth no more beguiles;
 Up we gaze upon thy picture,
 Which looks down on us—and smiles;
 And we sigh, when, in our chambers,
 On the couch our limbs we lay,
 That the churchyard grass is waving,
 Lonely, o'er thy silent clay!

Why our mourning? We lament not,
 Even although our hearts be riven,
 That in being's sunny spring-time,
 Thou wert snatch'd from earth to heaven:
 Life to thee was still enchantment,
 And 'twas spared thy heart to know,
 That the beams of mortal pleasure
 Always sink in clouds of woe.

Fare-thee-well then. Time may bring us
 Other friends—but none like thee,
 Who, in thy peculiar beauty,
 Wert, what we no more shall see:
 From our ears seraphic music
 In thy voice hath died away;
 From our eyes a glorious vision
 Pass'd, to mingle in the clay!

THE effervescence caused by the change of Ministry has subsided, and much has been revealed touching the policy of both the Cabinet and the Opposition; the moment, therefore, has arrived for subjecting the state of parties to impartial discussion.

The times place before us astonishing vicissitudes and incongruities. That Tory party, which a few short years since proudly stood at the head of the country, invested with all the characteristics of invincibility, and with every foe prostrate before it, has been made by suicide a ruined minority. That Wellington Ministry, which but the other day was covered with Eastern adulation, and supported by almost every newspaper and party, has been cast from office by general contempt and hostility. That Whig Earl Grey, who, three or four years ago, pathetically lamented in Parliament, that he had scarcely a friend or party left him, and who has ever since been the object of Whig attack, has been by common consent placed at the head of the Cabinet. The Whigs have gained office in defiance of Whig newspapers and partisans, and mainly through the favour and efforts of Tories. And that immaculate press which defended the Wellington Ministry with so much zeal against Whig assailants, now defends the Whig Ministry with equal zeal against the Duke and his fallen brethren.

We regard the change with pleasure, as a step towards national salvation. It is our maxim, that, in a free state, the most powerful party ought to hold office; if its doctrines be erroneous, this is essential for opposing them with the greatest effect; if they be true, it ought in common justice to have the honour and emolument derived from giving them application. Revolution has just been in France produced by the violation of this maxim; and in England it has been prevented, for the present at least, by the practice of it. For some years the present Ministers have supplied those in office with doctrines and measures, on the one hand, and with suppressed hostility to them, on the other; they have had the part of the community which would not follow them gagged at their feet; in reality, they have been the Ministry, to the extinction of the Opposition. By gaining office, they have lost half their power; at the worst they can make no change of policy; they can only do what they would have compelled their predecessors to do, had the official existence of the latter been spared; while therefore there can be no loss, there must be this mighty profit—they can no longer govern the Opposition in Parliament, or hold in chains the mighty mass of their opponents out of it. The change has transformed them from an odious despotism, combining in itself both the Ministry and Opposition, into a constitutional Ministry—it has restored the constitution from a state of suspended animation.

The present is called a Whig Ministry, it comprehends the leading Whigs; but yet in the professions of some of its members, and even in persons, it is more a Tory one than the last was. Reform, in the better sense of the word, will be called a Tory question, by at least the Pitt Tories. Earl Grey, Sir J. Graham, and the Duke of Richmond, make nearer approach to the policy of Pitt, than the Duke of Wellington, Sir R. Peel, or any other member of the late Cabinet. The Toryism of Mr Goulburn and Sir G. Murray does not seem to be a whit better than that of Lord Althorpe and Lord Goderich. Even Lord Brougham is evidently as sound a Tory as Lord Lyndhurst. With regard to the Board of Trade, Lord Auckland cannot be more of a free-trader than Mr Herries is; and Mr Courtenay is a blind follower of Mr P. Thomson.

The present Ministry has a certain portion of character, but the last had none; we think it will be more sensitive to public opinion than the last was.

We, of course, prefer the Grey Cabinet to the Wellington one; but our preference goes no farther than this—we deem the former the best of the bad, the least in the choice of evils. On several leading matters of policy, we are equally and strongly opposed to both; and the shame will not be ours of tolerating that in Earl Grey, Lord Althorpe, and Mr P. Thomson, which we fought against in the Duke of Wellington, Mr Huskisson, and Mr Herries.

A kind of exemption from opposition is claimed for the new Ministry, on the ground that it has entered office at a season of great difficulty. What forms the difficulty? The country is distressed, convulsed, and on the brink of revolution. This supplies the best of all reasons for opposing it with the utmost vigour in bad principles and measures. In other respects, it entered office under circumstances favourable beyond example. It has the Opposition chained to its own policy; no rival party exists which could retain office; it has little ability, and no eloquence, to contend with in Parliament; and that part of the community not with it is neutral. The conduct displayed by its members towards others, before they obtained power, makes them less entitled, than any other living men, to tenderness, in regard to personal scrutiny and observation. We shall from all this speak of them without paying the least attention to the deprecatory doctrines against opposition.

Notwithstanding the many things in its favour, the existing Cabinet will, we think, soon fall. Party names have lost their charm, and become terms of reproach; the time is past in which a body of men could gain public favour merely by calling themselves Whigs or Tories. It has been observed that at the last election no candidate durst offer himself as a supporter of the Ministry; to this must be added, no one durst offer himself as an adherent of the Whig Opposition; all were compelled to stand on professions of independence of party. While, therefore, this Cabinet must rest chiefly on its merits, most of the things are to be seen in it which ruined the last, and which in our judgment must, and ought, to ruin every Cabinet in which they are found.

In the first place, it is composed of discordant and conflicting materials; if the past professions of its members are to be believed, scarcely any two of them think alike on great state questions, and one part is fiercely opposed to the other. These must be the certain fruits: 1. It can only enjoy internal harmony through violation of principle. 2. It can adopt no comprehensive and effective measures. 3. At every material step, it must destroy its character, and divest itself of supporters. Its parts, as others have remarked before us, have been cast in the worst manner; almost every member has been placed in the office he is the most unfit for, in respect of talent and principle; the whole are so disposed of, that the best are made the instruments of the worst, and every one must, of necessity, be stripped of character, who possesses any.

It seems to be a law of nature, that a Whig must be a boaster, and the present Ministers possess, in an eminent degree, the talent for bestowing self-praise. They have lauded themselves, in an extravagant manner, on their consistency. Lord Brougham, with an intrepidity as matchless as it is disgusting, declares that consistency is a part of his nature; happy man, to be so gifted in times like these! Well, he broadly intimated to his Yorkshire constituents, that the Corn Law was a great evil to one part of the community, and no benefit to the other; he, however, takes office under a Premier who insists that the Corn Law, or something equivalent to it, shall stand; he is a free-trader, yet he embraces, as his colleague, that Duke of Richmond who laboured so strenuously to impose a duty on foreign wool. Earl Grey, a few years since, took occasion to sneer at political economy and Mr Huskisson's experiments; he has, on different occasions, professed friendship for bank notes; and in certain election speeches, his relatives, Lords Durham and Howick, condemned the destruction of the Navigation Laws; yet, in forming his Ministry, he has given the Exchequer and Board of Trade to romantic champions of a gold currency and free trade. Sir J. Graham, an advocate of small notes, takes office with their enemies; a year or two ago, he called for a party to oppose that of the "lawyers and free-traders;" and lo! he has plumped himself into the very thick of these ravenous animals. The Duke of Richmond declared, not long since, that he would belong only to the "Country Party," to the "Conservative Party," and he has found these parties in the low Whigs and Economists; after labouring to give protection to the wool-grower, he joins in taking it from the kelp manufacturer. He insists on giving relief to the labouring classes in one quarter, and at the same moment, takes the bread from many thousands of them in another. Of course, the rest of the Ministers have acted in a similar manner.

These men may call this consistency, but if it be, Sir Robert Peel and those who acted like him on the Catholic Question, are very consistent people. We look not at party names; a Whig and Tory, if they think alike and violate no party obligation, may honourably act together; but there can be no consistency without general harmony of principle. Such conduct is alike ruinous to public men and the country. It strips them of integrity, and makes them ready to act with any colleagues, and sanction any measures for the sake of personal gain. The example thus set in the Cabinet extends to the great borough proprietors, spreads through Parliament, and is irresistible to the elector. If a Minister or Legislator sell his principles for place, why may not freeholders and burgesses sell theirs for money? It renders it impossible for the country to possess a consistent, effective Ministry. A large part of the Ministerial side, and a large part of the Opposition one, are hostile to free trade, and friendly to small notes; if both were separated from their brethren and formed into a whole, what would follow? The members of each great party would think alike in essentials, party contexts would turn on the questions which divide the community, and the best principles would be practised with due effect. Consistency and integrity, moreover, would be restored amidst public men. The sordid and profligate system now in fashion does much worse than neutralize the Ministry on great questions. It blinds and deludes the country; and in every Ministry, from the Liverpool to the Grey one, including both, it has given the ascendancy to the bad side: the best side has only defended and sacrificed, while the other has attacked and gained.

The present Cabinet practises that wretched imposture on the country, which former ones practised. Here is a Ministry, forsooth! which combines men of every mode of thinking—here are old Whigs and low ones; old and liberal Tories, the Canning party, paper and metal people, restrictive men and free-traders, all blended together in happy union! How, then, can any man, no matter what may be his creed, be other than the friend of such a Ministry? This is the surface—the tale of the false impostor; let us now look at the reality.

Earl Grey, as we have said, has been for some years obnoxious to the Whig body, on the score of principle; he owes his office mainly to his dissent from the general doctrines of the low Whigs and Liberals. How is he fixed in the Cabinet? He has filled the Treasury, Exchequer, and Board of Trade offices with Liberals and free-traders, and he cannot be other than their instrument.

Sir J. Graham possesses a masculine understanding, and much originality and independence of thought; his powers seem to be peculiarly adapted to financial matters. He might have made an able, practical Chancellor of the Exchequer; but he is placed in an office in which his merits, touching powers and principles, cannot be brought into action.

The Duke of Richmond is a man of plain, but solid sense; he was allowed on all hands to display much practical ability in the enquiry touching wool. He might have been of great value in an office connected with trade, but he has one assigned him which makes him a cipher.

In this manner the Ministers of one side are disposed of; let us now see how the offices are filled, they are the best fitted for.

Lord Althorpe is a pure piece of second-hand commonplace; he plods at the reviews and newspapers of his own side with incredible patience; recites their contents with marvellous accuracy; and yet never displays a ray of original thought, or particle of independent judgment. His powers will not permit him to be other than a theorist, and he is a fanatical follower of the free-traders, which is far worse than if he were a head. He is the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Leader of the House of Commons !

Who is Lord Auckland ? asks every publication ;—who is Lord Auckland ? echoes every member of the community ; and the only reply is—Lord Auckland is one of Lord Brougham's people ; moreover, he is one of the M'Culloch people of the London University, and belongs to the Liberals of the Society for Diffusing Useful Knowledge ; but beyond this, nothing is known of Lord Auckland ! Here, then, is an individual who is totally unknown to the country—who is an utter stranger as a public man—who never opens his lips in the Legislature—whose talents and creed are involved in mystery—and who has never put forward the slightest legitimate claim, to entitle him to the meanest office—placed in almost the most important office in the Ministry ;—that of President of the Board of Trade. What has produced this most gross and scandalous job ? for that cannot be other than such a job, which, in the present state of the country, has given such an office to such a man. Are we to find its parentage in Lord Brougham's anxiety to provide for his friends, or in the learned Aristocrat's magnanimous resolve to be both Lord Chancellor and President of the Board of Trade, or in the paternal solicitude of the whole Cabinet to create a man of straw, for the benefit of Mr P. Thompson ? If not, where can it be discovered ?

A President of the Board of Trade like this has, as his Vice-President, Mr P. Thompson. The latter is the gentleman who, in former Parliaments, fought with such desperation in favour of the destructive changes which benefited the foreign trade—he was engaged in as a merchant—stood between the petitions of the ship-owners, &c., and the legislature—and defended Mr Huskisson and Mr Grut, by insulting and defaming their victims. The appointment of this person to the office he holds, excited general disgust and indignation ; even the more sober friends of free trade were ashamed of it ; to various important parts of the community, it was a deliberate insult. This man is a servile follower of the very worst doctrines of the very worst Economists—he is publicly pledged against every iota of protection to either property or labour—he has always manifested a spirit which ought never to be found in an English Minister—and his parliamentary speeches have scarcely raised him to the third class of politicians ; yet he is not only the Vice-President of the Board of Trade, but, according to appearances, the real President also.

Are we to be told that Sir J. Graham would not have made a more capable Chancellor of the Exchequer than Lord Althorpe—that the Duke of Richmond, who is known to the country, and in some respects tried, would not have made a better head of the Board of Trade than the unknown Lord Auckland—and that a Vice-President infinitely superior to Mr P. Thompson could not have been discovered ? No ; the audacity of telling us this, will not be ventured on by any person. Farther, will any one say that Lord Althorpe would not do as well at the head of the Admiralty as Sir J. Graham ; and that Lord Auckland would not be as efficient in the Post-office as the Duke of Richmond ? No.

Thus, then, leading offices are filled by the least competent, and by very incompetent, men, merely that one set of opinions may prevail against another—that the professed opponents of the Economists in the Cabinet may have no influence. In regard to disputed points, there is no division of power ; but on the contrary, all is withheld from the one side and given to the other. In so far as there is a party in the Cabinet opposed to the free-traders and bullionists, it forms but a stalking-horse to blind and delude the country ; the party it pretends to oppose, monopolize every office requisite for enabling them to give effect to their doctrines. Still the Corn Law is to be saved. For this we are devoutly thankful ; but how long is it to be saved ? Earl Grey, the Duke of Richmond, and Sir J. Graham, intrench themselves in this law, and surrender every thing else ; they give a part to save a part ; the other side is only allowed to take the fortifications at first ; but in this it gets sufficient for insuring its possession of the whole. It is ridiculous to think that this law can be preserved, if other protections are to be destroyed.

In consequence of all this, the Ministry has, in general matters, disabled itself for accomplishing any thing, save public evil, and its own ruin. Earl Grey solemnly pledged himself at the outset, that the fullest enquiry should be made into the causes of public suffering. He has ever since strenuously resisted all Parliamentary enquiry, saving the Marquis of Salisbury's motion, which he and the Duke of Richmond were bound to before they gained office, and which only relates to the paupers of certain districts. But then he pledged himself that government would enquire:—if you plead this, look, we beseech you, at his means of redemption. All sides, including the noble Premier himself, declare that the suffering has been in a considerable degree produced by the change of currency; of course it at least will be rigidly scrutinised by government. No! asserts the Premier, and his words are repeated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—this cause of suffering shall be sacred from the profane gaze of enquiry. Landowners and farmers are sustaining great loss, and it is alleged that it flows largely from the change of Corn Law: this, therefore, will of necessity be investigated. No, says Earl Grey, this cause must only be touched by enquiry at a future time, with a view to its enlargement. The lead-miners have been long in great misery, and the cause here will doubtlessly be sought. No, says Mr P. Thompson, we will neither enquire nor regard facts forced on us respecting it. Will enquiry seek the cause which distresses the people employed in the manufacture of kelp? No; Mr P. Thompson declares that the cause here shall be increased without enquiry. In a similar manner, Ministers are rigidly bound, not only from enquiry, but also from noticing voluntary evidence, no matter how conclusive, respecting the most important of the alleged causes of public suffering.

What then becomes of the Premier's solemn pledge in favour of the most comprehensive enquiry?

It is manifestly a mockery and defusion. It is coupled with a counter-pledge equally solemn, which alone is to be redeemed. Demonstration is before the eyes of all, that it cannot and will not be more than a broken promise.

But perhaps Ministers intend to remove the causes of suffering without enquiry. Well, what have they done already? The constitution of this country is a most distasteful thing to the low Whigs and Liberals; no sooner does Mr P. Thompson hang on himself the habiliments of office, than in virtue of his own "economic science," or of "education," drawn by Lord Auckland from the London University, or Society for Diffusing Useful Knowledge, he places it under his feet, and strips Parliament of its power over taxation:—why? Is he so anxious to substitute prosperity for loss—to give bread to the hungry, and raiment to the naked, that his benevolent soul cannot brook the delay of Parliamentary formalities? It is to heap additional misery on the heads of the many thousands engaged in the manufacture of kelp, by reducing the duty on barilla.

Thus the first act of this distress-removing Ministry is to increase public distress—the Duke of Richmond's "conservative party" begins its career with a work of destruction. Let us look a little more at this trumpery experiment—this weak and wicked violation of promise and pledge.

Our readers are aware that the removal or reduction of a duty frequently causes a rise of price which counterbalances it. Leather was lately exempted from duty, and the fruits are, hides have risen, shoes are as dear as ever, and the benefits are monopolised by foreigners, butchers, tanners, &c. Barilla is used in the manufacture of soap, and so is tallow. If one ingredient in an article be cheapened by the removal of duty, it is pretty sure to cause a rise of price, both in this and other ingredients, particularly if it give the least impulse to consumption. The reduction of duty will add something to the price of barilla, and the benefit here, saving for the moment, will go mainly to foreigners. Tallow, from the comparatively small number of houses to which the bulk of its importation is confined, is, to a considerable extent, under monopoly, which can regulate its price almost at pleasure: a great rise in its price, confessedly made by monopoly, has therefore very naturally accompanied the reduction of duty on barilla, and the benefit of it must go chiefly to foreigners, merchants, butchers, &c.

Thus the gain from this exquisite morsel of relief from taxation, will be principally, if not wholly, monopolized by foreigners, merchants, soap-makers, and butchers. Are they in such distress, that it must be mitigated, by taking away the bread of the labouring classes? Complaint speaks not in the affirmative. If soap be cheapened, let it be remembered that the paltry gain to one part of the community is bought with the heavy loss of another. The matter concerns more than one kind of manufacturers; tallow is an article of some moment to candle-makers, and it is consumed to a vast extent by machinery; consequently, if its price be raised, the matter will stand thus—the duty will in effect be taken off barilla and laid on tallow; one part of the manufacturers will be injured as much as another will be benefited, and the community at large will lose more in dear candles than it will gain in cheap soap.

Contrast this with what a reduction of duty on soap, sugar, and similar articles would have been. Such reduction on soap would have injured no one; it would have been clear gain to all. The case would have been the same with sugar; not a soul would have been deprived of capital, profit, or employment; but the whole community would have been benefited; if sugar had risen, the profit would have gone, not to foreigners, but to his Majesty's colonial subjects, and from them it would have partly returned to the population at home.

This will shew the absurdity of Mr P. Thompson's wild generalities, that raw produce used in manufactures ought not to be taxed, &c. These generalities are more frequently false than true. That tremendous mass of errors which is called the science of political economy, is really a body of deductions formed in utter ignorance of three-fourths of those common facts, the knowledge of which is essential for preventing deduction from being false and destructive. It will, moreover, throw light on the imbecility, nay, the guilt of legislating on these wretched generalities, without reference to facts and circumstances, when the latter are in different cases the reverse of each other.

It is pleaded by Ministers in their defence, that in this barilla matter they have only done what their predecessors had resolved to do. Why was the Ministry changed, if they gained office to imitate their predecessors? They, however, have made the matter their own in principle.

Let us now glance at another of their acts. Great as the errors of Mr Canning and Mr Huskisson were, they yet both saw correctly the position in which America stood towards this country, and they constantly shewed a wish to add nothing to her power which peace would justify them in withholding. After their vigorous and wise stroke for excluding her ships from the West India colonies, they took ground which almost precluded negotiation for the re-admission of these ships. The imbecile Wellington Ministry naturally disregarded this, and concluded a treaty with her, as its scribes say, without thinking of shipping; this treaty, of course, expels British ships from the carrying trade in favour of hers, and places her, as her President asserts, in more favourable circumstances than ever. To what portentous cause is it owing that, in every negotiation between England and America, the former is betrayed and despoiled, to place the latter in better circumstances than ever? To this agreement for sacrificing British ships to American ones, was appended another, for imposing protecting duties on American produce admitted into the West India islands, in favour of similar produce of British America.

Well, it might have been hoped that America had got enough in respect of her shipping, and that, after befooling Mr Herries and his brethren, she would not have an opportunity of befooling a second set of official sages in the selfsame negotiation. Alas! what can escape ill-luck! Just after the treaties, perfectly completed, are laid before Parliament, the Grey Ministry assumes being; it of course warmly sanctions that for transferring the carrying trade from British to American shipping; but the other fares differently. What! that Lord Althorpe, who is so passionate an "admirer" of Mr Hume's principles of free trade—that Lord Auckland, who is the associate of Professor McCulloch—that Mr P. Thompson, who maintains that industry, like the "mountain plant," thrives the best without shelter and aliment, approve of a treaty which gives advantages to British colonies at the expense of a foreign nation! No—no, political economy shudders at the enormity. These scientific statesmen can carry into effect a mere intention of the late Ministry touching barilla, because the evils will fall solely on British inhabitants: but they must annul a completed treaty, because it is intended to operate for such inhabitants against foreigners. The treaty is hastily withdrawn, and the negotiation is reopened, solely to injure British colonies for the benefit of America. And what America? That which equals Britain in quality and tonnage of shipping—always displays a hostile spirit to her—and is only separated by a disputed boundary-line from some of her most valuable colonies, is a near neighbour of others, and asserts even through her rulers a natural right to the whole.

The American negotiator is evidently, in cupidity and craft, a genuine scion of Brother Jonathan; but still, perhaps, he does not wholly know the men he has to deal with. Let him take a hint even from us. Mr P. Thompson belongs to the school which holds that the colonies of this country form a pernicious burden to her. Lord Auckland must be a disciple of it also, of course, and so must Lord Althorpe, he being such a devoted admirer of Mr Hume's political economy. Let Jonathan, then, propose to these Ministers, that, as Britain is in such great suffering, his country, with such generosity as only a republic could exhibit, will gratuitously relieve her from the ruinous burden formed by her American colonies—will actually, without equivalent, take the ownership of these colonies and all its attendant losses and evils. They will be delighted with his proposal, but he must not hope that it will be wholly acceded to. The Cabinet must be consulted, and in all probability Earl Grey, Sir J. Graham, and the Duke of Richmond, will demur; the latter, however, on being pressed by their colleagues, will doubtless consent for him to have part; and if he show common dexterity, we imagine he may gain all save Nova Scotia.

Thus far we have no more acts to look at, therefore we turn to other things. Ministers are making every thing fly before them in the way of retrenchment, and are even surrendering a part of their own salaries. We say that retrenchment ought to be carried as far as possible; but in saying this, we must soberly enquire what quantum of relief can be drawn from it; and the crime shall not be ours of asserting that it will remove distress and disaffection. The nature of things demonstrates that it is utterly impossible for reduction of taxes to afford any sensible relief to national loss and want. Ten times more taxes have been repealed in the last fifteen years than these Ministers can repeal, yet the population is far more distressed than it was when it had the whole to pay. A large amount was removed in the last year, yet the cry of distress continues, and discontent has been fearfully enlarged. Is there the slightest ground for believing that if even four or five millions be removed in the current year, it will have any material effect in abating suffering, and subduing dangerous feelings?

A more astonishing and humiliating spectacle was never seen in the world than this—in such a boasting age as the present one, the British government and legislature, amidst national loss, hunger, convulsion, and revolution, content themselves with bawling "retrenchment!" and asserting that a paltry reduction of taxes must form the only, and the infallible, remedy. In charity to the intellect of man, let us for once have a government and legislature of old women! we are sure they would display infinitely more knowledge and wisdom than have been found in the male ones of late years.

The important question now comes before us—what taxes will Ministers repeal? Mr P. Thompson's scheme, as he developed it last session, is, to remove duties from articles used in manufactures. Many of these duties are protecting ones; therefore, like that on barilla, their abolition cannot benefit one producer, without injuring another. Others are duties of revenue, and their removal would not enable the manufactured articles they bear on to sustain foreign competition, or to be sufficiently reduced in price to yield general relief. In great part they rest on imported commodities. It may almost be taken as an axiom, that price must be in some degree raised by repeal of duty; of course the relief gained by repealing the duties in question must, to a large extent, go to foreigners. Farther, the repeal will injure some, as much as it will benefit other parts of the community, in many cases; and in other cases, the profit will be confined to manufacturers and the wealthy classes. Ministers, therefore, will make such a reduction of taxes, as will not reach, in any sensible degree, the losing and starving part of the community; on the contrary, it will frequently add to distress in one quarter, by giving relief not needed in another.

This is not the whole. Ministers are pledged to an immediate settlement of the slavery question, and it is acknowledged by their adherents, that it must give compensation to the colonists for the loss of their slaves. If such compensation be paid by annual instalments, it will, for some years, exceed in amount any reduction that can be made in taxes. Of course, retrenchment can produce no decrease of taxation.

The childish, silly, guilty cry of Retrenchment and Economy, kept up by Ministers, is, in motive and object, mockery and delusion. It feeds the spirit of revolution in every way; and it is resorted to for the purpose of blinding the country to the real causes of its distress, that this distress may be increased by the empirics of the Cabinet.

What general measures are Ministers bound to? It is one of the grand principles of Mr P. Thompson, as he stated in Parliament a year or two ago, that there ought to be no protections of any kind—that property and labour ought to be stripped of all protecting duty. If this empire had not been for its sins doomed to overthrow, such a man could scarcely have gained possession of the Board of Trade. This is one of the principles of which Lord Althorpe is so passionate an admirer; and we may safely take for granted, that it is an immense favourite with the mute Lord Auckland. From, therefore, their pledges and acts, it must be the policy of Ministers to continually sweep away protection. Commencing with the colonies, they are at this moment striking a deadly blow at the trade, property, and labour of the North American ones. Slavery must be abolished, and foreign sugar admitted for home consumption, almost immediately; and this can hardly fail of plunging the West India ones into ruin. Then, to bring British India and the other colonies into the vortex of calamity, the discriminating duties on cotton, &c. &c. must cease to exist.

At home, all this must have mighty effect in enlarging suffering. The abolition of the discriminating duties on timber, and various other colonial productions, must operate ruinously to the shipping interest and all connected with it, chiefly to enrich foreign producers of different kinds, and foreign shipowners. The loss to one part of the community will not be counterpoised by gain to another; on the contrary, the gain will be principally reaped by foreigners. Then every interest in detail must have suffering heaped on it. The help manufacturers are now smitten; from them the blow will pass in succession to the silk throwsters, linen manufacturers, producers of butter, cheese, and salted provisions, hop-growers, &c. &c., until it reaches the heart of agriculture.

We need not appeal to common sense; we have only to look at the history of late years for the most conclusive proof that all this must continually increase public suffering and discontent. It is idle to tell us that the loss of the part must be the gain of the whole; because the whole must lose as much as the part. It is ridiculous to speak of extracting relief from the repeal of taxes, because the loss of means for paying the latter far outstrips the reduction of them. Why is the landed interest distressed at present, when the property-tax and others did not prevent it from enjoying great prosperity? Because its rents, profits, and wages have been reduced by law much more than its taxes. The case is similar with the community at large.

We now put these questions:—

1. When the reduction of taxes made in the last year has not diminished public suffering in any material degree, abated the clamour against taxes, or prevented discontent and disaffection from increasing in the most alarming manner; is it possible for the Ministry to make, by retrenchment and economy, such a reduction as will be sensibly felt in lessening distress and bad feelings?

2. When the Ministry does not even promise to resort to any remedy beyond retrenchment and economy, and when it is evident, from the principles of certain of its members and its acts, that its policy will be of a kind to inflict bitter injuries on one part of the community, without conferring corresponding benefit on the other; is it not demonstrable that it will produce more suffering than its reduction of taxes will balance, and that on the whole it will add largely to distress and discontent?

3. Is it possible for the present Ministry, or any other, to escape ruin, if, amidst public suffering and disaffection, its measures be only calculated to increase them?

4. Can the British empire be saved from revolution and fall, if a sufficiency of employment and adequate wages be not given to the labouring classes; and proper profits be not granted to the middle ones?

Our conviction from all this is, that the Ministry will soon ruin itself, and destroy the character of all its members who possess any. We, however, still think it the best of the bad—the only party of character willing to save the essential portion of what is left of property and subsistence. It is willing to spare, for a time, that mass of property and subsistence which is protected by the Corn Law; and this is more than can be said for the foolish men who would replace such law with a fixed duty. We have been, and still are, anxious to confide in it; but our confidence is only to be gained by proper policy; our hope was, that its free-trade members would be restrained by the rest, but this hope, its acts, and the speeches of these members, have destroyed. We shall oppose bad principles and measures in it, precisely as we would oppose them in any other body of men.

But we speak not thus to support any other body; where is the body we could support without the sacrifice of honour and integrity? A call is put forth for the union of the Tories; and, in reply, we ask, who are the Tories? We look not at names and persons; our question refers only to principles and character—who then, we say again, are the Tories? Here are two, if not three, great parties, which all bear the name and yet are flatly opposed to each other in creed; of course they cannot all be Tories. If the union is to be compassed by allowing each party to retain its creed and leaders, our solemn resolution is, to have no connexion with it whatever. It would form just such a body as the Ministry is,—one divided against itself, holding, in its ascendant division, the worst doctrines of the Ministry, and moreover ruled by the Opposition. If the hard choice were before us, we would rather support the present Ministry, than such a body.

The call is pathetically made on behalf of the Opposition; and as it contains no intimation that Sir R. Peel and his brethren have renounced their errors, it may be taken for granted that they merely seek assistance to regain office. We cannot but remember that, even in Mr Canning's time, the younger of these men scoffed at the anti-liberals, lauded Mr Huskisson's theories, heaped insult on the Tories, and allied themselves with the Whigs and Radicals. We cannot forget, that after the Wellington Ministry was formed, it betrayed and laboured to destroy those who had given it power, carried on an exterminating war against Tories, and used every means, not excepting the worst, to unite itself with the Whigs and Liberals. It cannot be unknown to us, that if the latter had not contemptuously cast them off, these men would still have been the bitter enemies of the Tories.

If public good imposed on us the sacrifice, we would readily put these things out of remembrance; but instead of commanding us to believe the false and trust the faithless, it does the contrary. What principle do we hold in common with these men? On free trade—the currency—reform—the police—and nearly all important matters, we are decidedly opposed to them. On what material points do they dissent from the Whigs and Liberals? Those only on which we believe them to be as far in error as the latter. If they could regain office, they would, at the best, act as the existing Ministry will do; but we suspect they would do worse. We cannot desire to exchange Lord Althorpe for Sir R. Peel, Lord Auckland for Mr Herries, or Mr P. Thompson for Mr Courtenay, when in essentials they hold the same doctrines. These men really are a continuation—the tag-rag-and-bobtail—of the Whigs and Liberals, yet we are to support them because they once professed to be, and still are called, Tories. As a Ministry, they would be no better than the Grey one; as an Opposition, they will be in some degree useful; therefore, on the score of public good, we cannot wish to see them in office.

From the other Tories who speak in Parliament, saying certainly one or two in each House, we differ very widely. They trim their lamps with Whig oil, and we hate both stealing and borrowing. They ascribe public suffering mainly to the change of currency; we ascribe it mainly to other things. By them it is asserted that this change has been injurious by its effects on prices and contracts; by us it is believed that its effects on these were but temporary; and in support of this belief, we find that the prices of leading commodities have been for some time higher than they were before small notes were suppressed, and that we should for several months past have had war prices with the gold currency, if law and situation had been what they were during the war. Their panacea is to allow small notes to circulate on the security of exchequer bills; and our conviction is, that it makes little difference to the banker whether he be compelled to buy exchequer bills or sovereigns. Far be it from us to say any thing to the general disparagement of Mr Attwood, who is one of the most acute, able, and honest men in the Legislature; but his plan we must dissent from. Passing over its objectionable features, it could not, in our judgment, cause any real rise in profits and wages to the mass of the community. Taxes consist chiefly of duties; therefore, if a debased currency reduce them, it must reduce protecting duties equally; no advance of price and wages could be made on goods which are exported. The suppression of small notes has, we believe, done great injury to manufactures and trade in many country parts, by diminishing capital; but we have never been able to discover that it has materially injured farmers by disabling them for obtaining loans. The farmers had abundance of capital of their own; they have not occasion for discounts and loans, like people engaged in trade; their distress has been caused by want, not of capital, but of remunerating prices; and this want has been produced by the change of corn law, and other free-trade measures. We think the restoration of small notes would yield considerable benefit, but would be incapable of removing distress, particularly that of agriculture.

The origin of this currency conduct in these Tories deserves some notice. Up to a certain period, they and their publications cast the blame chiefly on free-trade; then they suddenly became silent on the latter, and arraigned sovereigns. Why? The Whigs and Economists, to conceal the total failure of their wretched experiments, furiously protested that the distress was caused solely by the change of currency; these Tories had not nerve to gainsay them; moreover, they sought a left-handed alliance with the Whigs, and even Mr Huskisson shewed symptoms of joining them. In addition, Sir R. Peel had betrayed them, the change of currency was the measure of him and his colleagues, and the Ministry was the great object of attack. Thus, from sheer cowardice, anxiety to gain Whig and Huskisson heads, and hostility to Sir R. Peel and the Ministry, these Tories transferred their animosity from free-trade to the gold currency. A vast portion of the abuse heaped on the latter has flowed solely from cuniverty to Sir R. Peel.

We cannot imitate such conduct. We may be assured by Whig, Economist, and Tory, that it was the change of currency only which brought on tress on the shipping interest, silk trade, lead-miners, various other interests, and the London shop-keepers and labouring classes, and agriculture in general; but we must treat it with contempt. We have the fact before us, that, in the last year alone, nearly two millions and a half of quarters of foreign corn, including flour, were cleared for home consumption; and the clearances in previous years were extremely great; we cannot follow those who argue that this corn had no material effect on prices. We have the additional fact before us, that the free-trade measures have depressed the price of every article produced by the farmer, as well as corn; and that they have stripped Ireland of some of her markets for salted provisions, and compelled her to export cheap horned cattle and swine; we cannot ascribe the bad prices here to the change of currency.

We wish to see the small notes restored as a secondary matter of relief, therefore we should have been silent on this conduct in the Tories in question, had they not, from their most erroneous opinions touching the effect of currency on prices, offered to change the corn law for a "moderate fixed duty," provided they might have small notes again. By this they would take a pound from agriculture on the one hand, to give it a penny on the other. If the currency-people take ground like this, a determined stand must be made against them.

If these two bodies of Tories unite, what can they accomplish? We assure them that names have now no weight; the distinctions of name perished with those of principle and character; the country cares not a straw for the title of Whig, it cares as little for that of Tory, and it regards both with much more contempt than reverence. Thus, disabled for accomplishing any thing through name, what can they do by act? They must support the general measures of Ministers, echo the doctrines of the Whigs and Liberals, and only oppose when it will cover them with public odium. This will ensure them a somewhat longer exclusion from office than the Whigs have had.

What ruined them? Their adoption of Whig principles. So long as they had a separate creed, the country had to choose between creeds as well as parties; and because it preferred theirs, it preferred them. When they cast their principles away for those of their opponents, it naturally transferred its preference to the latter as their confessed superiors. In this lies the lesson for enabling them to recover what they have lost.

To regain public favour and power, they must be at least equal to their opponents in personal character, and superior to them in principle and policy. A Ministry composed wholly or principally of the Peel party, if it could gain being, would produce revolution; the members of it, who did not apostatize on the Catholic question, have a few friends in the country, as those who did; on other matters, nearly all have displayed conduct which has stripped them of respect and confidence. The Tories, to a large extent, must have new leaders, whose personal virtues will form a pledge, that another Tory Ministry would consist in essentials of high minded, consistent, and patriotic men.

Then the party generally must be purged of diversity of principle. We think nothing could be more preposterous than the existing distinctions between Whig and Tory. One man calls himself a Whig, and yet professes Tory doctrines; another calls himself a Tory, but holds Whig doctrines. Here are two great parties in hostility, and yet each as a whole declares it entertains the creed of the other; half the Ministry, in leader and follower, is opposed to the other half, and allied in sentiment with half the Tory Opposition; and half the latter is opposed to the other half, and united in principle with half the Ministry. Suppose the part of the Ministry and that of the Tories, which think alike on free-trade, currency, &c., should separate from the other, and unite, what would follow? A Ministry and Opposition properly at issue on leading matters of policy, and each as properly in harmony with itself on such matters: a party of real Whigs, and another of real Tories. Why cannot this be done? Oh! it would be unpardonable inconsistency! The Whig must support those he dissents from, and oppose those he agrees with; the Tory must do the same; both must really renounce, betray, and war against their own principles to be consistent! As we have already said, this monstrous system utterly destroys principle and honour amidst public men, and it is ruinous to the empire.

We think it would yield much public benefit if all Tories, who agree in opinion with the free-trade part of the Ministry, would go over to it. Consistency demands that they should do so. It matters not if this should include Sir R. Peel as well as Mr Dawson, Mr Herries as well as Mr Courtenay. They would do less mischief to the Tory body on the ministerial, than they will do on the Tory side. If the Tories expect to rise again, they must treat every man who holds the creed of their opponents as a betrayer and enemy.

They must not only be harmonious in creed, but have one which the community will support. What matters of policy divide the latter at present? The currency and free-trade measures. The former is completed; but the latter are not much more than begun. Nothing could be of more vital importance than these matters, yet the Tory heads agree on them with the Ministry, in direct opposition to the Tory part of the community. It is, in the nature of things, impossible for any party of public men to gain the favour of the country if they do not identify themselves with it in feeling, and fight its battles of policy. When, therefore, the Tory heads are fiercely at variance with it on these things, or merely agree with that part of it which supports the Ministry, they must necessarily gain its animosity; that part of it which thinks as they do, regards them as enemies who wish to supplant its favourites, and the other sees in them the enemies of every thing it values.

The Tories, or, at least, the Peel members of them, have this choice—national contempt and dislike; or, in various points, a change of creed. It unfortunately happens, that, in these days, men can only change from good to bad—they can be led to change by speculative doctrine or personal profit, but not by proof of error. The principles on which this empire has been governed for the last six or seven years, have produced incalculable loss and unexampled misery—they have filled the land with irreligion, vice, crime, and disaffection —they have, in a very large degree, destroyed the connecting links and cement between, not only class and class in society, but also part and part in the empire—they have generated present convulsion and insurrection, and almost made revolution and fall things of certainty. It might be expected that these horrible and distressing demonstrations of their falsehood would be sufficient to produce conviction in the most besotted and hardened of the human race; but no! public men must still cling to them—to apostatise to them is still a virtue, and to forsake them infamy!

According to the newspapers, Sir R. Peel lately said in Parliament, political economy had for its object the production of public wealth, and if it produced this by injuring morals he must oppose it. The sentiment does him honour; we must, however, say, if morals be destroyed, public wealth must perish with them. Let us apply it as a test to his consistency. The Economists assert that, previously to the last six or seven years, the reverse of political economy was practised in this empire. Now, we call on Sir Robert, as a public man, to say where that wealth is hidden, which in those years has been produced by political economy. Is it buried in the banking-accounts of landowners, or the stacks of farmers, or the iron chests of manufacturers, merchants, and tradesmen, or the stomachs and pockets of the labouring classes? No. It cannot be discovered: the indisputable fact is, that political economy—we mean the false impostor which has usurped the name—has been, ever since it was resorted to, a wholesale destroyer of wealth; while that which is called the reverse, was a wholesale producer of it. This is an incontrovertible fact, or there can be no such fact in the world.

We have another call to make on Sir Robert. Has political economy done no injury to morals amidst the silk weavers, glove makers, &c.—amidst the people employed in the manufacture of kelp, the lead miners, fishermen, &c.—amidst the farmers, looking at the opinions they express touching tithes—and amidst the husbandry labourers, who, alas! alas! are suffering and dying by expatriation and the hand of the public executioner? Have not morals suffered from it amidst the rebellious part of the inhabitants of the metropolis? Have morals escaped its pestilential influence amidst the tremendous combinations of the manufacturing districts, and that gigantic portion of the population which seeks to fly from loss and hunger into revolution and general spoliation?

A farther call remains. Political economy is confessedly to proceed until it destroys every trade which cannot sustain foreign competition, and greatly narrow agriculture. It is demonstrable, that in this it must increase, to an incalculable extent, distress and disorder amidst the whole of the husbandry labourers, and an immense mass of others engaged in various manufactures and trades; it must also force a vast additional population into the larger manufacturing districts. Every Minister worthy the name of statesman, would labour to create a balance to the cotton and woollen trades, even for their own sake; but this insane political economy attempts, by the most unnatural and savage means, to force the whole population into dependence on them, direct or remote. We ask the Right Honourable Gentleman if this must not of necessity have the very worst effects on private and public morals?

We call on Sir Robert Peel to answer us before his God and his country.

Here, then, is proof, against which nothing can stand, that this political economy is a destroyer, not only of morals, but of wealth likewise; in consequence, on Sir Robert's own declaration, he is bound to be its mortal foe—to war against it openly and sternly, to extermination. Will he discharge the obligation?

When Mr Goulburn was made Chancellor of the Exchequer, he was an adorer of free-trade; he boasted of his devotion to Mr Huskisson's theories, as something immutable. Unhappily Mr Huskisson ran foul of him in the sugar business, and the crash beat his free-trade passion out of him. Then, when moved by interest, he could retort on the theorist as the parent of "a system which had not yielded the benefits expected from it." Is Mr Goulburn, after this confession, still a free-trader?

Without speaking further of individuals, we will observe, the Peel party must lie where it is, the despised appendage of the Ministry, or take up the creed of the country. No change of opinion is called for on hypothesis and assumption; here are the results of decisive experiments—conclusive demonstrations to answer the question—are the doctrines on which this empire has been governed in late years true or erroneous?

The Tories, as a body, must not only have a creed strongly defined, distinctly opposed to that of the Ministry, and rooted in the reason and affection of the country; but they must support it like bold and able men. There must be no more of the crouching, canting, and supplicating to the "Press"—the puerile and cowardly concessions to the Economists—the trimming, and cutting, and shifting, to appease this quarter and win that—the hinting, and suppressing, and disavowing, which have so long disgraced them.

It is by such means alone that the Tories can regain their ascendancy; if without them they, by intrigue or accident, obtain office, it will only be for a moment; to get lasting hold of power, they must stand before the country as the men possessing the best character, and maintaining the best principles.

We, of course, are merely speaking of them; we do not belong to them, therefore we ask no favour, and offer no counsel. Names, as we have said, are to us nothing; and when we look amidst public men for Tories, in respect of faith, we can find none. Those who existed only three short years ago, ultras included, have vanished. On different occasions we have spoken in the strongest manner against the apostasy of Sir R. Peel, and those who acted like him on the Catholic Question, and our opinion of it is unchanged; but we must render to these men impartial justice. They have been just as consistent as many of their revilers. One of the latter leaps into the depths of Radical Reform, another embraces the low Whigs as his party, and a third proclaims he has changed sides touching currency and free-trade; yet these worthies rail against the apostasy of Sir R. Peel! It was very evident before the death of Mr Huskisson, that no small number of these apostate-haters were anxious to make him one of their leaders! We find ourselves as much opposed to the Tories amidst public men, as to the Whigs and Liberals; from this plain reason, that such Tories are now in creed Whigs and Liberals. This gives us no concern, because we have followed neither individual nor party; and the fruits of the new Tory principles are abundantly sufficient to satisfy us, that in obeying conscience we have adhered to the cause of truth and our country. On one point we deem it a gain; that we can no longer be numbered amidst those who are called Tory writers, is to us, as any one may easily believe, a matter of unfeigned rejoicing.

Yet, unchanged in faith and cause as we are and shall remain, we feel most anxious, in utter scorn of names, to see a party arise which will strike for the empire. Turning, then, from the dependents, to those on whom the debt of atonement for past errors, and personal interest in the public weal, impose the duty of providing such a party, we say to the Lonsdales and Northumberlands, the Hertfords and Rutlands—How long is the empire to be scourged and devastated by the doctrines which have placed it in its present appalling condition?

You see that no change of measures can be hoped for from the Ministry; and you know that the policy it is pursuing has been proved, and is generally acknowledged, to be a total and destructive failure. Here is the country distressed, convulsed, and on the brink of revolution; yet, from this Ministry, only the reverse of remedy can be expected.

Are you, too, landowners as you are, ignorant of the causes which distress your tenants and their labourers? Are you, too, Englishmen as you are, dupes of the disgraceful infatuation, that the import of foreign corn, to the extent of two millions and a half of quarters in a single year, can have no effect on the price of British corn—that the farmers of this country cannot be injured by being brought into competition, in almost every article, with foreign ones? Are you, too, sane as you are, cheated into the vulgar delusion that a paltry repeal of taxes is all that is necessary for removing loss and suffering?

If public good demand that the landowner shall lose half his income and property, the farmer shall be reduced to insolvency, and the husbandry labourer shall be deprived of bread—that agriculture shall be transformed into a mass of debt, beggary, want, crime, and insurrection—let the harsh necessity be submitted to. But add not insult and mockery to ruin and starvation. Let the proofs of the necessity appear: and let old English truth be told touching cause and effect.

But public good demands the contrary; it adjures you, in the demonstrations of all history, to give prosperity to agriculture. If the present prices of corn could be generally maintained, they would be sufficient; but they exist only for the moment through speculation, and the belief that there will be scarcity abroad. What has the rise in them produced? General benefit, but not evil. The whole matter in dispute amounts only to eight or ten shillings per quarter; this sum makes the difference to agriculture between moderate prosperity and great suffering; the consumer cannot lose or obtain this trifle to himself, without enjoying the mighty profit, or sustaining the tremendous loss, arising from the prosperity or distress of half the population! To give the sum to the producer, is evidently to confer a gain on the consumer.

Insurrection is quelled for the time, but how long can it be kept down? The causes are not removed, but enlarged; the farmers are already taking off the advance of wages it extorted; bad feelings have been aggravated by punishment, which would have been more just had it been less severe; and the breach between servant and master is greatly widened. It cannot be expected that the landowner will give up his property, and make himself a pauper, to relieve the pauperism of others. Where, then, is the security that the incendiary and rebel will not again appear? And if they do, what—looking at the gigantic extent of country in which their spirit has been manifested—will they not accomplish?

Can you be ignorant that the wretched system of sacrificing part after part of the community to the whole, has been proved to be ruinous? Where is the general prosperity which has been drawn from the distress of agriculture, the shipping interest, and the silk trade? What perceptible benefit does the suffering of the souls engaged in manufacturing kelp, the lead miners, &c. &c. yield to the community at large?

And can you be ignorant that the prosperity of the part is essential for that of the whole? Is it not as clear in reason, as it is in fact, that if the community have to pay somewhat higher prices to the producers of corn, ships, silks, &c. &c., in order to give them prosperity, the loss is nothing in the balance against the gigantic profit then prosperity gives it in the increase of its general prices and trade?

Are those men capable of teaching political economy who make no distinction in regard to importation between commodities produced by this country, and those which are not—between articles used in manufactures, and those only used in individual consumption—who place corn and cotton, wrought silks and indigo, on an equality? Are they capable of instructing a nation who insist, that the ruin of half the population must of necessity greatly benefit the other half?

Are those just and equal laws which give enlarged means of wealth to the manufacturers and merchants by stripping the landowners, farmers, shipowners, &c. &c. of income and property—which increase the means of subsistence of the lesser part of the labouring classes, by taking food and morals from the greater—which plunge portion after portion of the population into ruin and hunger to give riches and abundance to the remainder? In the name of England we protest against them; in virtue of our birthright, we demand at your hands equal law, and equal protection of property.

Why are you and your aristocratic brethren no longer followed? Why are you so far fallen that even your own tenants are in rebellion against you, and in the battles of agriculture are ranged with your enemies? Because you no longer act as leaders—because you have degraded yourselves into followers—because you have sunk into the spiritless, trembling, indolent, womanish, sordid im-becility which envelopes the continental aristocracy—because you have made yourselves the instruments of innovators, empirics, and mercenary traffickers in creeds and parties—because you have become the tools of men who use you to sacrifice public good for the concealment of their own incapacity and profligacy, and to enable themselves to adhere to principle and pledge, when they are faithless to all but the false and ruinous!

Arise! and let England once more find worthy leaders in her nobles! Let her proud coronet again adorn the foreheads of the patriotic, the chivalrous, and the princely, who can only find gain and enjoyment in her prosperity and happiness! To you, your country looks for deliverance from the official quack, the imbecile party, and the unprincipled faction. Shake off your chains; display the manly port, courageous spirit, and sterling sense of the Barons of old; and take the place amidst your countrymen which belongs to you. Only deserve it, and you will again be followed! In utter scorn of theorist, demagogue, and pledged partisan, form a paternal government—one which will think as well as act, feel as well as speak; and banish loss, want, and wretchedness, according to the precepts of the great fathers of British riches and grandeur. In this lies not only the recovery of what you have lost, but the preservation of what you still have. Deceive not yourselves, for the charged mine is beneath you; the fatal taint has reached the heart of the body politic.

For ourselves we speak not; we have no alliance to offer, and we can accept no counsel. We shall steadily adhere to that course of independence, which has been ours for many years, without enquiring who are friends or enemies; and without caring whether it bring us into conflict with Whig or Liberal, old Tory or Peelite, manly assailant or impostor and cut-throat. If any men stand forward and strike in single-mindedness for the empire, they shall, in total disregard of party names and distinctions, have our unsolicited assistance; and they will find it neither lukewarm nor powerless.

PASSAGES FROM THE DIARY OF A LATE PHYSICIAN.

CHAP. VII.

The Spectre-Smitten.

Few topics of medical literature have occasioned more wide and contradictory speculation than that of insanity, with reference, as well to its predisposing and immediate causes, as its best method of treatment;—since experience is the only substratum of real knowledge, the easiest and surest way of arriving at those general principles which may regulate both our pathological and therapeutical researches, especially concerning the subtle, almost inscrutable disorder—manie—is, when one does meet with some striking, well-marked case, to watch it closely throughout, and be particularly anxious to seize on all those smaller features, those more transient evanescent indications which are truer characteristics of the complaint than perhaps any other. With this object did I pay close attention to the very singular and affecting case detailed in the following narrative. I have not given the whole of my observations—far from it; those only are added which I have some claims to the consideration of both medical and general readers. The apparent eccentricity of the title will be found accounted for in the course of the narrative.

Mr M——, as one of a very large party, had been enjoying the splendid hospitality of Lady ——, and did not leave till a late—or rather, early, hour in the morning. Pretty women, music, and champagne, had almost turned his head; and it was rather fortunate for him that a hackney-coach stand was within a stone's throw of the house he was leaving. Muffling his cloak closely around him, he contrived to move towards it in a tolerably direct line, and a few moments' time beheld him driving, at the usual snail's pace of those rickety vehicles, to Lincoln's-Inn; for Mr M—— was a law student. In spite of the transient exhilaration produced by the scenes he had just quitted, and the excitement consequent on the prominent share he took in an animated discussion, in the presence of about thirty of the most elegant women that could well be brought together, he found himself becoming the subject of a most unaccountable depression of spirits. Even while at Lady ——'s, he had latterly perceived himself talking often for mere talking's sake—the chain of his thoughts perpetually broken—and an impatience and irritability of manner towards those whom he addressed, which he readily resolved into the reaction following high excitement. M——, I ought before, perhaps, to have mentioned, was a man of great talent, chiefly, however, imaginative, and had that evening been particularly brilliant on his favourite topic—diablerie and mysticism; towards which he generally contrived to incline every conversation in which he bore a part. He had been dilating, in particular, on the power which Mr Maturin had of exciting the most fearful and horrific ideas in the minds of his readers, instancing one of his romances, the title of which I have forgotten. Long before he had reached home, the fumes of wine had evaporated, and the influence of excitement subsided; and, with reference to intoxication, he was as sober and calm as ever he was in his life. Why—he knew not, but his heart seemed to grow heavier and heavier, and his thoughts gloomier, every step by which he neared Lincoln's-Inn. It struck three o'clock, and he entered the sombre portals of the ancient inn of court. The perfect silence, the moonlight shining sadly on the dusky buildings—the cold quivering stars—all these, together, combined to enhance his nervousness. He described it to me as though things seemed to wear a strange, spectral, supernatural aspect. Not a watchman of the inn was heard crying the hour—not a porter moving—no living being but himself visible in the large square he was crossing. As he neared his staircase, he felt his heart fluttering; in short, he felt under some strange unaccountable influence, which, had he reflected a little, he would have discovered to arise merely from an excitable nervous temperament, operating on an imagination peculiarly attuned to sympathize with terror. His chambers lay on the third floor of the staircase; and on reaching it, he found his door-lamp glimmering with its last expiring ray. He opened his door, and after groping some time in the dark of his sitting-room, found his chamber candlestick. In attempting to light it, he put out the lamp. He went down stairs, but found that the lamp of every landing had shared the fate of his own; so he returned, rather irritated, thinking to amerce the porter of his customary Christmas-box for his niggard supply of oil. After some time spent in the search, he discovered his tinder-box, and proceeded to strike a light. This was not the work of a moment. And where is the bachelor to whom it is? The potent spark, however, dropped at last into the very centre of the soft tinder. M—— blew—~~the~~ caught—spread—the match quickly kindled, and he lighted his candle. He took it in his hand, and was making for bed, when his eyes caught a glimpse of an object which brought him senseless to the floor. The furniture of his room was disposed as when he had left it; for his laundress had neglected to come and put things in order; the table, with a few books on it, drawn towards the fire-place, and by its side the ample-cushioned easy-chair. The first object visible, with sudden distinctness, was a figure sitting in the arm-chair. It was that of a gentleman, dressed in dark-coloured clothes, his hands, white as alabaster, closed together over his lap, and the face looking away; but it turned slowly towards M——, revealing to him a countenance of a ghastly hue—the features glowing like steel heated to a white heat, and the two eyes turned full towards him, and blazing—absolutely blazing—he described it—with a most horrible metre. The appalling spectre, while M——'s eyes were riveted upon it, though glazing fast with fright, slowly rose from its seat, stretched out both its arms, and seemed approaching him, when he fell down senseless on the floor, as if smitten with apoplexy. He recollected nothing more, till he found himself, about the middle of the next day, in bed, his laundress, myself, an apothecary, and several others, standing round him. His situation was not discovered till more than an hour after he had fallen, as nearly as could be subsequently ascertained, nor would it then, but for a truly fortunate accident. He had neglected to close either of his outer-doors, (I believe it is usual for chambers in the inns of court to have double outer-doors,) and a woman, who happened to be leaving the adjoining set, about five o'clock, on seeing Mr M——'s doors both open at such an untimely hour, was induced, by feelings of curiosity and alarm, to return to the rooms she had left for a light, with which she entered his chambers, after having repeatedly called his name without receiving any answer. What will it be supposed had been her occupation at such an early hour in the adjoining chambers? Laying out the corpse of their occupant, a Mr T——, who had expired about eight o'clock the preceding evening!

Mr M—— had known him, though not very intimately: and there were some painful circumstances attending his death, which, even though on no other grounds than mere sympathy, M—— had laid much to heart. In addition to this, he had been observed by his friends as being latterly the subject of very high excitement, owing to the successful prosecution of an affair of great interest and importance. We all accounted for his present situation, by referring it to some apoplectic seizure; for we were of course ignorant of the real occasion, fright, which I did not learn till long afterwards. The laundress told me that she found Mr M——, to her great terror, stretched motionless along the floor, in his cloak and full dress, and with a candlestick lying beside him. She at first supposed him drunk; but on finding all her efforts to rouse him unsuccessful, and seeing his fixed features and rigid frame, she hastily summoned to her assistance a fellow-laundress, whom she had left in charge of the corpse next door, undressed him, and laid him on the bed. A neighbouring medical man was then called in, who pronounced it to be a case of epilepsy; and he was sufficiently warranted by the appearance of a little froth about the lips—prolonged stupor, resembling sleep—and frequent convulsions of the most violent kind. The remedies resorted to produced no alleviation of the symptoms; and matters continued to wear such a threatening and alarming aspect, that I was summoned in by his brother, and was at his bedside by two o'clock. His countenance was dark and highly intellectual: its lineaments were naturally full of power and energy; but now overclouded with an expression of trouble and horror. He was seized with a dreadful fit soon after I had entered the room. Oh, it is a piteous and shocking spectacle to see the human frame subject to such demoniacal twitchings, and contortions, which are so sudden—so irresistible, as to give the idea of some vague, terrible, exciting cause, which cannot be discovered: as though the sufferer lay passive in the grasp of some messenger of darkness "sent to buffet him."

M— was a very powerful man: and during the fits, it was next to impossible for all present, united, to control his movements. The foam at his mouth suggested to his terrified brother the harrowing suspicion that the case was one of hydrophobia. None of my remonstrances or assurances to the contrary sufficed to quiet him, and his distress added to the confusion of the scene. After prescribing to the best of my ability,

I left, considering the case to be one of simple epilepsy. During the day and night, the fits abated both in violence and frequency, but he was left in a state of the most exhaustion, from which, however, he seemed to be rapidly recovering, during the space of the four succeeding days; when I was suddenly summoned to his bedside, which I had left only two hours before, with the intelligence that he had disclosed symptoms of more alarming illness than ever. I hurried to his chambers, and found that the danger had not been magnified. One of his friends met me on the staircase, and told me that about half an hour before, while he and Mr C— M—, the patient's brother, were sitting beside him, he suddenly turned to the latter, and enquired, in a tone full of apprehension and terror—"Is Mr T— dead?"

"Oh dear, yes—he died several days ago"—was the reply.

"Then it was he"—he gasped—"it was he whom I saw, and he is surely—darned!"—Yes, merciful Maker!—he is—he is!"—he continued, elevating his voice to a perfect roar—"and the flames have reduced his face to ashes!—Horror! horror! horror!"—He then shut his eyes, and relapsed into silence for about ten minutes: when he exclaimed—"Hark you, there—secure me! tie me! make me fast, or I shall burst upon you and destroy you all—for I'm going mad—I feel it!"—He ceased, and commenced breathing fast and heavily—his chest

The popular etymology of the word epilepsy, sanctioned by several reputable class-books of the profession, which are now lying before me,—i. e. "ἐπιληψία," is totally erroneous, and more—nonsensical. For the information of general readers, I may state, that its true derivation is from λαμβάνω, through its Ionic obsolete form λαμβάνω: whence ἐπιλαμβάνω—a "seizing," a "holding fast." Therefore we speak of an attack of epilepsy. This etymology is highly descriptive of the disease in question; for the sudden prostration, rigidity, contortions, &c. of the patient, strongly suggest the idea that he has been taken or seized (ἐπιλαμβάνω) by, as it were, some external, invisible agent. It is worthy of notice, by the way, that ἐπιληψία is used by ecclesiastical writers to denote a person possessed by a demon. Ἐπίληψις signifies simply "failure, deficiency." I shall conclude this note with a practical illustration of the necessity which calls it forth—the correction of a prevalent error. A flippant student who, I was given to understand, plunged himself much among his companions on his Greek, was suddenly asked by one of his examiners for a definition of epilepsy, grounded on its etymology. I forgot the definition, which was given with infinite self-sufficiency, offense and manner; but the fine trick of scholarship with which it was furnished off, I well remember:—"From 'ἐπιληψία'—(ἐπιλαμβάνω—I fall, am wanting); therefore, sir, epilepsy is a failure of animal functions!"—The same sage definition is regularly given by a well-known metropolitan lecturer!

heaving as though under the pressure of enormous weight; and his swelling, quivering features, evidently the dreadful uproar within. Presently he began to grind his teeth, and his expanding eyes glared about in all directions, as though following the motions of some frightful object, and muttering fiercely through his closed teeth—"Oh save me from him—save me—save me!"—It was a fearful thing to see him lying in such a state—grinding his teeth as though he would crush them to powder—his livid lips crested with foam—his features swollen—writhing—blackening; and, which gave his face a peculiarly horrible and fiendish expression, his eyes distorted, or inverted upwards, so that nothing but the glaring whites of them could be seen—his whole frame rigid—and his hands clenched, as though they would never open again!—It is a dreadful tax on one's nerves to have to encounter such objects, familiar though medical men are with such and similar spectacles; and in the present instance, every one round the bedside of the unfortunate patient, stood trembling with pale and momentarily-averted faces. The ghastly, fixed, upturning of the eyes in epileptic patients, fills me with horror whenever I recall their image to my mind!

The return of these epileptic fits, in such violence, and after such an interval, alarmed me with apprehensions, lest, as is not unfrequently the case, apoplexy should supervene, or even ultimate insanity. It was rather singular that M— was never known to have had an epileptic fit previous to the present seizure, and he was then in his twenty-fifth year. I was conjecturing what sudden fright or blow, or accident of any kind, or congestion of the vessels of the brain from frequent inebriation, could have brought on the present fit—when my patient, whose features had gradually sunk again into their natural disposition, gave a burst forth, and he murmured—some time before we could distinctly catch the words—"Oh—spectre-smitten!—spectre-smitten!"—which expression I have adopted as the title of this paper—"I shall never recover again!"—Though sufficiently surprised, and perplexed about the import of the words, we took no notice of them; but endeavoured to divert his thoughts from the phantasy, if such there were, which seemed to possess them, by enquiring into the nature of his symptoms. He disregarded us, however; feebly grasped my hand in his clammy fingers, and looking at me languidly, muttered—"What—Oh, what brought the fiend into my chambers?"—and I felt his whole frame pervaded by a cold shiver—"Poor T—! Horrid fate!"—On hearing him mention T—'s name, we all looked simultaneously at one another, but without speaking; for a suspicion crossed our minds, that his highly-wrought feelings, acting on a strong imagination, always tainted with superstitious terrors, had conjured up some hideous object, which had scared him nearly to madness—probably some fancied apparition of his deceased neighbour. He began again to utter long deep-drawn groans, that gradually gave place to the heavy stertorous breathing, which, with other symptoms—his pulse, for instance, beating about 115 a minute—confirmed me in the opinion that he was suffering from a very severe congestion of the vessels of the brain. I directed copious venesection—his head to be shaven, and covered perpetually with cloths soaked in evaporating lotions—and blisters behind his ears, and at the nape of the neck—and appropriate internal medicines. I then left him, apprehending the worst consequences—for I had once before a similar case under my care—one in which a young lady was, which I strongly suspected to be the case with M—, absolutely frightened to death, and went through nearly the same round of symptoms as were beginning to make their appearance in my present patient: a sudden epileptic seizure, terminating in outrageous madness, which destroyed both the physical and intellectual energies, and the young lady expired. I may possibly hereafter prepare for publication some of my notes of her case, which had some very remarkable features.

The next morning about eleven, saw me again at Mr M—'s chambers, where I found three or four members of his family—two of them his married sisters—seated round his sitting-room fire, in melancholy silence. Mr —, the apothecary, had just left, but was expected to return every moment, to meet me in consultation. My patient lay alone in his bed-room, asleep, and apparently better than he had been since his first seizure. He had had only one slight fit during the night; and though he had been a little delirious in the earlier part of the evening, he had been on the whole so calm and quiet, that his friends' apprehensions of insanity were beginning to subside; so he was left, as I said, alone; for the nurse, just before my arrival, had left her seat by his bedside for a few moments, thinking him "in a comfortable and easy nap," and was engaged, in a low whisper, conversing with the members of M——'s family who were in the sitting-room. Hearing such a report of my patient, I sat down quietly among his relations, determining not to disturb him, at least till the arrival of the apothecary. Thus were we engaged, questioning the nurse in an under tone, when a loud laugh from the bed-room suddenly silenced our whisperings, and turned us all pale. We started to our feet, with blank amazement in each countenance, scarcely crediting the evidence of our senses. Could it be M——? It must; there was none else in the room. What, then, was he laughing about?

While we were standing silently gazing on one another, with much agitation, the laugh was repeated, but longer and louder than before, accompanied with the sound of footsteps, now crossing the room—then, as if of one jumping! The ladies turned paler than before, and seemed scarcely able to stand. They sunk again into their chairs, gasping with terror. "Go in, nurse, and see what's the matter," said I, standing by the side of the younger of the ladies, whom I expected every instant to fall into my arms in a swoon.

"Doctor!—go in?—I—I—I dare not!" stammered the nurse, pale as ashes, and trembling violently.

"Do you come here, then, and attend to Mrs —," said I, "and I will go in." The nurse staggered to my place, in a state not far removed from that of the lady whom she was called to attend; for a third laugh, —long, loud, uproarious,—had burst from the room while I was speaking. After cautioning the ladies and the nurse to observe profound silence, and not to attempt following me, till I sent for them, I stepped noiselessly to the bed-room door, and opened it slowly and softly, not to alarm him. All was silent within; but the first object that presented itself when I saw fairly into the room, can never be effaced from my mind to the day of my death. Mr M—— had got out of bed, pulled off his shirt, and stepped to the dressing-table, where he stood stark-naked before the glass, with a razor in his right hand, with which he had just finished shaving off his eyebrows; and he was eyeing himself steadfastly in the glass, holding the razor elevated above his head. On seeing the door open, and my face peering at him, he turned full towards me—(the grotesque aspect of his countenance denuded of so prominent a feature as the eyebrows, and his head completely shaved, and the wild fire of madness flashing from his staring eyes, exciting the most frightful ideas)—brandishing the razor over his head with an air of triumph, and shouting nearly at the top of his voice—"Ah, ha, ha!—What do you think of this?"

Merciful Powers! May I never be placed again in such perilous circumstances, nor have my mind overwhelmed with such a gush of horror as burst over it at that moment! What was I to do? Obeying a sudden impulse, I had entered the room, shutting the door after me; and, should any one in the sitting-room suddenly attempt to open it again, or make a noise or disturbance of any kind, by giving vent to their emotions, what was to become of the madman or ourselves? He might, in an instant, almost sever his head from his shoulders, or burst upon me or his sisters, and do us some deadly mischief! I felt conscious that the lives of all of us depended on my conduct; and I do devoutly thank God for the measure of tolerable self-possession which was vouchsafed me at that dreadful moment. I continued standing like a statue—motionless—silent—endeavouring to fix my eye on him, that I might gain the command of his; that successful, I had some hopes of being able to deal with him. He, in turn, now stood speechless—and I thought he was quailing—that I had overmastered him—when I was suddenly fit to faint with despair—for at that awful instant I heard the door-handle tried—the door pushed gently open—and the nurse, I supposed—or one of the ladies—peeping through it. The maniac also heard it—the spell was broken—and, in a frenzy, he leaped several times successively in the air, brandishing the razor over his head as before.

While he was in the midst of these feats, I turned my head hurriedly to the person who had so shamefully disobeyed my orders, and thereby jeopardied my life—whispered in low affrighted accents—“At the peril of your lives—of mine—shut the door, away—away, hush! or we are all murdered!” I was obeyed—the intruder withdrew, and I heard a sound as if she had fallen to the floor—probably in a swoon. Fortunately the madman was so occupied with his antics, that he did not observe what had passed at the door. It was the nurse who made the attempt to discover what was going on, I afterwards learnt—but unsuccessfully, for she had seen nothing. My injunctions were obeyed to the letter, for they maintained a profound silence, unbroken, but by a faint sighing sound, which I should not have heard, but that my ears were painfully sensitive to the slightest noise. But to return to myself, and my fearful chamber companion.

“Mighty talisman!” he exclaimed, holding the razor before him, and gazing earnestly at it, “how utterly unworthy—how infamous the common use men put thee to!” Still he continued standing, with his eyes fixed intently upon the deadly weapon—I all the while uttering not a sound, nor moving a muscle, but waiting for our eyes to meet once more.

“Ha—doctor—!”—“How easily I keep you at bay, though little my weapon—thus”—he exclaimed gaily, at the same time assuming one of the postures of the broadsword exercise—but I observed that he cautiously avoided meeting my eye again. I crossed my arms submissively on my breast, and continued in perfect silence, endeavouring, but in vain, to catch a glance of his eye. I did not wish to excite any emotion in him, except such as might have a tendency to calm, pacify, disarm him. Seeing me stand thus, and manifesting no disposition to meddle with him, he raised his left hand to his face, and rubbed his fingers rapidly over the site of his shaved eyebrows. He seemed, I thought, inclined to go over them a second time, when a knock was heard at the outer chamber door, which I instantly recognised as that of Mr — the apothecary. The madman also heard it, turned suddenly pale, and moved away from the glass opposite which he had been stooping. “Oh—oh!” he groaned, while his features assumed an air of the blankest affright, every muscle quivering, and every limb trembling from head to foot “Is that—is that T—come for me?” He let fall the razor on the floor, and clasping his hands in an agony of apprehension, he retreated, crouching and cowering down, towards the more distant part of the room, where he continued peering round the bed-post, his eyes straining as though they would start from their sockets, and fixed steadfastly upon the door. I heard him rustling the bed-curtain, and shaking it; but very gently, as if wishing to cover and conceal himself within its folds.

Oh, humanity!—Was that poor being—that silly slaving idiot—was that the once gay, gifted, brilliant M—?

To return. My attention was wholly occupied with one object, the razor on the floor. How I thanked God for the gleam of hope that all might yet be right—that I might succeed in obtaining possession of the deadly weapon, and putting it beyond his reach! But how was I to do all this? I stole gradually towards the spot where the razor lay, without removing once my eye from his, nor he his from the dreaded door, intending, as soon as I should have come pretty near it, to make a sudden snatch at the horrid implement of destruction. I did—I succeeded—I got it into my possession, scarcely crediting my senses. I had hardly grasped my prize, when the door opened, and Mr — the apothecary entered, sufficiently startled and bewildered, as it may be supposed, with the strange aspect of things.

"Ha—ha—ha! It's you, is it—it's you—you anatomy! You plaster! How dare you mock me in this horrid way, eh?" shouted the maniac, and springing like a lion from his hair, he made for the spot where the confounded apothecary stood, stupefied with terror. I verily believe he would have been destroyed, torn to pieces, or cruelly maltreated in some way or other, had I not started and thrown myself between him and the unwitting object of his vengeance, exclaiming at the same time, as a desperate resort, a sudden and strong appeal to his fears—"Remember!—T—! T—! T—!"

"I do—I do!" stammered the maniac, stepping back, perfectly aghast. He seemed utterly petrified, and sunk shivering down again into his former position at the corner of the bed, moaning—"Oh me! wretched me! Away—away—away!" I then stepped to Mr —, who had not moved an inch, directed him to retire instantly, conduct all the females out of the chambers, and return immediately with two or three of the inn-porters, or any other able-bodied men he could procure on the spot at the moment; and I concluded by slipping the razor unobservedly, as I thought, into his hands, and bidding him to move it to a place of safety. He obeyed, and I found myself once more alone with the madman.

"M—!—dear Mr M—!—I've got something to say to you—I have, indeed; it's very—very particular." I commenced approaching him slowly, and speaking in the softest tones conceivable.

"But you've forgotten this, you fool, you!—you have!" he replied fiercely, approaching the dressing-table, and suddenly seizing another razor—the fellow of the one I had got hold of with such pains and peril—and which, alas, alas! had never once caught my eye! I gave myself up for lost, fully expecting that I should be murdered, when I saw the bloodthirsty spirit with which he clutched it, brandished it over his head, and with a smile of fiendish derision, shook it full before me! I trembled, however, the next moment, for himself, for he drew it rapidly to and fro before his throat, as though he would give the fatal gash, but did not touch the skin. He gnashed his teeth with a kind of savage satisfaction at the dreadful power with which he was consciously armed.

"Oh, Mr M—! think of your poor mother and sisters!" I exclaimed, in a sorrowful tone, my voice faltering with uncontrollable agitation. He shook the razor again before me with an air of defiance, and really "grinned horribly a ghastly smile."

"Now suppose I choose to finish your perfidy, you wretch! and do what you dread, eh?" said he, holding the razor as if he was going to cut his throat.

"Why, wouldn't it be nobler to forgive and forget, Mr M—?" I replied, with tolerable firmness, and folding my arms on my breast, anxious to appear quite at ease.

"Too—too—too, doctor!—Too—too—too—too!—Ha, by the way!—What do you say to a razor hornpipe—eh—Ha, ha, ha—a novelty, at least!" He began forthwith to dance a few steps, leaping frantically high, and uttering, at intervals, a sudden, shrill, dissonant cry, resembling that used by those who dance the Highland "fling," or some other species of Scottish dance. I affected to admire his dancing, even to ecstasy—clapping my hands, and shouting, "Bravo, bravo!—Encore!" He seemed inclined to go over it again, but was too much exhausted, and sat down panting on the window-seat, which was close behind him.

"You'll catch cold, Mr M—, sitting in that draught of air, naked, and perspiring as you are. Will you put on your clothes?" said I, approaching him.

"No!" he replied, sternly, and extended the razor threateningly. I fell back, of course—not knowing what to do, nor choosing to risk either his destruction or my own by attempting any active interference; for what was to be done with a madman who had an open razor in his hand?—Mr —, the apothecary, seemed to have been gone an age; and I found even my temper beginning to fail me—for I was tired with his tricks, deadly dangerous as they were. My attention, however, was soon riveted again on the motions of the maniac. "Yes—yes, decidedly so—I'm too hot to do it now—I am!" said he, wiping the perspiration from his forehead, and eyeing the razor intently. "I must get calm and cool—and then—then for the sacrifice! Ah, ha, ha, the sacrifice!—An offering—expiation—even as Abraham—ha, ha, ha!—But, by the way, how did Abraham do it—that is, how did he intend to have done it?—Ah, I must ask my familiar!"

"A sacrifice, Mr M——?—Why, what do you mean?" I enquired, attempting a laugh—I say, attempting—for my blood trickled chillily through my veins, and my heart seemed frozen.

"What do I mean, eh? Wretch! Dolt!—What do I mean?—Why, a peace-offering to my Maker, for a badly-spent life, to be sure!—One would think you had never heard of such a thing as religion—you sow!"

"I deny that the sacrifice would be accepted, and for two reasons," I replied, suddenly recollecting that he plumed himself on his casuistry, and hoping to engage him on some new crotchet, which might keep him in play till Mr —— returned with assistance—but I was mistaken!

"Well, well, doctor ——!—Let that be, now—I can't resolve doubts, now—no, no," he replied, solemnly,—" 'tis a time for action—for action—for action," he continued gradually elevating his voice, using vehement gesticulations, and rising from his seat.

"Yes, yes," said I, warmly; "but though you've followed closely enough the advice of the Talmudist, in shaving off your eyebrows, as a preparatory"—

"Aha! aha!—What! have you seen the Talmud?—Have you, really!—Well," he added, after a doubtful pause, "in what do you think I've failed, eh?"

[I need hardly say, that I myself scarcely knew what led me to utter the nonsense in question; but I have several times found, in cases of insanity, that suddenly and readily supplying a motive for the patient's conduct—referring it to a cause, of some sort or other, with steadfast intrepidity—even be the said cause never so preposterously absurd—has been attended with the happiest effects, in arresting the patient's attention—chiming in with his eccentric fancies, and piquing his disturbed faculties into acquiescence in what he sees coolly taken for granted, as quite true—a thing of course—mere matter-of-fact—by the person he is addressing. I have several times recommended this little device to them who have been intrusted with the care of the insane, and have been assured of its success.]

"You are very near the mark, I own; but it strikes me that you have shaved them off too equally—too uniformly. You ought to have left some little ridges—furrows—hem, hem!—to—to—terminate, or resemble the—the—the striped stock which Jacob held up before the ewes!"

"Oh—aye—aye! Exactly—true!—Strange oversight!" he replied, as if struck with the truth of the remark, and yet puzzled by vain attempts to corroborate it by his own recollections—"I—I recollect it now—but it isn't too late yet—is it?"

"I think not," I replied, with apparent hesitation, hardly crediting the success of my strange stratagem. "To be sure, it will require very great delicacy; but as you've not shaved them off too closely, I think I can manage it," I continued, doubtfully.

"Oh, oh, oh!" growled the maniac, while his eyes flashed fire at me. "There's one string by me that tells me you are dealing falsely with me—oh, you villain! oh, you wretch!" At that moment the door opened gently behind me, and the voice of Mr ——, the apothecary, whispered, in a low hurried tone, "Doctor, I've got three of the reporters here, in the sitting-room." Though the whisper was almost inaudible even to me, when uttered close to my ear, to my utter amazement, M—— had heard every syllable of it, and understood it too, as if some official minion of the devil himself had quickened his ears, or conveyed the intelligence to him.

"Ah—ha—ha!—Ha, ha, ha!—Fools! Knaves! Harpies!—and what are you and your three hired desperadoes, to me?—Thus—thus do I outwit you, fools—thus!" and springing from his seat, he suddenly drew up the lower part of the window-frame, and looked through it—then at the razor—and again at me, with one of the most awful glances—full of dark diabolical meaning, the momentary suggestion of the great tempter, that I ever encountered in my life.

"Which!—which!—which!" he muttered fiercely through his closed teeth, while his right foot rested on the window-seat, ready for him to spring out, and his eye travelled, as before, rapidly from the razor to the window. Can any thing be conceived more palsying to the beholders? "Why did not you and your strong reinforcement spring at once upon him, and overpower him?" possibly, some one is asking.—Aha! and he armed with a naked razor? His head might have been severed from his shoulders, before we could have over-mastered him—or we might ourselves—at least one of us—have been murdered in the attempt. We knew not what to do! M—— suddenly withdrew his head from the window, through which he had been gazing, with a shuddering, horror-stricken motion, and groaned—"No! no! no!—I won't—can't—for there's T—— standing just beneath, his face all blazing, and waiting with outspread arms to catch me," standing, at the same time, shading his eyes with his left hand—when I whispered,—“Now, now! go up to him—secure him—all three spring on him at once, and disarm him!” They obeyed me, and were in the act of rushing into the room, when M—— suddenly planted himself in a posture of defiance, elevated the razor to his throat, and almost howled—“One step—one step nearer—and I—I—I—” motioning as though he would draw it from one ear to the other. We all fell back, horror-struck, and in silence. What could we do? If we moved towards him, or made use of any threatening gesture, we should see the floor in an instant deluged with his blood. I once more crossed my arms on my breast, with an air of mute submi

Ha—ha!” he exclaimed, after a pause, evidently pleased with such a demonstration of his power, “obedient, however!—come—that’s one merit! But still, what a set of cowards—bullies—cowards you must all be!—What!—all four of you afraid of our man?” In the course of his frantic gesticulations, he had drawn the razor so close to his neck, that its edge had slightly grazed the skin under his left ear, and a little blood trickled from it over his shoulders and breast.

“Blood!—blood?—What a strange feeling! How coldly it fell on my breast!—How did I do it?—Shall I—go—on, as I have made a beginning?” he exclaimed, drawing the words at great length. He shuddered, and—to my unutterable joy and astonishment—deliberately closed the razor, replaced it in its case, put both in the drawer; and having done all this, before we ventured to approach him, he fell at his full length on the floor, and began to yell in a manner that was perfectly frightful; but in a few moments, he burst into tears, and cried and sobbed like a child. We took him up in our arms, he groaning—“Oh, shorn of my strength!—shorn! shorn! like Samson!—Why part with my weapon?—The Philistines be upon me!”—and laid him down on the bed, where, after a few moments, he fell asleep. When he woke again, a strait-waistcoat put all his tremendous strugglings at defiance—though his strength seemed increased in a tenfold degree—and prevented his attempting either his own life, or that of any one near him. When he found all his writhings and heavings utterly useless, he gnashed his teeth, the foam issued from his mouth, and he shouted,—“I’ll be even with you, you incarnate devils!—I will!—I’ll suffocate myself!” and he held his breath till he grew black in the face, when he gave over the attempt. It was found necessary to have him strapped down to the bed; and his howlings were so shocking and loud, that we began to think of removing him, even in that dreadful condition, to a mad-house. I ordered his head to be shaved again, and kept perpetually covered with cloths soaked in evaporating lotions—blisters to be applied behind each ear, and at the nape of the neck—leeches to the temples, and the appropriate internal medicines in such cases—and left him, begging I might be sent for instantly, in the event of his getting worse.* Oh, I shall never forget this harrowing scene!—my feelings

* I ought to have mentioned, a little way back, that in obedience to my hurried were wound up almost to bursting; nor did they receive their proper tone for many a week. I cannot conceive that the people whom the New Testament speaks of as being "possessed of devils," could have been more dreadful in appearance, or more outrageous in their actions, than was Mr M——; nor can I help suggesting the thought, that, possibly, they were in reality nothing more than maniacs of the worst kind. And is not a man transformed into a devil, when his reason is utterly overturned?

On seeing M—— the next morning, I found he had passed a terrible night—that the constraint of the strait-waistcoat filled him incessantly with a fury that was absolutely diabolical. His tongue was dreadfully lacerated, and the whites of his eyes, with perpetual straining, were discoloured with a reddish hue, like ferrets' eyes. He was truly a piteous spectacle! One's heart ached to look at him, and think, for a moment, of the fearful contrast he formed to the gay Mr M—— he was only a few days before, the delight of refined society, and the idol of all his friends! He lay in a most precarious state for a fortnight; and though the fits of outrageous madness had ceased, or become much mitigated, and interrupted, not infrequently, with "lucid intervals"—as the phrase is,—I began to be apprehensive of his sinking eventually into that hopeless, deplorable condition, idiocy. During one of his intervals of sanity—when the savage fiend relaxed, for a moment, the hold he had taken of the victim's faculties—M—— said something according with a fact which it was impossible for him to have any knowledge of by the senses, which was to me singular and inexplicable. It was about nine o'clock in the morning of the third day after that on which the scene above described took place, that M——, who was lying in a state of the utmost lassitude and exhaustion, scarcely able to open his eyes, turned his head slowly towards Mr ——, the apothecary, who was sitting by his bed-side, and whispered to him—"They are preparing to bury that wretched fellow next door—hush! hush!—one of the coffin-trestles has fallen—hush!" Mr ——, and the nurse, who had heard him, both strained their ears to listen, but could hear not even "a mouse stirring"—"there's somebody come in—a lady, kissing his lips before he's screwed down—oh, I hope she won't be scorched—that's all!" He then turned away his head, with no appearance of emotion, and presently fell asleep. Through mere curiosity, Mr —— looked at his watch; and from subsequent enquiry ascertained that—sure enough—about the time when his patient had spoken, they were about burying his neighbour; that one of the trestles did slip a little aside, and the coffin, in consequence, was near falling; and finally, marvellous to tell, that a lady, one of the deceased's relatives, I believe, did come and kiss the corpse, and cry bitterly over it! Neither Mr —— nor the nurse heard any noise whatever during the time of the burial preparations next door, for the people had been earnestly requested to be as quiet about them as possible, and really made no disturbance whatever. By what strange means he had acquired his information—whether or not he was indebted for it to the exquisite delicacy, the morbid sensitiveness of the organs of hearing, I cannot conjecture; especially am I at a loss to account for the latter part of what he uttered, about the lady's kissing the corpse. On another occasion, during one of his most placid moods, but not in any lucid interval, he insisted on my taking pen, ink, and paper, and turning amanuensis. To quiet him I acquiesced, and wrote what he dictated; and the manuscript now lies before me, and is verbatim et litteratim as follows:—

"I, T—— M——, saw—what saw I? A solemn silver grove—there were innumerable spirits sleeping among the branches—(and it is this, injunctions, the ladies suffered themselves, almost fainting with fright, to be conducted silently into the adjoining chambers—and it was well they did. Suppose they had uttered any sudden shriek, or attempted to interfere, or made a disturbance of any kind—what would have become of us all?

though unobserved of naturalists, that makes the aspen-tree's leaves to quiver so much—it is this, I say, namely, the rustling movements of the spirits,)—and in the midst of this grove was a beautiful site for a statue, and one there assuredly was—but what a statue! Transparent, of stupendous size, through which (the sky was cloudy and troubled) a ship was seen sinking at sea, and the crew at cards; but the good spirit of the man saved them; for he shewed them the key of the universe, and a shoal of sharks, with murderous eyes, were disappointed of a meal. 'Lo, man, behold—another part of this statue—what an one!—has a MISSER in it—it opens—widens into a parlour, in darkness; and shall be disclosed the horror of horrors, for, lo some one sitting—sitting—easy-chair—fiery-face—fiend—fiend—oh, God! oh, God! save me," cried he. He ceased speaking, with a shudder—nor did he resume the dictation, for he seemed in a moment to have forgotten that he had dictated at all. I preserved the paper; and glibberish though it is, I consider it both curious, and highly characteristic throughout. Judging from the latter part of it, where he speaks of a "dark parlour, with some fiery face I find sitting in an arm-chair;" and coupling this with various similar expressions and allusions which he made during his ravings, I felt convinced that his fancy was occupied with some one individual image of horror, which had scared him into madness, and now clung to his disordered faculties like a fiend. He often talked about "spectres," "spectral"—and uttered incessantly the words, "spectre-smitten." The nurse once asked him what he meant by these words; he started—grew disturbed—his eye glanced with afflict—and he shook his head, exclaiming, "horror!" A few days afterwards he hired an amanuensis, who, of course, was duly apprised of the sort of person he had to deal with; and after a painfully ludicrous scene, he attempting to beat down the man's terms from a guinea and a half a week to half-a-crown—he engaged him for three guineas, he said, and insisted on his taking up his station at the side of the bed, in order that he might take down every word that was uttered. M—— told him he was going to dictate a romance! It would have required, in truth, the "pen of a ready writer" to keep pace with poor M——'s utterance; for he raved on at a prodigious rate, in a strain, it need hardly be said, of unconnected absurdities. Really it was inconceivable nonsense, rhapsodical rantings in the Maturin style, full of vaults, sepulchres, spectres, devils, magic—with here and there a thought of real poetry. It was pitious to peruse it! His amanuensis found it impossible to keep up with him, and, therefore, profited by a hint from one of us, and, instead of writing, merely moved his pen rapidly over the paper, scrawling all sorts of ragged lines and figures, to resemble writing! M—— never asked him to read it over, nor requested to see it himself; but, after about fifty pages were done, dictated a title-page—pitched on publishers—settled the price and the number of volumes—four!—and then exclaimed—"Well!—thank God—that's off my mind at last!" He never mentioned it afterwards; and his brother committed the whole to the flames about a week after.

M—— had not, however, yet done with his amanuensis—but put his services in requisition in quite another capacity—that of reader. Milton was the book he selected—and actually they went through very nearly nine books of it—M—— perpetually interrupting him with comments, sometimes saying surpassingly absurd, and occasionally very fine, forcible things. All this formed a truly touching illustration of that beautiful, often quoted sentiment of Horace—

"Quo semel est imbuta recens, servabit odorem

Testa diu"

(Epist. Lib. I. Ep. 2. 69, 70.)

As there was no prospect of his speedily recovering the use of his reasoning faculties, he was removed to a private asylum, where I attended him regularly for more than six months. He was reduced to a state of drivelling idiotcy; complete faculty! Lamentable! heart-rending! Oh, how deplorable to see a man of superior intellect—one whose services are really wanted in society—the prey of madness!

Dr Johnson was well known to express a peculiar horror of insanity. "Oh, God! afflict my body with what tortures thou wilt; but spare my reason. Where is he that does not join him in uttering such a prayer?"

It would be beside my purpose here to enter into abstract speculations or purely professional details concerning insanity; but one or two brief and simple remarks, the fruits of much experience and consideration, may perhaps be pardoned me. It is still a vezatu questio in our profession, whether persons of strong or weak minds—whether the ignorant or the highly cultivated, are most frequently the subjects of insanity. If we are disposed to listen to a generally shrewd and intelligent writer, [Dr Monro, in his "Philosophy of Human Nature,"] we are to understand, that "children, and people of weak minds, are never subject to madness; for," adds the Doctor, "how can he despair, who cannot think?" Though the logic here is somewhat loose and leaky, I am disposed to agree with the Doctor, in the main; and I ground my acquiescence, first, on the truth of Locke's distinction, laid down in his great work, book ii. c. li. § 12 and 13) where he mentions the difference "between idiots and madmen," and thus states the sum of his observations:

"In short, herein seems to lie the difference between idiots and madmen, that madmen put wrong ideas together, and do make wrong propositions, but argue and reason right from them; but idiots make very few or no propositions, and reason scarce at all."

Secondly, On the corroboration afforded to it by my own experience. I have generally found that those persons who are most distinguished for their powers of thought and reasoning, when of sound mind, continue to exercise that power but incorrectly, and be distinguished by their exercise of that power—when of unsound mind—their understanding retaining, even after such a shock, and revolution of its faculties, the bent and bias impressed upon it before-hand; and I have found, further, that it has been chiefly those of such character—i. e. thinkers—that have fallen into madness; and that it is the perpetual straining and taxing of their strong intellects, at the expense of their bodies, that has brought them into such a calamity. Suppose, therefore, we say, in short, that madness is the fate of strong minds, or at least of minds many degrees removed from weak; and idioty of weak, imbecile minds. This supposition, however, involves a sorry sort of compliment to the fair sex; for it is notorious that the annual majority of those received into lunatic asylums, are females! I have found imaginative, fanciful people, the most liable to attacks of insanity; and have had under my care four such instances, or at least very nearly resembling the one I am now relating, in which insanity has ensued from sudden fright. And it is easily accounted for. The imagination—the predominant faculty—is immediately appealed to—and, eminently lively and tenacious of impressions, exerts its superior and more practised powers, at the expense of the judgment, or reason, which it tramples upon and crushes. There is then nothing left in the mind that may make head against this unnatural dominancy; and the result is generally not unlike that in the present instance. As for my general system of treatment, it may all be comprised in a word or two—acquiescence; submission; suggestion; soothing. Had I pursued a different plan with M——, what might have been the disastrous issue?

To return, however—The reader may possibly recollect seeing something like the following expression, occurring in "The Broken Heart:"† "A candle flickering and expiring in its socket, which suddenly shoots up into an instantaneous brilliance, and then is utterly extinguished." I have referred to it, merely because it affords a very apt illustration—after far than any that now suggests itself to me, of what sometimes takes place in madness. The roaring flame of insanity sinks suddenly into the sullen smouldering embers of complete fatuity, and remains so for months; when, like that of the candle just alluded to, it will instantaneously gather up and concentrate its expiring energies into one terrific blaze—one final paroxysm of outrageous mania—and lo! it has consumed itself utterly—burnt itself out—and the patient is unexpectedly restored to reason. The experience of my medical readers, if it have lain at all in the track of insanity, must have presented such cases to their notice not unfrequently. However metaphysical ingenuity may set us speculating about the “why and wherefore” of it—the fact is undeniable. It was thus with Mr M—. He had sunk into the deplorable condition of a simple, harmless, melancholy idiot, and was released from formal constraint: but suddenly, one morning, while at breakfast, he sprang upon the person who always attended him—and, had not the man been very muscular, and practised in such matters, he must have been soon overpowered, and perhaps murdered. A long and deadly wrestle took place between them. Thrice they threw each other—and the keeper saw that the madman several times cast a longing eye towards a knife which lay on the breakfast-table, and endeavoured to swing his antagonist so as to get himself within its reach. Both were getting exhausted with the prolonged struggle—and the keeper, really afraid for his life, determined to settle matters as soon as possible. The instant therefore, that he could get his right arm disengaged, he hit poor Mr M— a cruel blow on the side of the head, which felled him, and he lay senseless on the floor, the blood pouring fast from his ears, nose, and mouth. He was again confined in a strait waistcoat, and conveyed to bed—when, what with exhaustion, and the effect of the medicines which had been administered, he fell into profound sleep, which continued all day, and, with little intermission, through the night. When he awoke in the morning, lo! he was “in his right mind!” His calmed, tranquillized features, and the sobered expression of his eyes, shewed that the sun of reason had really once more dawned upon his long benighted faculties. Aye—he was — “himself again!”

I heard of the good news before I saw him, and on hastening to his room, I found it was indeed so—his altered appearance at first sight amply corroborated it! How different the mild, sad smile now beaming on his pallid faded features, from the vacant stare—the unmeaning laugh of idiocy—or the fiendish glare of madness!—the contrast was strong as that between the soft, stealing, expansive twilight, and the burning blaze of noonday. He spoke in a very feeble, almost inarticulate voice, complained of dreadful exhaustion, and whispered something indistinctly about “waking from a long and dreary dream;” and said that he felt, as it were, only half awake—or alive. All was new—strange—startling! Fearful of taxing too much his newborn powers, I feigned an excuse, and took my leave, recommended him cooling and quieting medicines, and perfect seclusion from visitors. How exhilarated I felt my own spirits all that day!

He gradually, very gradually, but surely, recovered. One of the earliest indications of his reviving interest in life—

“And all its busy, thronging scenes,” was an abrupt enquiry whether Trinity term had commenced—and whether or not he was now eligible to be called to the bar. He was utterly unconscious that three terms had flitted over him, while he lay in the gloomy wilderness of insanity; and when I satisfied him of this fact, he alluded with a sigh to the beautiful thought of one of our old dramatists, who, illustrating the unconscious lapse of years over “Endymion”—makes one tell him—

“Lo, the twig against which thou leantest when thou didst fall asleep, is now become a tree when thou awakes!”

It was not till several days after his restoration to reason, that I ventured to enter into any thing like detailed conversation with him, or to make particular allusions to his late illness; and on this occasion it was that he related to me his rencontre with the fearful object which had overturned his reason—adding with intense feeling, that not ten thousand a-year should induce him to live in the same chambers any more.

During the course of his progress towards complete recovery, memory shot its strengthening rays further and further back into the inspissated gloom in which the long interval of insanity had shrouded his mind; but it was too dense—too “palpable an obscure”—to be ever completely and thoroughly illuminated. The rays of recollection, however, settled distinctly on some of the more prominent points; and I was several times astonished by his sudden reference to things which he had said and done, during the “depth of his disorder.” He asked me, once, for instance, whether he had not made an attempt on his life, and with a razor, and how it was that he did not succeed. He had no recollection, however, of [†] his long and deadly struggle with his keeper—at least he never made the slightest allusion to it,—nor of course did any one else.

“I don’t much mind talking these horrid things over with you, Doctor—for you know all the ins and outs of the whole affair; but if any of my friends or relatives presume to torture me with any allusions or enquiries of this sort—I’ll fight them! they’ll drive me mad again!” The reader may suppose the hint was not disregarded. All recovered maniacs have a dread—an absolute horror—of any reference being made to their madness, or any thing they have said or done during the course of it; and is it not easily accounted for?

“Did the horrible spectre which occasioned your illness, in the first instance, ever present itself to you afterwards?” I once enquired. He paused and turned pale. Presently he replied, with considerable agitation—“Yes, yes—it scarcely ever left me. It has not always preserved its spectral consistency, but has entered into the most astounding—the most preposterous combinations conceivable, with other objects and scenes—all of them, however, more or less, of a distressing, or fearful character—many of them terrific!” I begged him, if it were not unpleasant to him, to give me a specimen of them.

“It is certainly far from gratifying to trace scenes of such shame and horror—but I will comply as far as I am able,” said he rather gloomily. “Once I saw him,” meaning the spectre, “leading on an army of huge speckled and crested serpents against me; and when they came upon me—for I had no power to run away—I suddenly found myself in the midst of a pool of stagnant water, absolutely alive with slimy shapeless reptiles; and while endeavouring to make my way out, he rose to the surface, his face hissing in the water, and blazing bright as ever! Again, I thought I saw him in single combat, by the gates of Eden, with Satan—and the air thronged and heated with swart faces looking on.” This was unquestionably some dim confused recollection of the Milton-readings, in the earlier part of his illness. “Again, I thought I was in the act of opening my snuff-box, when he issued from it, diminutive, at first, in size—but swelling, soon, into gigantic proportions, and his fiery features diffusing a light and heat around, that absolutely scorched and blasted! At another time, I thought I was gazing upwards on a sultry summer sky—and in the midst of a luminous fissure in it, made by the lightning—I distinguished his increased figure, with his glowing features wearing an expression of horror, and his limbs outstretched, as if he had been hurled down from some height or other, and was falling through the sky towards me. He came—he came—flung himself into my recoiling arms—and clung to me—burning, scorching, withering my soul within me! I thought further, that I was all the while the subject of strange, paradoxical, contradictory feelings towards him;—that I at one and the same time loved and loathed—feared and despised him!” He mentioned several other instances of the confusions in his “chamber of imagery.” I told him of his sudden exclamation concerning Mr T.—a burial, and its singular corroboration; but he either did not, or affected not to recollect any thing about it. He told me he had a full and distinct recollection of being for a long time possessed with the notion of making himself a "sacrifice" of some sort or other, and that he was seduced or goaded on to do so, by the spectre, in the most dazzling temptations—and under the most appalling threats—one of which latter was, that God would plunge him into hell forever, if he did not offer up himself;—that if he did so, he should be a sublime spectacle to the universe," &c. &c. &c.

"Do you recollect of dictating a novel or a romance?" He started as if struck with some sudden recollection. "No—but I tell you what I recollect well—that the spectre and I were set to copy all the tales and romances that ever had been written, in a large, bold, round hand, and then translate them into Greek or Latin verse!" He smiled, nay even laughed at the thought, almost the first time of his giving way to such emotions since his recovery. He added, that, as to the latter, the idea of the utter hopelessness of ever getting through such a stupendous undertaking, never once presented itself to him, and that he should have gone on with it, but that he lost his inkstand!!

"Had you ever a clear and distinct idea that you had lost the right use of reason?"

"Why, about that, to tell the truth, I've been puzzling myself a good deal, and yet I cannot say any thing decisive. I do fancy that at times I had short, transient glimpses into the real state of things, but they were so evanescent. I am conscious of feeling at these times incessant fury arising from a sense of personal constraint, and I longed once to strangle some one who was giving me medicine."

But one of the most singular of all is yet to come. He still persisted then, after his complete recovery, as we supposed, in avowing his belief that we had hired a huge boa serpent from Exeter Change, to come and keep constant watch over him, to constrain his movements when he threatened to become violent; that it lay constantly coiled up under his bed for that purpose; that he could now and then feel the motions—the writhing undulating motions of its coils—hear it utter a sort of sigh, and see it often elgyrate its head over the bed, and play with its soft, slippery, delicate forked tongue over his face, to soothe him to sleep. When poor M—, with a serious, sober, earnest air, assured me he still believed all this, my hopes of his complete and final restoration to sanity were dashed at once! How such an absurd—in short I have no terms in which I may adequately characterise it—how, I say, such an idea could possibly be persisted in, I was bewildered in attempting to conceive. I frequently strove to reason him out of it, but in vain. To no purpose did I attack and caricature the notion almost beyond all bounds; it was useless to remind him of the blank impossibility of it; he regarded me with such a face as I should exhibit to a fluent personage, quite in earnest in demonstrating to me that the moon was made of green cheese.

I have once before heard of a patient who, after recovering from an attack of insanity, retained one solitary crotchet—one little stain or speck of lunacy—about which, and which alone, he was mad to the end of his life. I supposed such to be the case with M—. It was possible—barely so, I thought—that he might entertain his preposterous notion about the boa, and yet be sound in the general texture of his mind. I prayed God it might; I "hoped against hope." The last evening I ever spent with him, was occupied with my endeavouring, once for all, to disabuse him of the idea in question; and in the course of our conversation, he disclosed one or two other little symptoms—specks of lunacy—which made me leave him, filled with disheartening doubts as to the probability of a permanent recovery.

My worst fears were awfully realised. In about five years from the period above alluded to, M—, who had got married, and had enjoyed excellent general health, was spending the summer with his family at Brussels—and one night destroyed himself—alas, alas, destroyed himself in a manner too horrible to mention!

DR PARR AND HIS CONTEMPORARIES.

No. II.

READER! perhaps you have heard of churls, who, being embarked in the same ship for an East-India voyage, or engaged as associates in the same literary undertakings, have manifested no interest at all in the partners of their hopes and hazards. We, for our parts, have heard of a monster—and otherwise not a bad monster—among the contributors to this very Journal, who sent his “article” most punctually—punctually received his honorarium—punctually acknowledged its receipt by return of post, but in no one instance, through a period of several years, thought proper to express satisfaction in any one “article” of his collaborateurs, or interest in their characters, or curiosity about their names; who seemed, in fact, wilfully and doggedly unaware of their existence; and, in one word, by a single act of profound selfishness, annihilated, to his own consciousness, all contemporary authors, however closely brought into connexion with himself.

Far be such apathy from Christopher North and his friends! The interest post-curante or misanthrope, whose long experience of the world has brought to the temper of fixed and contemptuous disregard for man as a species, not seldom makes an exception in favour of the particular John, William, or James, whom accident has embarked in the same little boat with himself. Dan Dancer, the miser, fought the battles of the paupers in his own neighbourhood, and headed them in their campaigns for rights of common and turbary with the most disinterested heroism. Elwes, the prince of misers, sometimes laid aside his narrow cares for the duties of a patriot. No man so memorably selfish, who has not, on some occasion of his life, felt the social instinct which connects his else contemptible race, and acknowledged the duties which grow out of it. As to the good and generous, they cannot travel so much as a Jewish Sabbath-day’s journey in company with another, participating in common purposes for the time, and liable to common inconveniences of weather or accident, and even to common possibilities of danger, without recognizing something beyond a stranger’s claim to offices of kindness or courtesy in the transient relations of a fellow traveller.

Yet these are, in their nature, felt to be perishable connexions: neighbourhood is a relation either purely of accident, or of choice not determined by consideration of neighbours. And the brief associations of public carriages or inns are as evanescent as the sandy columns of the Great Desert, which the caprices of the wind build up and scatter, shape and unshape in a moment. Seldom, indeed, does a second sunshine upon fellow travellers in modern England. And neighbourhood, if a more durable tie, is often one even less consciously made known to the parties concerned. If, then, connexions casual as these, where the vinculum of the relation is so finely spun as to furnish rather a verbal classification to the logician than a practical subject of duties to the moralist, are yet acknowledged by the benevolent as imposing some slight obligations of consideration and service, much more ought an author to find, in the important circumstances which connect the ministers of the press, in their extensive fellowship of duties, rights, powers, interests, and necessities, a bond of fraternal alliance, and more than fraternal sympathy. Too true it is, that authors are sometimes blockheads, very probably coxcombs, and by possibility even knaves. Too commonly it happens that, in the occasions and the motives which originally drew them into authorship, there is little or nothing to command respect. Venter lurtur ingenu is the great freeder of the Metropolitan press; and, amongst the few who commence authors upon arguments less gross and instant, there are not many who do so from impulses entirely honourable.

Considerations such as these, are at war with all sentiments of regard for the mere hacks of the press, who, having no natural summons to so fine a vocation, pervert literature—the noblest of professions—into the vilest of trades. But wherever that is not primâ facie presumable, wherever circumstances allow us to suppose that a man has taken up the office of author with adequate pretensions, and a proper sense of his responsibilities—every other author of generous nature will allow him the benefit of that privilege which all over the world attaches to co-membership in any craft, calling, or guild whatsoever—even those which are illiberal or mechanical; à fortiori in those which are intellectual. Surgeons bleed surgeons for love, physicians assassinate physicians gratis. Superannuated actors are everywhere free, or ought to be, of the theatre. And an author who has exercised his craft in a liberal and gentlemanly spirit, is entitled in that character to the courtesies of all professional authors, and to entire amnesty as respects his politics. These claims we cheerfully allow; and we come to the consideration of Dr Parr as a scholar and as an author with perfect freedom from all prejudice, anxious to give him the fullest benefit of his real merits, and dismissing all unpleasant recollections of that factious and intemperate character which he put forward in politics and divinity.

Dr Parr as an author! That very word in our ear sounds ridiculous, apart from every question upon the quality or value of what he wrote. As a literary man, as a scholar, prepared by reading and research for appreciating a considerable proportion of the past or the current literature—we are willing to concede that Dr Parr stood upon somewhat higher ground than the great body of his clerical brethren. But even this we say with hesitation. For it is scarcely to be believed, except by those who have gone with an observing eye into English society, how many rural clergymen go down to their graves unheard of by the world, and unacquainted with the press, unless perhaps by some anonymous communication to a religious magazine, or by an occasional sermon; who have beguiled the pains of life by researches unusually deep into some neglected or unpopular branches of professional learning. Such persons, it is true, are in general unequally learned; so indeed are most men; so, beyond all men, was Dr Parr. We do not believe that he possessed any one part of knowledge accurately, unless it were that section of classical learning which fell within his province as a schoolmaster. The practice of a long life naturally made him perfect in that; perfect at least in relation to the standard of that profession. But how small a part of classical researches lie within the prescriptive range of a practising schoolmaster! The duties of a professor in the universities or final schools have a wider compass. But it must be a pure labour of supererogation in a teacher of any school for boys, if he should make his cycle of study very comprehensive. Even within that cycle, as at this time professed by some first-rate teachers, was Dr Parr master of everything? In some of its divisions was he even master of any thing? For example, how much did he know—has he left it upon record, in any one note, exegetical or illustrative, upon any one obscure or disputed passage of any one classic, that he knew any thing at all in the vast and interminable field of classical antiquities? The formulæ of the Roman calendar were known to him as a writer of Latin epitaphs. True, but those are mastered easily in ten minutes: did he know, even on that subject, any thing farther? To take one case amongst a thousand, when the year 1800 brought up a question in its train—was it to be considered the last year of the eighteenth century, or the first of the nineteenth? Did Dr Parr come forward with an oracular determination of our scruples, or did he silently resign that pleading to the humble hands of the laureate—Pye? Or again, shifting from questions of time to those of space, has Dr Parr contributed so much as his mite to the very interesting, important, and difficult subject of classical geography? Yet these were topics which lay within his beat as a schoolmaster. If we should come upon the still higher ground of divinity, and Christian antiquities, perhaps upon those it might appear that Dr Parr had absolutely no pretensions at all. But not to press such questions too closely or invidiously, whatever might be the amount of his attainments under these heads, were it little or were it much, scanty as the measure of our faith in them, or co-extensive with the vaunts of his friends,—still all this has reference only to his general capacity as a man of letters : whereas we are called upon to consider Dr Parr also as an author; indeed we have now no other means for estimating his posse as a scholar, than through his esse as a writer for the press.

This is our task; and this it is which moves our mirth, whilst it taxes the worthy doctor and his friends with a spirit of outrageous self-delusion. Dr Parr as an author! and what now might happen to be the doctor's works? For we protest, upon our honour, that we never heard their names. Was ever case like this? Here is a learned doctor, whose learned friend has brought him forward as a first-rate author of his times; and yet nothing is extant of his writing, beyond an occasional preface, or a pamphlet on private squabbles. But are not his Opera Omnia collected and published by this friendly biographer, and expanded into eight enormous tomes? True, and the eight tomes contain, severally, the following hyperbolical amount of pages:—

Yes! Five thousand seven hundred and thirty-four octavo pages, many of them printed in a small type, are the apparent amount of Samuel Parr's works in the edition of Dr Johnstone; and it is true, besides, that the very élite of his papers are omitted—such as his critical notices of books in the Monthly and Critical Reviews, or the British Critic, and his essay on the word Sublime, addressed to Mr Dugald Stewart. Add what is omitted, and the whole would be little short of seven thousand es. And yet, spite of that, not one work of Dr Parr's is extant, which can, without laughter, assume that important name. The preface to Bellenden is, after all, by much the weightiest and most regular composition, and the least of a fugitive tract. Yet this is but a jeu d'esprit, or classical prolusion. And we believe the case to be unexampled, that upon so slender a basis, a man of the world, and reputed a man of sense, should set up for an author. Well might the author of the Precursors of Literature (1797) demand—"What has Dr Parr written? Aserinon or two, rather long; a Latin preface to Bellendenus, (rather long too,) consisting of a cento of Latin and Greek expressions, applied to political subjects; another Preface to some English Tracts; and two or three English Pamphlets about his own private quarrels—and this man is to be compared with Dr Samuel Johnson!" [7th Edit. p. 219.]

Certainly the world had never before seen so great a pomp of pretension rising from so slight a ground. The delusion was absolutely univalled, and prevailed throughout Dr Parr's long life. He and his friends seemed constantly to appeal to some acknowledged literary reputation, established upon foundations that could not be shaken, and notorious to all the world. Such a mistake, and in that extent, was never heard of before. Dr Parr talked, and his friends listened, not only as giving and receiving oracles of moral wisdom, but of wisdom owned as such by all the world; whereas, this metordas (to borrow a Roman word for its Roman sense) whether secretly due to the Dr or not, evidently could not exist as a fact, unless according to the weight and popularity of published works, by which the world had been taught to know him and respect him. Startling, originally, from the erroneous assumption insinuated by his preposterous self-conceit, that he was Johnson redivivus, he adopted Johnson's colloquial pretensions; and that was vain glorious folly; but he also conceived that these pretensions were familiarly recognised; and that was frenzy. To Johnson, as a known master in a particular style of conversation, every body gave way; and upon all questions with moral bearings, he was supposed to have the rights and precedence of a judicial chair. But this prerogative he had held in right of his works; works—not which he ought to have written, (see Dr Johnstone's Memoirs of Parr, p. 464,) but which he had written, printed, and published. Strange that Dr Parr should overlook so obvious a distinction! Yet he did so for fifty years. Dining, for instance, at Norfolk house, the Duke having done him the honour to invite him to the same table with the Prince of Wales, such was his presumption in the presence of the heir apparent, of the Premier Peer of England, and all the illustrious leaders from the Opposition side of the two houses, that he fully believed it to be his vocation to stand forward as the spokesman of the company. It gave him no check, it suggested no faltering scruple, that Mr Fox was on one side the table, and Sheridan on the other. His right he conceived it to be to play the foremost part, and to support the burden of conversation between his Royal Highness and the splendid party assembled to meet him. Accordingly, on some casual question arising as to the comparative merits of Bishop Hurd and Archbishop Manners, as Greek scholars, in which the Prince declared a plain and unobscured opinion in favour of the latter, and in fact of his own valuable predecessor, Parr strutted forward with the unadged licence of jacobinism and paradox, to maintain a thesis against him. "I," said the P. of W., "esteem Markham a much greater, wiser, and more learned man than Hurd, and a better teacher; and you will allow me to be a judge, for they were both my preceptors." Here was a direct opinion; and the Prince afterwards gave reasons for it equally direct. A simple answer, as brief as the original position, was all that good breeding or etiquette allowed. But Dr Parr found an occasion for a conco, and prepared to use it. "Sir," said he, "is it your royal highness's pleasure that I should enter upon the topic of their comparative merits as a subject of discussion?"—"Yes," said the Prince. "Then, sir," said Dr Parr, "I differ entirely from your Royal Highness in opinion."—One would suppose by his formal preparation, that Parr was some serjeant at law rising to argue a case before the judges in Westminster Hall. The Prince, however, had permitted him to proceed: what else could a gentleman do? And, by way of acknowledging this courteous allowance, with the true soul of a low-bred democrat, Parr starts with a point of stark contradiction of his Royal Highness, put as broadly and coarsely as he knew how: this was to show his "independence," for Jacobins always think it needful to be brutal, lest for one moment they might pass for gentlemen.

A dinner with a Prince of Wales is something rarer even than waltzing with the Emperor of Russia, or smoking a pipe with the Pope—things which have I believe never happened. It may interest our readers to see the rest of the dinner, especially as it contains two persons eminent in their day, and one of the greatest of our literature.

"I knew them both so intimately (replied the Prince,) you will not deny, that I had the power of more minutely appreciating their respective merits than you could have had. In this manner of judging, you may judge of my estimation of Markham's merits—his natural dignity and authority compared with the simplicity of Wordsworth's smoothness and softness, and I now add, with proper submission to your authority on such a subject, his experience as a schoolmaster, and his scholarship."—"Sir," (said Parr,) your Royal Highness began this conversation, and if you permit it to go on, must tolerate a very different inference."—"Go on," (said the Prince,) I declare that Markham understood Greek better than Hurd, for when I read Homer, and hesitated about a word, Markham immediately explained it, and then we went on, but when I hesitated with Hurd, he always referred me to the dictionary. I therefore conclude he wanted to be informed himself."—"Sir," (replied Parr,) I venture to differ from your Royal Highness's conclusion. I am myself a schoolmaster, and I think that Dr Hurd pursued the right method, and that Dr Markham failed in his duty. Hurd desired your Royal Highness to find the word in the lexicon, not because he did not know it, but because he wished you to find by search and learn it thoroughly. Dr Hurd was not eminent

Perhaps there are not ten men in Europe, occupying at the time no higher station than that of country schoolmaster, who would have had the front—in the presence of the Prince of Wales, or the Dauphin of France—to step before the assembled wits of Paris or London, and the great leaders of parties, as the rightful claimant of the royal ear, and natural representative of the illustrious party assembled at Norfolk House—all distinguished by high birth, talents, or station. Brass, triply bronzed, was requisite for this. “Thou art the great toe of this society; because that thou, being lowest, basest, meanest, still goest foremost.” But arrogance towards his fellow claimants was not enough for Dr Parr, unless he might also be arrogant towards the prince. In high-bred society, all disputation whatsoever—nay, all continued discussion—is outrageously at war with the established tone of conversation; a dispute must be managed with much more brilliancy, much more command of temper, a much more determinate theme, and a much more obvious progress in the question at issue, than are commonly found—not to prove grievously annoying to all persons present, except the two disputants. High-breeding and low-breeding differ not more in the degrees of refinement, which characterise their usages, than in the good sense upon which these usages have arisen. Certainly mere good sense is sufficient, without any experience at all of high life, to point out the intolerable absurdity of allowing two angry champions to lock up and sequester, as it were, the whole social enjoyment of a large party, and compel them to sit “in sad civility” witnesses of a contest, which can interest the majority neither by its final object nor its management. Social pleasure is the end and purpose of society; and whatsoever interferes with that should be scourged out of all companies. But, if disputing be intolerable, what shall we say of blank contradiction offered to a Prince of Wales—not in prosecution of some point of public service, but as an elegant condiment to the luxuries as a scholar; but it is not likely that he would have presumed to teach your Royal Highness, without knowing the lesson himself.”—“Have you not changed your opinion of Dr Hurd?” exclaimed the Prince. “I have read a work in which you attack him fiercely.”—“Yes, sir, I attacked him on one point which I thought important to letters; and I summoned the whole force of my mind, and took every possible pains to do it well; for I consider Hurd to be a great man. He is celebrated as such by foreign critics, who appreciate justly his wonderful acuteness, sagacity, and dexterity, in doing what he has done with his small stock of learning. There is no comparison, in my opinion, between Markham and Hurd as men of talents. Markham was a pompous schoolmaster—Hurd was a stiff and cold, but a correct gentleman. Markham was at the head of a great school, then of a great college, and finally became an archbishop. In all these stations he had trumpeters of his fame, who called him great, though he published one concio only, which has already sunk into oblivion. From a farm-house and village-school, Hurd emerged, the friend of Gray, and a circle of distinguished men. While fellow of a small college, he sent out works praised by foreign critics, and not despised by our own scholars. He enriched his understanding by study, and sent from the obscurity of a country village, a book, sir, which your royal father is said to have declared made him a bishop. He made himself unpopular in his own profession by the defence of a fantastical system. He had deeryers; he had no trumpeters; he was great in and by himself; and perhaps, sir, a portion of that power and adroitness, you have manifested in this debate, might have been owing to him.”—“Fox, when the prince was gone, exclaimed in his high tone of voice, “He thought he had caught you! but he caught a Tartar.”

In the last words only, Parr seems to have remembered that he was addressing a prince; in what he said of Hurd's Greek scholarship, and motive for referring the prince to the lexicon, though probably wrong as to the matter of fact, he might be right as to the principle; and at least he was there talking on a point of his own profession, which he might be presumed to understand better than the rest of the company. But who can forbear smiling, and thinking of the professor who lectured Hannibal on the art of war at that passage, where Parr, addressing the Prince of Wales, undertakes to characterise Hurd's pretensions as a gentleman?

of colloquial intercourse? To turn your back upon the king, to put a question to him, to pull out your watch in his presence—all these are notorious trespasses against the etiquette of courts, and reasonably so; because they are all habits which presuppose a carelessness of demeanour, incompatible with that reverence and decorous homage which should never slumber in the presence of a king, considered not as an individual, but as a state creature, embodying the majesty of a great nation. A Prince of Wales, or whosoever occupies that near relation to the throne, has the same sanctity of public character; and a man of sense, though a red-hot republican from the banks of the Potomack, would as little allow himself to forget that, as to insult a judge upon the bench.

Had the matter in dispute been some great question of constitutional policy, or in any way applicable to the Prince's future behaviour in life, or in many other circumstances that might be imagined, we can suppose a sort of propriety in the very breach of propriety. But the question was, in this case, too trivial to justify the least eccentricity of manner. He who counts the character of an abominassimus, should be careful that his indecencies and singularity cover some singular strength of character or some weight of fine sense. As it was, Dr Parr was paradoxical and apparently in the wrong: the Prince direct and rational. With what disadvantage to Dr Parr, on this occasion, and afterwards in his relation to Queen Caroline, do we recall the simple dignity of Dr Johnson,* when presented to George III. Dr Parr's introduction was at a dinner-table; Dr Johnson's in a library; and in their separate styles of behaviour, one might fancy each to have been governed by the presiding genius of the place. Johnson behaved with the dignity of a scholar and a loyal son of the Muses, under the inspiration of "strong book-mindedness;" Parr with the violence of a pedagogue, under the irritations of wine and indigestion. In reality, Dr Parr's effrontery was chiefly to be traced to that one fact in his life—that, for forty years, he swayed the sceptre of a pedagogue. Native arrogance was the root; but the "bright consummate flower" was unfolded and matured by his long reign as a tyrant over schoolboys. To borrow his own words, with one slight omission, in speaking of a Cambridge head, his "manners and temper were spoiled by the pedantries, and pomposities, and fooleries which accompany the long exercise of petty archdidascalian authority."

"Petty archdidascalian authority!" Thanks to Dr Parr for one, at least, of his sesquipedalian words; for that one contains the key to his whole life, and to the else-mysterious fact—that a pamphleteer, a party pamphleteer, a pamphleteer in the service of private brawls, trod the stage, on all occasions, with the air of some great patriarch of letters or polemic champion of the church. Who could believe that Dr Parr's friend and biographer, in the very act of publishing eight volumes, entitled, "Works of Dr Parr," should yet have no better answer to the contemptuous demand of the Pur-suits of Literature—"What has Dr Parr written?" than simply an expression of regret, (vol. i. p. 464,) "that with such powers, and such means of gathering information from every quarter, Dr Parr did not produce some great work on some great subject." He goes on to lament, it that he did not, "like Clarendon, give the history of that awful period of which he saw the spring-tide, and in part the issue; or, like Burnet, that he did not relate, in a familiar manner, the transactions of the period in which he lived; or, like Tacitus,

* Johnson had many of the elements to the composition of a gentleman in a very high degree, though it is true that these were all neutralized, at times, by some overmastering prejudice or disgust. His silent acquiescence in the royal praise, and the reason on which he justified his acquiescence—that it did not become him to bandy compliments with his Sovereign, is in the finest spirit of high-breeding, and reminds us of a similar test of gentlemanly feeling, applied to the English Ambassador by the Regent Duke of Orleans.

paint in caustic and living colours the atrocities, of some of which he was a witness, and deliver, as an everlasting memorial to posterity, the characters of those who bore a part in them." But, with submission, Posterity are a sort of people whom it is very difficult to get at; whatever other good qualities they may have, accessibility is not one of them. —A man may write eight quartos to them, à fortiori then eight octaves, and get no more hearing from the wretches, than had he been a stock and they been stones. As to those "everlasting memorials," which Dr Johnstone and Thucydides talk of, it is certainly advisable to "deliver" them—but troublesome and injurious to the digestive organs.

Another biographer, who unites with Dr Johnstone in lamenting, "that he did not undertake some work of a superior kind calculated for permanent utility and more durable fame," goes on in the following terms: "It is hinted, however, by a periodical writer, that he could not produce more creditable works; and for this reason—that he was, as it were, overlaid with acquired knowledge; the flood of his memory burst in on his own original powers and drowned them." But, in that case, we shall venture to hope that some Humane Society, like that on the banks of the Serpentine, will arise to save hopeful young men from such sad catatrophes; so that "acquired knowledge" may cease to prove so fatal a possession, and native ignorance be no longer a conditio sine qua non for writing "creditabile works." Meantime, whatever were the cause, the fact, we see, is admitted by Dr Parr's best friends—that he did not write any great, durable, or creditable work; and the best excuse for him which Dr Johnstone's ingenuity can devise is—that neither Archbishop Markham, nor Dean Cyril Jackson wrote any thing better. True: but the reason which makes such an excuse not entirely available to the case is this—that neither the Archbishop nor the Dean arrogated that place and authority in letters which they had not won: they had both been employed in the same sort of labour as Dr Parr; they had severally assisted in the education of a great prince, and they were content with the kind of honour which that procured them. And for Cyril Jackson in particular, he was content with less: for he persisted to the last in declining the mitre which he had earned. No: the simple truth is, as we have stated, that Dr Parr assumed his tone of swagger and self-sufficiency in part, perhaps, from original arrogance of nature and a confidence which he had in his own powers, but chiefly from a long life of absolute monarchy within the walls of a school-room. The nature of his empire was absolute and unlimited despotism, in the worst form described by Aristotle in his politics. There is no autocrat so complete, not the czar of all the Russias, as the captain of a king's ship, and the head master of a grammar school. Both of them are irrisponsible, à l'excès, in the utmost degree. And for Parr in particular, not only was he an autocrat, but, if he is not greatly belied, he was a capricious tyrant, an Algerine tyrant, who went the whole length of his opportunities for shewing partial favour, or inflicting savage punishment. And he had this peculiarity, that, whilst other tyrants find a present gratification in their severities, but shrink from their contemplation,—Parr treated his as Plato's suppers—they were luxuries for the moment, and subjects of continued exultation in the retrospect. Long after a man had entered the world as an active citizen, Dr Parr used to recall, as the most interesting tie which could connect him with himself, that at some distant period he had flogged him: and from one biographer it appears that, in proportion to his approbation of a boy, and the hopes with which he regarded him, were the frequency and the severity of his flagellations. To a man who reigned in blood, and fed (like Moloch) with din of children's cries, we may suppose that resistance was unheard of: and hence, we repeat, the arrogance with which he came abroad before the world. But what, it will be asked, on the side of the public, gave success to this arrogance? How was it that in his lifetime this insolence of assumption fit fortune? Partly, we answer, through the insolence itself: in all cases that does wonders. The great majority of men are ready to swear by any man's words if he does but speak with audacity.

In process of time, however, this resource will fail a man, unless reinforced by auxiliary means; and these we conceive to have lain in two circumstances, without which Parr never would have gained a height so disproportioned to his performances: The circumstances were, first, that Parr was a Whig; and the Whigs, as the party militant, make much of all who stick by them. Hence the excessive compliments which flowed in upon Dr Parr from Edinburgh, and from persons such as Dougald Stewart, who had otherwise no particular value for Dr Parr's pretensions. The Whigs are wise in their generation; and, like the Dissenters from the Church of England, they make men sensible that it is good to be of their faction; for they never forsake those who stick closely to them. Dr Parr, indeed, was rather a slippery partisan; but this was not generally known. His passions carried him back to Whiggism; and his general attachment was notorious, whilst his little special perfidies or acts of trimming were secrets to all but a very few. The other circumstance in his favour was this—that, as a schoolmaster, he was throwing into public life a continual stream of pupils, who naturally became partisans and obstinate pronouncers. In some instances, he educated both father and son; and, though it is true that here and there an eccentric person retains too lively a remembrance of past flagellations, and is with some difficulty restrained from cudgelling or assassinating the flagellator,—still, as a general case, it may be held that such recollections of the boy do not weigh much in the feelings of the man. Most certain it is, that, had Dr Parr been other than an active Whig in politics—or had he not been a schoolmaster of ancient and extensive practice, he never could as a literary man have risen so abruptly above the natural level of his performances as in fact he did. And now that he is dead, and the activity of such adventitious aids is rapidly beginning to fail him, he will sink doubtless quite as abruptly to his just standard; or, perhaps, by the violence of the natural reaction, will be carried below it.

There is another scale, in which it is probable that some persons may have taken their literary estimate of the Doctor, viz. the scale avoirdupois. For, it is very possible that, upon putting the eight volumes of works (as edited by Dr Johnstone) on a butcher's steelyard, they may have ascertained that they draw against a weight of 3 stone 6 lb. Infinite levity in particular cases amounts to gravity; and a vast host of fluttering pamphlets, and stray leaves, make up one considerable mass. It becomes necessary, therefore, to state the substance of the whole eight volumes. Briefly, then, the account stands thus: Volume the First contains Memoirs, (with some Extracts from Letters.) The two last contain Correspondence. Three other volumes contain Sermons: of which two volumes are mere parish discourses, having no more right to a place in a body of literary works than the weekly addresses to his congregation of any other rural clergyman. Thus, out of six volumes, one only is really privileged to take its rank under the general title of the Collection. The two remaining volumes, (the Third and Fourth,) contain Dr Parr's miscellaneous pamphlets, with some considerable omissions not accounted for by the Editor. These two volumes are, in fact, all that can properly be described as of a literary nature: and to these we shall resort for matter in the close of our review.

Meantime, we are satisfied that the correspondence of Dr Parr and his friends, for the very reason that it was written with no view (or no uniform view) to the press, is that part of the whole collection which will be read by most readers, and with most interest by all readers. We shall throw a glance on such parts of this correspondence as have a value in reference to the development of Dr Parr's character, or any singular interest on their own account.

Among the earliest of the literary acquaintances which Dr Parr had the opportunity of forming was that of Dr Johnson. Writing in 1821 (Jan. 6th) to Mr Joseph Cradock, who had said a few days before, that perhaps, upon the death of Dr Strahan, he himself "must be the oldest of Dr Johnson's friends, who knew him intimately during the last five or six years of his life;" Dr Parr takes occasion to retrace the nature of his own connexion with that eminent person: "Well, dear sir, I sympathise with you in your pleasure and in your pride, when you represent yourself as the oldest remaining scholar who lived upon terms of intimacy with Samuel Johnson. You saw him often, and you methinks often, in the presence of Goldsmith, Garrick, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and other literary heroes. I acknowledge the great superiority of your claims. Lord Stowell, I should suppose, will stand in the next place; and I challenge for myself the third. For many years, I spent a month's holidays in London, and never failed to call upon Johnson. I was not only admitted, but welcomed. I conversed with him upon numberless subjects of learning, politics, and common life. I traversed the whole compass of his understanding; and, by the acknowledgment of Burke and Reynolds, I distinctly understood the peculiar and transcendental properties of his mighty and virtuous mind. I intended to write his life. I laid by sixty or seventy books for the purpose of writing in such a manner as would do no discredit to myself. I intended to spread my thoughts over two volumes quarto; and if I had filled three pages, the rest would have followed. Often have I lamented my ill fortune in not building this monument to the fame of Johnson, and (let me not be accused of arrogance when I add) my own."

William Wordsworth, when he dedicated, in a few lines at once modest and dignified, his Excursion to the present Lord Lonsdale, with that accurate valuation of words which is one of his greatest poetical accomplishments, offers it as "A token—may it prove a monument—

Of honour," &c.

A token, or pledge of his attachment, the poem was, at any rate, by the act of dedication; whether it should also be a monument, a monumental token, that was for posterity to determine; and if others were at liberty to anticipate that result, the author, at least, was not. And, at all events, the mere logic of the case made it inevitable, that whatever proved a monument to the fame of Dr Johnson, should be so to the fame of him who raised it; for of a structure which should happen to be durable as a record of Dr Johnson, it is mere tautology to say that it must also be durable as the workmanship of Dr Parr. One and the same work could not have a divided character, or a separate destiny, in its different relations.

But we cannot imagine that Dr Parr's clumsy masonry could raise a monument to any body. For Dr Johnson, in particular, all that he could have done with effect would have been a short excursus or appendix to Boswell, on the pretensions of Johnson as a classical scholar. These were greater than it is the custom to suppose. Dr John Johnstone, indeed, somewhere has thought fit to speak of him in that character as immeasurably inferior to Parr. This is not true. Certainly, we are satisfied that Dr Johnson was no very brilliant Grecian; the haste and trepidation which he shewed in declining Dr Burney's application for assistance on the Greek tragedians, sufficiently establish that. But there is no reason to suppose, that, in this part of scholarship, Dr Parr had the least advantage of him: if he had, why are the evidences of his superiority so singularly wanting? or in what corner of forgotten literature are we to seek them? As Latin scholars, both were excellent: Parr, from practice, had the greater command over the delicacies and varieties of prose diction: Johnson, from natural talent, had by much the greater facility in verse. Elaborate ingenuity is far more in request for metrical purposes in Latin—knowledge of the idiom for prose. It might be shewn, indeed, that exquisite facility in the management of thoughts, artifices of condensation, or of substitution, of variation or inversion, are for the writer of Latin verse transcendent to any acquaintance with the Latin idiom: the peculiar treatment of an idea, which metre justifies and vindicates from what would else seem affectation, creates its own style. Johnson, in those relics of his Latin verses which have been preserved, benefited by that advantage: Parr, writing in Latin prose, and writing purely as a rhetorician, was taxed in the severest degree for a command over the idiomatic wealth of the language, and, for what is still less to be obtained from dictionaries, for a command over a Latin structure of sentence, and over the subsidiary forms of connexion and transition. In the preface to Bellenden, he answered the demand upon him, and displayed very unusual skill in the accomplishments of a Latin scholar. Latin composition, in fact, if we except bell-ringing, was the one sole thing, in the nature of accomplishments, which Dr Parr seems to have possessed. Among the fine arts, certainly, we admit, that he understood bell-ringing thoroughly; and we were on the point of forgetting to add, that in the art of slaughtering oxen, which he cultivated early as an amateur, his merit was conspicuous. Envy itself was driven to confess it; and none but the blackest-hearted Tory would go about at this time of day to deny it.* Still, of these three accomplishments, one only seems available to a biography of Dr Johnson; and that would barely have sufficed for the least important chapter of the work.

After all, was Parr really intimate with Johnson? We doubt it: for he must in that case have submitted to a kind of dissimulation bitter to a proud spirit. He was a Jacobite by inheritance: that would have pleased Dr Johnson well; but then by profession he was a Whig—a sort of monster which the Doctor could not abide, and (worse than that) he was a Whig renegade—such a combination of monstrous elements in a man's character as none of us can abide. To be a Whig is bad—to be a traitor is bad—but to be a Whig and a traitor is too much for humanity. Such features of his character Parr must have dissembled, and this would at once pique his self-love, and limit his power. One anecdote, rich in folly and absurdity, is current about an interview between Johnson and Parr, in which the latter should have stamped whenever the other stamped; and being called upon to explain this sonorous antiphony, replied, that he could not think of allowing his antagonist to be so much as a stamp ahead of him. Miss Seward, we think, was in the habit of telling this story: for she was one of the dealers in marvels, who are for ever telling of "gigantic powers" and "magnificent displays," in conversation, beyond any thing that her heroes were ever able to effect in their writings. We remember well that she used to talk of a particular dispute between Johnson and Parr, which in her childish conceit (for she had not herself been present) was equal to some conflict between Jupiter and one of the Titans. Possibly it was the stamping dispute, which we may be assured was a fiction. No man, falling into any gesticulation or expression of fervour from a natural and uncontrollable impulse, would bear to see his own involuntary acts parodied and reverberated as it were in a cool spirit of mimicry; that would be an insult; and Johnson would have resented it by flooring his man instantly—a matter very easy indeed to him—for in every sense he was qualified to "take the conceit" out of Dr Parr. Or perhaps, though we rather incline to think that Miss Seward's dispute turned upon some political question, the following as recorded by Parr himself, (Parriana, p. 321) might be the particular case alluded to:—"Once, sir, Sam. and I" i. e. Sam Johnson, "had a vehement dispute upon that most difficult of all subjects—the origin of evil. It called forth all the powers of our minds. No two tigers ever grappled with more fury; but we never lost

* The Doctor begged me one morning to take him into S. P.'s belfry. Secure from interruption, he proceeded with his intended object, which was, to raise and toll (pull), scientifically the tenth or largest bell. He set to work in silent, solemn formality. It took some time, I suppose a full quarter of an hour; for there was the rising, the full funeral toll, and the regular toll. When it was over, he stalked about the belfry in much pompousity. On recomposing himself, he looked at me with a smile, and said, 'There, what think you of that?' He was evidently very proud of the effort." In a Greek character of Dr Parr by Sir William Jones, among the numera of his Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex, neither the bell-ringing nor the ex-manuering is overlooked. "και το ελαι καθυπαινον δυνατος, και παρονομαζον, αι διακινειν, και ταυροκοπειν." sight of good manners. There was no Boswell present to detail our conversation. Sir, he would not have understood it. And then, sir, who do you think was the umpire between us? That fiend Horsley."

Miserable fudge! "Grappling like tigers" upon the origin of evil! How, but by total confusion of mind, was that possible upon such a question? One octavo page would state the outline of all that has ever been accomplished on this subject;—and the German philosopher, Kant, whom Dr Parr professed to have studied, and from whom he borrowed one polysyllable, and, apparently, one solitary idea, has in a short memoir sketched the outline of all past attempts (especially that of Leibnitz), and the causes of failure. Libraries may be written upon any question; but the whole nodus of this, as of most questions, lies in a single problem of ten words: and, as yet, no real advance has been made in solving it. As to Dr Johnson, we all happen to know what he could do in this matter; for he has given us the cream of his meditations in a review of Soame Jenyns. Trifling more absolute, on a philosophic subject, does not exist. Could Dr Parr do better? Had he one new idea on the question? If so, where is it? We remember obscurely some sentence or other of purest commonplace on this point in one of his sermons. Further on we may have an occasion for producing it. At present it is sufficient to say—that, as philosophers only, could Parr and Johnson ever converse upon equal terms; both being equally blind by natural constitution of mind, and equally unprepared by study or reading in that department, there was no room for differences between them, except such as were extra-essential or alien to the subject. On every other topic that could have arisen to divide them, Johnson, with one grasp of his muscular hand, would have throttled the whole family of Parrs. Had Parr presumed to talk that sort of incendiary politics in which he delighted, and which the French revolution ripened into Jacobinism, Johnson would have committed an assault upon him. As that does not appear to have happened, we venture to suppose that their intercourse was but trifling; still, for one who had any at all with Johnson, many of his other acquaintance seem a most incongruous selection. The whole orchestra of rebels, incendiaries, state criminals, all who hated the church and state, all who secretly plotted against them, or openly maligned them, the faction of Jacobinism through its entire gamut, ascending from the first steps of disaffection or anti-national feeling, to the full-blown activity of the traitor and conspirator, had a plenary indulgence from the curate of Hatton, and were inscribed upon the roll of his correspondents. We pause with a sense of shame in making this bold transition from the upright Sam. Johnson, full of prejudice, but the eternal champion of social order and religion, to the fierce Septemberizers who come at intervals before us as the friends, companions, or correspondents, (in some instances as the favourites,) of Dr Parr. Learning and good morals are aghast at the association!

It is singular, or at first sight it seems so, that brigaded with so many scowling republicans are to be found as occasional correspondents of Dr Parr, nearly one half of our aristocracy—two or three personages of royal blood, eight dukes, five marquesses, six-and-twenty earls, thirteen viscounts, one-and-thirty barons, or courtesy lords; to say nothing of distinguished women—a queen, several duchesses, countesses, and daughters of Earls, besides baronesses and honourables in ample proportion. Many of these, however, may be set down as persons altogether thoughtless, or as systematically negligent of political principles in correspondents of no political power. But what are we to think of ten judges (besides Lord Stowell) addressing, with the most friendly warmth, one who looked upon all their tribe as the natural tools of oppression; and no fewer than forty bishops, and four archbishops, courting the notice of a proud priest, who professed it as an axiom that three out of every five on the Episcopal bench were downright knaves. Oh! for a little homely consistency; and, in a world where pride so largely tyrannizes, oh for a little in the right place! Dr Parr did not in so many words proclaim destruction to their order as a favourite and governing principle: but he gave his countenance to principles that would, in practice, have effected that object, and his friendship to men that pursued no other.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex opens the correspondence, according to the present arrangement of the letters; if that may be called arrangement, where all is anarchy. At first we anticipated, from this precedency granted to a Prince, that the peerage and the Red Book would dictate the principle of classification; this failing, we looked to the subject, and next to the chronology. But at length we found that pretty much the same confusion obtains as in a pack of cards, that has first of all been accurately arranged in suits, and then slightly shuffled: in such a case, symptoms occur of the sorting continually disturbed by symptoms of the shuffling; two or three hearts, crossed by two or three spades; and a specious promise of diamonds, suddenly thrown into the shade by a course of clubs. Letters from the same person are usually thrown together, and sometimes a vein of the same subject prevails through a considerable tract of pages. But, generally speaking, a printer's devil seems to have determined the order of succession.

The Duke of Sussex, who has actually placed the bust of a hack dissenting book-maker, (Dr Rees, to wit,) rather than of Aristotle or Lord Bacon, as the presiding and tutelary genius of his fine library in Kensington palace, could not, of course, find any objections to Dr Parr in his hostility to the Church of England. His Royal Highness is probably indifferent on this point; whilst others, as Mr Jeremy Bentham, can hardly fail to esteem a defect in "Church of Englandism" one amongst the Doctor's very positive recommendations to their favour. The Duke's letters are amiable and pleasing in their temper, but otherwise (for want of specific subject) not very interesting. Mr Bentham, in more senses than one the Lucifer of the radical politicians, is still less so; and simply because he affects the humorous, in a strain of very elaborate and very infelicitous trifling, upon the names of Parr and Fox, (which he supposes to have been anticipated by Homer, in the address to Paris, Διόσκει, &c., and in the description of Thersites, Θέρσις ἢ Ἀσπάλυς, &c.) In a second letter, (Feb. 17, 1823,) which abundantly displays the old gentleman's infirmity, who (like Lord Byron) cannot bear a rival in the public interest, no matter whether otherwise for good or for bad, there is one passage, which, amusing on its own account, furnishes also an occasion for bringing forward one of Parr's most extravagant follies in literature. It is this:—"The 1st of March," says Mr Bentham, "or the 1st of April, comes out a number of the European Magazine, with another portrait of me by another hand; considerable expectations are entertained of this likewise. When you see a copy of a print of the House of Lords, at the time of the Queen's Trial, in the hand of Bowyer, and expected to come out in a month or two, you will (if Bowyer does not deceive me) see the phiz of your old friend" (Jeremy, to wit) "among the spectators; and these, how small soever elsewhere, will, in this print, forasmuch as their station is in the foreground, be greater than lords. Oddly enough made up the group will be. Before me he had got an old acquaintance of mine of former days—Sir Humphrey Davy: he and I might have stood arm in arm. But then came the servile poet and novelist; and then the ultra-servile sack-guzzler. Next to him, the old radical. What an assortment!" Certainly a strange lot of clean and unclean beasts were in that ark at that time; what with Mr Bentham's "assortment"—what with the non mi ricordo Italiani—the lawyers, pro and con—and some others that we could name. But with regard to Mr Jeremy's companions in Bowyer's print, does the reader take his meaning? We shall be "as good as a chorus" to him, and interpret:—"The 'servile poet and novelist' is Sir Walter Scott; the 'ultra-servile sack-guzzler,' Mr Southey, a pure and high-minded man; the 'old radical,' Mr Corporal Cobbett. Now, with regard to the last of these, Dr Parr considered him a very creditable acquaintance: he visited the Corporal at Botley; and the Corporal wrote him a letter, in which he talked of yielding Hatton. (What a glorious blunder, by the way, if the old ruffian had chanced to come whilst Dr Bridges was on duty!) Cobbett would do: but for Sir Walter, in Dr Parr's estimation, he was stark naught. One reason may be guessed at—the Queen;* there may have been others; but this was the main reason, and the reason of that particular year. Well; so far we can all allow for the Doctor's spite. Queen Caroline was gracious and confiding towards the Doctor, until, by some mysterious offence, he had incurred her heavy displeasure. It was natural that a person in Parr's rank should be grateful for her notice; and that a person of Parr's politics should befriend her cause. In that same degree, it was natural, perhaps, that he should dislike Sir Walter Scott, and look with jealousy upon his public influence, as pledged to the service of her enemies. Both were in this case party men, with the single difference in Sir Walter's favour, that he was of the right party; a fact that Dr Parr could not be expected to perceive. But was any extremity of party violence to be received as an apology for the Doctor's meanness and extravagant folly in treating so great a man (which uniformly he did) as a miserable pretender in literature? Not satisfied with simply lowering or depreciating his merits, Dr Parr spoke of him as an arrant charlatan and impostor.

Discussing Sir Walter's merits as a poet, there is room for wide difference of estimates. But he that can affect blindness to the brilliancy of his claims as a novelist, and generally to the extraordinary grace of his prose, must be incapacitated for the meanest functions of a critic, by original dulness of sensibility. Hear the monstrous verdict delivered by this ponderous mechanist of style, when adjudicating the quantum meruit of a writer who certainly has no rival among ancient or modern classics in the rare art of narrating with brilliancy and effect:—"Dr Parr's taste," says a certain Irish poet, a Rev. Mr Stewart, of whom or his works the reader probably now hears for the first time—"Dr Parr's taste was exquisite, his judgment infallible. One morning he sent for me to attend him in his library. I found him seated at one side of the fire, Mrs Parr leaning against the mantel on the opposite side, and a chair placed for me between them. 'Mrs Parr,' he began, 'you have seen Moore in this spot some time ago, you now see Mr Stewart!'—The race of true poets is now nearly extinct. There is you, (turning to me) and Moore, and Byron, and Crabbe, and Campbell—I hardly know of another.' " 'All these, observe, were Whigs!' " 'You, Stewart, are a man of genius, of real genius, and of science, too, as well as genius. I tell you so. It is here, it is here,' shaking his head, and sa-

* We are the last persons to apologise for that most profligate woman. That men of sense and honour could be found who seriously doubted of her guilt, is the strongest exemplification, to our minds, of the all-levelling strength of party rage that history records. As little are we likely to join the rare and weak assailants of Sir Walter Scott, whose conduct, politically, and as a public man, has been as upright and as generous as his conduct in private life. Yet in one single instance, Sir Walter departed from his usual chivalry of feeling, and most unreasonably aimed in insulting a woman—disolute, it is true, beyond example, but at that time fallen, and on that very morning reaping the bitter fruit of her enormous guilt. Describing the morning of the Coronation, and the memorable repulse of the poor misguided Queen, Sir Walter allowed himself to speak of her as the girl at Lothly with her body-guard of blackguards. These words we doubt not that Sir Walter smelt, and often, and earnestly deplored; for the anguish of her mortification, by the testimony of all who witnessed the tumultuous succession of passions that shook her, and convulsed her features, as she argued the point with the officer at the entrance of Westminster Hall, was intense; and those pitied her then who never pitied her before. There were also other reasons that must have drawn a generous regret from Sir Walter, upon remembering these words afterwards. But we all know that it was not in his nature to insult over the fallen, or to sympathise with triumphant power. In fact, he could not foresee her near approaching death; and he was reasonably disgusted with her violence at the moment; and finally, the words escaped him under circumstances of hurry, which allowed no time for revision. Few blame the writers who have so little to blot at this wonderful man.

gaciously touching his forehead with his finger. 'I tell you again, it is here. As to Walter Scott, his jingle will not outlive the next century. It is namby-pamby.'" Dr Parr is here made to speak of Sir Walter merely as a poet; but for the same person, in any other character, he had no higher praise in reserve. In the heroic and chivalrous spirit of the poetry of Sir Walter, we pardon the Doctor for taking little interest. But what must be the condition of sense and feeling in that writer, who, without participating probably in the Doctor's delusions, could yet so complacently report to the world a body of extravagances, which terminated in exalting himself, an author unknown to the public, conspicuously above one of the most illustrious writers of any age! Dr Parr might perhaps plead the privilege of his fire-side, kindness for a young friend, and a sudden call upon him for some audacity to give effect and powerful expression to his praise, as the apology for his share in such absurdities; but Mr Stewart, by recording them in print, makes himself a deliberate party, under no apology or temptation whatsoever, to the whole injustice and puerility of the scene.

Mr Bentham, Dr Parr, and Mr Douglas of Glasgow, are probably the three men in Europe, who have found Sir Walter Scott a triller. Literature, in fact, and the fine arts, hold but a low rank in the estimate of the modern Utilitarian republicans. All that is not tangible, measurable, ponderable, falls with them into the account of mere levities, and is classed with the most frivolous decorations of life: to be an exquisite narrator is tantamount to dressing well; a fine prose style is about equal to a splendid equipage; and a finished work of art is a showy piece of upholstery. In this vulgarity of sentiment, Dr Parr could not entirely accompany his coarsest friends; for he drew largely on their indulgence himself as a trespasser in the very worst form—he was guilty of writing Latin with fluency and striking effect. It is certain, however, that the modern school of reformers had an injurious effect upon Dr Parr's literary character, by drawing out and strengthening its hardest features. His politics became harsher, and his intellectual sensibilities coarser, as he advanced in years. How closely he connected himself with these people, we shall shew in the sketch we propose to give of his political history. For the present we turn with pleasure to his more elegant, though sometimes not less violent, friends, amongst the old-established Whig leaders. These, in their very intemperances, maintained the tone, breeding, and cultivation of gentlemen. They cherished and esteemed all parts of elegant letters: and, however much they have been in the habit of shocking our patriotism or constitutional principles, seldom offered annoyance to our tastes, as scholars and men of letters.

Foremost amongst these, as foremost in politics, stood Charles Fox. His letters in this collection are uniformly in the unpretending manner which he courted: what we have too generally to regret—is the absence of Dr Parr's answers, especially to those letters of Mr Fox or his friends, which communicated his jeux d'esprit in Greek verse. One of these we shall notice. Meantime, as perhaps the most interesting passage in the whole collection of Dr Parr's correspondence, we shall make the following extract from a letter, in which Mr Fox states the final state of his feelings with regard to Edmund Burke: "The immediate occasion was a plan, at that moment agitated, for raising a monument to his memory. The date of this memorable letter is Feb. 24, 1802:—

"Mackintosh wrote to me upon the subject you mention; and I think he took my answer rather more favourably than he was strictly warranted to do. When he said I would second the proposition, I told him support was my word.

"The truth is, though I do not feel any malice against Burke, nor would I have, in any degree thwarted any plan for his advantage or honour: though I feel the greatest gratitude for his continued kindness to me during so great a part of our lives, and a strong conviction that I owe to his friendship and conversation, a very great portion of whatever either of political or oratorical merit my friends suppose me to have displayed; notwithstanding all this, I must own, that there are some parts of his conduct that I cannot forgive so entirely as perhaps I ought, and as I wish to do.

"His public conduct may have arisen from mistaken motives of right, carried to a length to which none but persons of his ardent imagination would have pursued them. But the letter to the Duke of Portland and Lord Fitzwilliam, with the worst possible opinion of me, is what I never can think of without sensations which are as little habitual to me as to most men. To attempt to destroy me in the opinion of those whom I so much value, and in particular that of Fitzwilliam, with whom I had lived in the strictest friendship from our infancy; to attempt it too, at a time and in a way which made it almost certain that they would not state the accusation to me, and consequently, that I should have no opportunity to defend myself—this was surely not only malice, but baseness in the extreme; and if I were to say that I have quite forgiven it, it would be boasting a magnanimity which I cannot feel.

"In these circumstances, therefore, I think that, even not opposing, much more supporting, any motion made in honour of his memory as an individual amongst the rest, without putting myself forward as a mover or seconder, is all that can be expected or desired of me by those who are not admirers of hypocrisy. I shall have great pleasure, however, in seeing your plan for an epitaph for him, and will tell you freely my opinion of it, both in general and in the detail. He was certainly a great man, and had very many good as well as great qualities; but his motto seems the very reverse of parvis deus; and, when his mind had got hold of an object, his whole judgment, as to prudent or imprudent, unbecoming or indecent, nay, right or wrong, was perverted when that object was in question. What Quintilian says of Ovid, 'Si ingenio temperare quam indulgere maluisset,' was eminently applicable to him, even with respect to his passions. 'Si animi sui affectibus temperare quam indulgere maluisset quid xir iste præstare non potuerit?' would be my short character of him. By the way, I do not know that affectibus is the right word; but I know no other."

Monstrous as we must consider this view of Mr Burke's conduct, which, under every provocation from the underlings of Mr Fox's party, continued irreproachably honourable towards those whom he had been compelled (and whom others had been compelled) to abandon,—still, under the perverse prejudices which had possession of Mr Fox, we must allow his temper and his conduct, as here stated by himself, to have been sincere, manly, and liberal. That he did not speak with more fervour of admiration, in summing up the claims of a man so immeasurably beyond his contemporaries in the fineness and compass of his understanding, is not to be imputed to jealousy of his powers, or to the smothered resentments which Mr Fox acknowledges—but entirely to the extreme plainness, simplicity, and almost homely character of his own mind, which laboured under a specific natural inaptitude for appreciating an intellect so complex, subtle, and elaborate, as that of Burke.

We see how readily he clings to the slang notion of Burke's "unquenchable" as explaining the differences between them; and how resolutely he mistakes, for an original tendency to the violence of extremes, what in fact was the mere breadth and determinateness of principle which the extremity of that crisis exacted from a mind of unusual energy. Charles Fox had one sole grandeur, one originality, in his whole composition, and that was the fervour, the intensity, the contagious vehemence of his manner. He could not endure his own speeches when stripped of the advantage they had in a tumultuous and self-kindling delivery. "I have always hated the thought," says he to Dr Parr, "of any of my speeches being published." Why was that? Simply because in the mere matter, he could not but feel himself, that there was nothing to ensure attention, nothing that could give a characteristic or memorable expression to the whole. The thoughts were every body's thoughts: Mr Burke's, on the other hand, were so peculiarly his own, that they might have been sworn to as private property in any court of law.

How was Dr Parr affected by the great schism in politics, the greatest which ever hinged upon pure difference of abstract principle? A schism which was fatal to the unity of the Whig Club, could not but impress new determinations on the political bias, conduct, and language of every Whig partisan. At the time of the Bellenden Preface, it was a matter of course to praise Burke; he was then the ally of Fox, and the glory of the Whigs. But what tone of sentiment did Dr Parr maintain towards this great man after he had become an alien to the revolutionary cause which he himself continued to patronise, and the party whom he continued to serve? For previously to that change his homage was equivocal. It might be to the man, or it might be to his position.

There are many ways of arriving at a decision: in letters, in tracts, (Letter on Fox's James II.) and in recorded conversations, Dr Parr's sincere opinions on this question (a question as comprehensive as any personal question ever can have been) were repeatedly obtained. He wrote, besides, an inscription for Burke's public monument; and this, which (in common with all his epitaphs) was anxiously weighed and meditated in every syllable, happens to have been the most felicitous in the opinion of himself and his friends of all which he executed. What was its prevailing tone? "I remember," says Parr himself, writing to Lord Holland, "one or two of Mr Burke's admirers said to me that it was cold; and I answered, that I had indeed been successful; for as I really did not feel warmth, I had not attempted to express it." Perhaps in these words, Dr Parr, with a courtier's consideration of the person whom he was addressing, has done some injustice to himself. Enough remains on record, both in the epitaph and elsewhere, to shew that he had not indeed attained to a steady consciousness of Burke's characteristic merits; but it is manifest that he struggled with a reluctant instinct of submission to the boldest of his views, and fought up against a blind sense of his authority as greater than on many accounts it pleased him or suited him to admit.

Even in this personal accident, as it may seem, taken in connexion with the fetters of party, lay a snare to the sobriety of Parr's understanding. The French Revolution, with him as with multitudes beside, unhinged the sanity of his moral judgments. Left to the natural influences of things, he, like many of his political friends, might have recovered a steady equilibrium of mind upon this great event, and "all which it inherited." He might have written to others, as Lady Oxford, (once the most violent of democrats,) sickened by sad experience of continental frenzies, had occasion to write to him—"Of Burke's writings and principles I am now a very great admirer; he was a great lover of practical liberty. In my days of darkness, prejudice, and folly, I never read a line of Burke; but I am now, thank heaven, in a state of regeneration." Obstinacy, and (except by occasional starts) allegiance to his party, made this noble confession of error impossible to Dr Parr. And the intellectual results to one who lived chiefly in the atmosphere of politics, and drew his whole animation from the fluctuations of public questions, were entirely mischievous. To those who abided by the necessities of error, which grew upon a systematic opposition to Mr Burke, the French revolution had destroyed all the landmarks of constitutional distinctions, and impressed a character of indeterminate meaning upon ancient political principles. From that time forward, it will be seen, by those who will take the trouble to examine, that Dr Parr, struggling (as many others did) between the obscure convictions of his conscience, and the demands of his party, or his personal situation, maintained no uniform opinions at all; gave his faith and his hopes by turns to every vagrant adventurer, foreign or domestic, military scourge, or political reformer, whom the disjointed times brought forward; and was consistent in nothing but in those petty speculations of philology, which, growing out of his professional pursuits, served at last no end so useful as that of relieving the asperities of his political life.

A PROLUSION,

IN THREE CHAPTERS.

BY CHRISTOPHER NORTH.

CHAPTER I.

THE great object of Mr Malthus's celebrated Essay on the Principle of Population, is, as he himself has told us, almost, we believe, in the words we are now using, to examine the effects of one cause intimately united with the very nature of man,—one cause that has hitherto impeded the progress of mankind towards happiness—to wit, the constant tendency in all animated life to increase beyond the nourishment prepared for it. That population has this constant tendency to increase beyond the means of subsistence, and that it is kept to its necessary level by some or other of the various forms of misery, or the fear of misery, sufficiently appears, he thinks, from a review of the different states of society in which man has existed. It may, he thinks, be safely pronounced, that population, when unchecked, goes on doubling itself every twenty-five years, or increases in a geometrical ratio; and he thinks that it may be fairly pronounced, that, considering the present average state of the earth, the means of subsistence, under circumstances the most favourable to human industry, could not possibly be made to increase faster than in an arithmetical ratio. The checks which repress this prodigiously superior power of population, and put its effects on a level with the means of subsistence, are, according to him, all resolvable into moral restraint, vice, and misery. To shew this, then, is, as we said, the object of his Essay—which necessarily takes a wide and various historical view of the conditions of human nature in many countries, and at many eras—and necessarily comprehends many enquiries into the operation of other causes to which that condition, happy or miserable, had been erroneously ascribed.

The Principle of Population was laid down so clearly, that he who ran might read; the illustrations Mr Malthus collected of it from historical and statistical works, and from books of voyages and travels, were striking and impressive; the order and arrangement of his materials were free from confusion, and his style clear, animated, and eloquent, so that the work speedily attracted notice, and Mr Malthus all at once acquired the reputation of original genius, and became founder and head of a School.

But though adopted by many zealous, and, as they have always chosen to call themselves, scientific disciples, this doctrine of a supposed great Master in Political Economy, revolted not only the feelings, but the reason, of men who studied the nature and condition of their own race in the schools of common humanity; and was thought by them irreconcilable with much of what they humbly believed it had been permitted them to know of the attributes and providence of God.

Accordingly, many answers to the Essay, from time to time, appeared—written by men of very various powers—some good, some bad, and some indifferent—but, we confess, all more or less unsatisfactory, and leaving Mr Malthus intrenched behind the position he had so skillfully and laboriously taken up, and which his devoted followers continued to affirm he maintained against all such assaults, in a state, not only of security, but triumph.

But though the opponents to whom we have now alluded, cannot be said to have severely shaken the Principle of his Essay, they forced him to modify it; and Mr Malthus, who in the first edition of his work, we believe, did not mention moral restraint as a check at all, in subsequent editions attributed to it more and more power; and at last allowed that it was always the more and more operative as society advanced in civilisation—when the checks of vice and misery were less brought into play. It appears, therefore, that Mr Malthus was not deaf to the outcry Nature herself may be said to have raised against his doctrine as it was first promulgated; and that it assumed a shape and character less painful and revolting—though even with that important modification, most melancholy and humiliating still—and hanging like a dead-weight on the hopes of all who hoped highly of the future happiness and virtue of man.

* The Law of Population, a Treatise, in Six Books, by Michael Thomas Sadler, M. P. London: John Murray, 1830.—Edinburgh Review, No. CII. Refutation of an Article in the Edinburgh Review, No. CII. by M. T. Sadler, Esq. M. P. London: John Murray.

For many years, however, the Malthusians were even more intolerant than their master of all objections to the creed of the only true faith. He answered his opponents, generally, though not always, with temper and moderation—for Mr Malthus is an amiable man; but many of his followers shewed a bad spirit—a spirit of contumely and contempt towards all who ventured to dispute or deny a single dogma of the School; and as if nature had endowed them exclusively with faculties capable of understanding the principle of population—hooted and yelled at every man who called it in question, and impugned it by reasoning, or by facts. A revelation had been made to them alone of the Great Truth—they alone had been initiated into the mysteries of the Faith—and in the pride of their philosophy, they shewed themselves the worst of bigots and fanatics.

Some of them, too, would not even suffer the modifications of the Law made by Mr Malthus himself; and pushed it to consequences—and to the recommendation of unhallowed practices, from the horrid whisper of which his kinder, and purer, and higher nature instinctively recoiled with abhorrence. We have seen in bad Latin, schemes proposed to thwart the principle of population, which, as they were disgraceful and disgusting to manhood, it was satisfactory to know originated out of the pale of humanity—measures which, as they were addressed, we believe, so could they only have had any temptation, to a tailor. Others, again, who did not directly recommend men to become monkeys or monsters, aimed abuse—in words to us unintelligible—against marriage. Thus one Oracle delivers this dark and dubious response to the kneelers at the inner shrine—“Legislation can sometimes produce considerable effects by its indirect operation; as when a desire, which gratifies itself in a hurtful course of action, (which seems, in the instance of these suppliants, to mean marriage,) and cannot easily be counteracted by reward and punishment, is drawn to gratify itself in a less hurtful or innocent direction.” Response second—“The progress of legislation, the improvement of the education of the people, and the decay of superstition, will in time, it is hoped, accomplish the difficult task of reconciling those important objects.” In these oracular responses, who may expound the meaning of the words “innocent direction” and “superstition?”

In all this horror of the pure “waters of life,” which domestic enjoyments have been always esteemed—thus preying on the very vitals of some irrational and disgusting wretches, and disturbing the reason even of such intellectual persons, and blameless in their practical ethics as the authoritative writer whom we have ventured to call an Oracle, the People of England,—for really in Scotland we do not seem ever to have cared, or indeed to have known, much about the anti-populationists,—saw the hydrophobias, in its most hideous and loathsome shape: and, though little afraid of being bitten by the rabid animals running fast and loose in all directions, not only along High-ways but By-ways, they issued what may be called a national edict, or decree, to send the monks to Coventry, a town of which it is not easy to ascertain the latitude, and there most of them at present abide. That is often sound and salutary advice, which counsels young persons not to marry and beget children, till they see a reasonable prospect of providing for them—and it is too often set at naught;

but we cannot help thinking that such advice had many million times been taken as well as rejected before the stars of Malthus, Mill, or M'Culloch rose on a benighted world—

—“with fear of change
Perplexing workmen.”

Men are not naturally the brute beasts these writers have insantly represented them to be. They do not propagate more pecudum; and Mr Malthus let some expressions escape him on that subject, of which he afterwards gave us reason to know he was both ashamed and sorry—as well he might be as a Christian clergyman. That egregious wisacre, Ex-Professor Senior, seems to have lately felt this—and, with all the pomposity and pedantry of the school and the schools, has dedicated some pages of a lecture to prove that human beings have reason as well as passions. When it is a duty to marry, and what are the duties of marriage, Nature herself dictates; nor have there ever been wanting in this long-enlightened land, moral and religious teachers to expound such duties, not out of such books as these pragmatistical coxcombs and Cockney political economists have produced or studied, but out of a book which few of them know much about, and many of them nothing—The Bible.

With regard, again, to that mighty class, which we have higher authority than that of the political economists for believing never shall cease out of the land, the Poor, the deductions drawn from the Malthusian law of population were impious as cruel, and just, generous, humane, and Christian England scorned the creed, of which it is a leading article, that they who may be dying of hunger have no right to life; that they had forfeited it by imprudent marriage and wicked propagation—therefore, let them die of starvation, they and their misbegotten brats—while the monks, seeking the gratification of their desires in some more “innocent direction,” and unenslaved to “superstition,” laughed and grew fat, and sent Hymen and Lucina to the dogs.

But mark now how inconsistent and unstable is even speculative vice. Why, not from any “compunctious visitings of nature” to which their hearts were shut, but from light let in upon their darkened understandings by one who owned no communion with their faith, they all at once began eating in their own words, and their own principles, and recommending the introduction of Poor Laws—some kind of modification of the English Poor Laws—these fatal stimulants to propagation—into Ireland! An enlightened Christian philosopher in the Quarterly Review, while he exposed with a masterly hand the pernicious abuses—and above all, one abuse—that had vitiated the English Poor Laws by changing their very spirit—at the same time proved that there were causes existing in the rural economy of England, which had not only prevented the English Poor Laws, as long as they were not abused, from unduly increasing the population, but had absolutely made them productive of an opposite effect; and then, the economists, as we have said, first drew in their horns, and then pushed them out in right angles to their numskulls towards another “air,” taking care, however, not to say a single syllable about the quarter from which they had derived the new light, but impudently and dishonestly claiming it as a revelation made to the world from the cloudy shrine of their own understandings.

Thus Mr M'Culloch, when examined before a Committee of the House of Commons on the state of Ireland, pompously gives a list of the statistical authorities on which he had seen reason to modify his former opinions on this question—whereas he had been taught or rather forced to give them up, by the irresistible logic and facts of the admirable writer in the Quarterly Review, to whose existence even he had not the common honesty to allude before the Committee. Now, we could point out a passage, had we time to tumble over some musty numbers of a Review with which he is probably familiar, written, if not by himself, by one of his brethren, in which it is averred that he who would recommend the introduction into Ireland of any modification whatever of the English poor-laws, would be fitter for a cell in Bedlam than a seat in the House of Commons. Let the cell in Bedlam, therefore, be prepared; and let it be roomy enough for more than one Economist to sleep on the same straw.

But it may be said, that here there has been no relinquishment of principle, and perhaps, in one sense, which we shall leave to the reader's sagacity, neither there has; but "plusquam civilia bella" are now raging in the camp of the enemy, ay, even in the Political Economists' Club. The same persons who once thought themselves divinely inspired,—that is, by the God of their own Idolatry, whose image on earth has feet of clay and face of brass, the composition of the body being nondescript, though, in the coinage of their own brain, they believe it to be of gold,—have, for a considerable time, been at sixes and sevens, nay, after calling each other no very decorous names, they have gone to loggerheads, and that, too, about the very axioms, and definitions, and first principles of their science. Mr Malthus, in a small volume, in which he twits several of his brethren, tells Mr McCulloch, among other pieces of useful information, that he does not know what is capital, and what is not; and Mr McCulloch, tells Mr Malthus, in the Scotsman, that he does not know what is productive and what is unproductive labour, and scoffs at him as little better than a quack, a mere empiric. But it was reserved for Mr Senior to exhibit the most astounding contradictions between his own opinions, recorded in one and the same lecture, and so to explain his understanding of the law of population laid down in the celebrated Essay, as to shew us that he believes in a law of population diametrically opposite to that with which Mr Malthus has so long been deluding, not only the Political Economists' Club, but a somewhat wider sphere—the whole world.

Mr Senior's Two Lectures on Population, and the correspondence between him and Mr Malthus, in which these most marvellous inconsistencies, contradictions, misconceptions, and every imaginable blundering and blindness appear, are well worthy the attention of the curious: and we beg to be allowed to point out a gem or two in the coronets which these two most self-complacent philosophers have mutually wreathed round each other's foreheads, on which, if the organ of causality—(should it be well developed—then that of conscientiousness)—be bigger than a pea, we relinquish our faith in Phrenology.

Mr Senior had, in his Introductory Lecture—not now before us—said, "That the population of a given district is limited only by moral or physical evil—or by deficiency in the means of obtaining those articles of wealth, or, in other words, those necessities, decencies, and luxuries, which the habits of the individuals of each class of the inhabitants of that district lead them to require." After meditating on this wise saw, he says, "That the only modification subsequent reflection induces me to apply to this proposition, is to substitute for the word 'deficiency,' the words, 'the apprehension of deficiency.' My reasons for this substitution are: first, that the actual deficiency of necessities is a part of physical evil; and, secondly, that it is not the existence of a deficiency, but the fear of its existence, which is the principal check to population, so far as necessities are concerned, and the sole check as respects decencies and luxuries."

Now, we request the reader to pay particular attention to this amended statement of the learned ex-Professor's creed—and then to pay particular attention to the illustrations he gives of it, drawn from the condition of our own country, as well as others—and then to judge, first, whether the ex-Professor understands himself; and, secondly, whether his doctrine and that of Mr Malthus differ but in words—by a mere verbal distinction—that is, a distinction without a difference—as the two clear-headed and self-complacent members of the Club, at the close of their correspondence, smirkingly declare, bowing and kissing their hands to each other with much suavity, cordiality, and respect; while the truth is, that they stand before the public—let us speak plainly—a brace of not only confounded, but self-convicted blunderers.

Let us see, then, what Mr Senior says of these checks. In page 22 of his First Lecture—the concluding page—he says, “There is not an evil, moral or physical, which has not a tendency directly or indirectly to shorten life, but there are many which have a direct tendency to increase fecundity.” Perhaps there may be—but he has not had the kindness to tell us what are the evils, moral or physical, which possess this direct tendency to increase fecundity. Let this, however, pass for the present—and we request Mr Senior to reconcile with the assertion, that there is “not an evil, moral or physical, which has not a tendency to shorten life,” with the following assertion in Lecture II., page 25—“We shall scarcely, therefore, be led into error, if, in considering the preventive checks, we confine our attention to prudence, and assume that as nothing but physical evil diminishes the longevity of mankind,” &c.!!!

What rapid and long studies must the science of Political Economy lately have made in Oxford under such a teacher!

But this is but a joke to what follows. The object of the Second Lecture is, to consider the “preventive checks.” The first is “promiscuous intercourse;” and Mr Senior says, that, with such exceptions as the higher classes of society in Otaheite and other of the South-sea Islands, and the West Indian negroes—on which he lays little stress—there are scarcely any females whose fecundity is prevented or diminished by promiscuous intercourse. He of course excludes those unhappy wretches whose trade is prostitution—and they constitute so small a proportion of the population of the whole world, that the check on population occasioned by their unfruitfulness may, he says, safely be disregarded.

The other preventive check is “abstinence from marriage.” “You are, of course, aware,” says Mr Senior to his pupils, “that by the word ‘marriage,’ I mean to express not the peculiar and permanent union which alone, in a Christian country, is entitled to that name; but any agreement between a man and a woman to cohabit exclusively for a period, and under circumstances likely to occasion the birth of progeny.” How the Professor’s young pupils should be aware of this extension of the meaning of the word marriage, we do not exactly see—surely their mothers had not taught it to them. Would not the Professor be more easily understood if he had said,—“abstinence from ‘sexual intercourse?’” But let that, too, pass. The Professor says, that the number of persons situated so as to be deterred from “marriage,” by the only causes likely to deter them, an apprehension of a deficiency of necessaries, decencies, or luxuries, is “so small, that they make an exception which would scarcely deserve attention, even if this conduct were as common among them as it is in fact rare.”

The check from an apprehended deficiency of the “luxuries is but slight,” says Mr Senior; and the reason he gives is oddly expressed: For “the motives, perhaps I might say, the instincts, that prompt the human race to marriage, are too powerful to be much restrained by the fear of losing conveniences,” &c. Passing that too, however, his belief, we see, is that the higher classes are almost without check. He goes on to say, that “the fear of losing decencies, or perhaps, more frequently, the hope to acquire, by a larger accumulation, during celibacy, the means of purchasing the decencies of a higher social rank, is of more importance.” The middling classes, therefore, may be subject to some check—not a very powerful one, it would seem, from the Professor’s language, as it is said by him, but to be “of far more importance” than another which is so slight as to be no check at all.

With regard to the poor, again, he says, that “want of actual necessaries is seldom apprehended by any except the poorest classes in any country; and in England, though it sometimes is felt, it probably is anticipated by none.” According, then, to Mr Senior, the poorest, which is by much the most numerous class, is freed from the prudential check. So stands the Professor’s account; yet has he told us, that the preventive check (confining by himself to prudence) is twice as strong here as in America, though only half as strong as in Switzerland. How that can be, he will pardon our blindness for not being able to see, since here “it is anticipated by none;” and how nothing can be the half of one something, and double of another, seems to be an enigma, set not by a Senior, but a Sphinx.

Has Mr Senior explained more clearly and consistently what are called the Positive Checks? We fear not. Having said (Lecture I.) that they include all the causes which lead, in any way, prematurely to shorten the duration of life, and enumerated among them "plague, famine, and large towns," he tells us, with oracular brevity, that these "are the result of moral evil." Are all physical evils the result of moral evil? A colic, caused by a too greedy and gluttonous revel in a gooseberry-bush of the small red hairy sort, might, no doubt, by a severe moralist, be given as a melancholy example of physical evil, the result of moral evil. But would he not be going a step too far, were he to affirm, that, to his certain knowledge, the Cholera Morbus, which has lately come across the Caucasus from Persia to St Petersburg, was the result of moral evil in the subjects of the Khan or the Czar? At all events, putting plague and famine aside, it does sound odd to our ears, to say that "large towns" are the "result of moral evil," though unfortunately they are too often its cause.

Mr Senior then tells us, that the want of the necessities of life is the principal and obvious check in the lowest savage state—but that, in "a high state of civilisation, it is almost imperceptible. But it is unperceived only in consequence of its substitutes!" What does he mean? Is the check there—or is it not? If he means to say it is, then he contradicts himself; for we have seen that he believes, and prides himself on the discovery, that, in civilized countries, the rate of the increase of food is generally greater than that of population. But was there ever such vague expression employed before by a lecturer on one of what he has called the Moral Sciences? It is not easy to conjecture how a thing, if it exists, should be unperceived "in consequence of its substitutes." They might prevent its existence, but never could prevent its being perceived. Were a man, who had been drawn for the militia, to procure a substitute, why, no doubt, in consequence of that substitute, he would be "unperceived" in the ranks of the Saucy Suffolk, or the Devon Dons; but the prime reason why he was "unperceived," it seems to our simple minds, would be, that the worthy, though not heroic individual was not within the range of vision, but snugly seated at home among his wife and children, at beans and bacon.

Mr Senior thus continues:—"If all other moral and physical checks could be got rid of,—if we had neither wars nor libertinism, if our institutions, and employments, and habits were all wholesome, and no fear of indigence, or loss of station, prevented or retarded our marriages, famine would soon exercise her prerogative of controlling in the last resort, the multiplication of mankind. But though it be certain that the absence of all other checks could only give room for the irresistible influence of famine, it is equally certain that such a state of things never has existed, and never will exist. In the first place, the absence of all the other moral and physical evils which retard population, implies a degree of civilisation not only high, but higher than mankind have as yet enjoyed. Such a society cannot be supposed to want sagacity sufficient to foresee the evils of a too rapidly increasing population," &c. "And, secondly, it is impossible that a positive check so galling and remorseless as Famine should prevail without bringing in her train all the others. Pestilence is her uniform companion, and Murder and War are her followers."

Nothing can exceed the confusion of ideas huddled together in the two or three pages of the Lecture over which these saws are sown or sprinkled among stony places. First, we are instructed that the absence of all the preventive checks, according to the new jargon, will produce the positive check—famine. But then we are consoled by the assurance, that this state of things never has existed, and never will exist. Now mark the reason why such a state of things never has or will exist. First, because civilisation will have the effect of preventing wars, and will teach men the wisdom not to involve themselves in the endearing, but, according to the Economists, pernicious connexions of husbands and fathers. Civilisation has never hitherto been found to prevent wars; and as to unwholesome employments, it almost of necessity promotes them; neither is libertinism peculiarly disconnected with civilisation. So much for the first cause which is to prevent the operation of the positive check famine. But, secondly, quoth Mr Senior, famine is to prevent itself, by producing the evils which follow "in its train!" And he adds profoundly, "where there is a diversity of fortunes, famine generally produces that worst form of civil war, the insurrection of the poor against the rich?" Will this philosopher please to inform us what country has ever existed without a "diversity of fortunes" among the inhabitants? Are all countries then ravaged by that worst of civil war, the insurrection of the poor against the rich?

Mr Senior thus continues—"Among nations imperfectly civilized, the widest and most wasting of the positive checks is predatory war. A district exposed to it must suffer in their full force all the others. There, fear of invasion must keep them pent up in crowded, and consequently unwholesome towns." "This is the check which has kept the whole of Africa, the western part of Asia, and the southern districts of America, in their comparatively unpeopled state." "Unwholesome towns!!!" As is forcibly exemplified, we presume, by the Germans and Scandinavians of old; and more recently by the Arabs, the predatory tribes of North America, and Pindarees of India, who are all so well known to have lived, and still to live, in "crowded towns!" We should like to see a Census of the Population of the "crowded towns" of Africa, Arabia, and the Pampas.

Mr Senior, in proof of his saws and his see-saws, quotes Bruce. Bruce, it seems, passed a night at Garigara, a village, of which the crops had been destroyed, and the inhabitants starved; he calls it "the miserable village of Garigara." And Mr Senior quotes that in proof of a population being, by the fear of invasion, pent up "in crowded, and consequently unwholesome towns!"

Finally, Mr Senior says, "the remainder of the positive checks, such as infanticide, and unwholesomeness of climate, habit, or situation, appear rather to act as substitutes for the preventive checks, than to produce any actual diminution, or prevent any actual increase." Infanticide, &c. act as substitutes for preventive checks; and yet they produce no actual diminution, nor prevent actual increase! Now, we always thought, that, according to the philosophers, the merit of the preventive checks was, that they did prevent actual increase. How then does it happen that their substitutes produce no such effect? Such substitutes must be discharged—for they are unfit for the service.

It appears, then, that Mr Senior is rather muddled-minded; yet so far from disagreeing with what he has said—except the expression, which is lax and confused—and except the contradictions, which shew sad oversight—we agree with him perfectly respecting the non-existence or powerlessness of many of the said checks; while neither we, nor any one else, and certainly not Mr Senior, can agree with the unintelligible remarks he has drivelled about them. We are quite prepared to go along with him, in spite of his stupidity, when he says, with an air of conscious originality, that which thousands of rational people have said before he was born—"that not only a taste for additional comfort and convenience, but a feeling of degradation in their absence, becomes more and more widely diffused. The increase, in many respects, of the productive powers of labour, must enable increased comforts to be enjoyed by increased numbers; and as it is the more beneficial, so it appears to me to be the more natural course of events, that increased comforts should not only accompany, but rather precede, increase of numbers." Ah, true—but not truths observed by William Nassau Senior, any more than by Christopher North. He denies, therefore, and rightly, "that under wise institutions, there is any tendency" in population to press fatally on the means of subsistence—but believes, rightly, "the tendency to be just the reverse."

Well then, here comes the rub—what is Mr Malthus's doctrine? It is given very explicitly in the following words: "According to the principle of population, the human race has a tendency to increase faster than food. It has, therefore, a constant tendency to people a country fully up to the limits of subsistence; meaning by those limits, the lowest quantity of food which will maintain a stationary population."

Now place by the side of this passage our quotations from Mr Senior, and then read the correspondence of the two Professors, in which he of Oxford, with a gravity and suavity admirable but inimitable, assures his brother of Halesbury, that their doctrines perfectly coincide! "The means of subsistence have a greater tendency to increase than the population." "This is the case in every civilized country—even in Ireland!!!" So saith Mr Senior; and again, "If it be conceded that there exists in the human race a natural tendency to rise from barbarism to civilisation, and that the means of subsistence are proportionably more abundant in a civilized than in a savage state, and neither of these propositions can be denied, it must follow, that there is a natural tendency to increase in a greater ratio than population."

Compare all this, we say, with the passage quoted above from Mr Malthus—and how beautifully perfect the coincidence of the doctrines of the two learned Professors, who both assure us that they have discovered that theirs is but a "verbal dispute!!!"

But can you, any more than we, believe your eyes when you see, "oculis subjecta fidelibus," the following words in a letter from Mr Malthus to Mr Senior, kindly compromising the matter in question between them, and affably saying that it is but a "verbal dispute?" "The main part of the question with me, relates to the cause of the continued poverty and misery of the labouring classes of society in all old states. This surely cannot be attributed to the tendency of food to increase faster than population!!" Certainly not, Mr Malthus. People do not starve in the midst of plenty, and become more miserable as they are better fed. But how can you have the face to tell Mr Senior after this, that your doctrine and his is the same? The pensive Public frowns at such a barefaced attempt to impose upon her intuitive perception that black is not white, that yes is not no—that a tendency in food to increase faster than the mouths to eat it, is not a tendency in mouths that eat it to increase faster than food.

Mr Senior's doctrine, we verily believe, is the right one—and Mr Malthus's is the wrong one—yet Mr Senior has not the sense to hold fast his own doctrine, but allows himself to be cajoled out of it by the soft insinuations of the agreeable Anti-populationist. "I must have expressed myself ill, if I have led you to suppose that I assert any thing like an universal increase of the proportion of subsistence to population." And then he goes on to explain—though his explanation, very excellent truth in itself, is no explanation at all—that is, it is not, as Mr Senior in his melting mood supposes it, any modification or retraction of his former doctrine. How could it be—without making the entire Two Lectures worthless as waste paper—as unprinted whitey-brown? O Lord Byron's Heaven and Earth! had he not said, page 48 and 49—"That the means of subsistence have a greater tendency to increase than the population, is the case in every civilized country—even in Ireland"—the country which he and his school always speak of as swarming with life, though the truth is, by the way, that it is less populous than the greater part of Europe? If Mr Senior chooses to eat in these words—the most compendious method is to open his mouth, and swallow the whole Pamphlet.

Yes, he must indeed swallow the whole Pamphlet! For—O Lord Byron's Cain! only look at this. "There never has been a period of any considerable length, when premature mortality and vice, specifically arising from the pressure of population against food, has not prevailed to a considerable extent; nor, admitting the possibility, or even the probability, of these evils being diminished, is there any rational prospect of a near approach to their entire removal." So sayeth Mr Malthus in one of his letters—and Mr Senior, delighted to see this "near approach" to his own doctrine—after the apology quoted above for having expressed himself ill—sayeth, “if we look back through the history of the whole world, [a pretty wide look, by the by,] and compare the state of each country at distinct periods of two hundred or three hundred years, the cases in which food has increased during the preceding period of two hundred or three hundred years, in a greater ratio than population, will be found to be more numerous than those in which population has increased during the preceding period in a greater ratio than food!” And we say, “that if we look back through the history of the whole world,” we shall find no such instances of portentous folly as that which these two learned Professors have now exhibited, in thus gravely and solemnly informing themselves and mankind, the Political Economists’ Club, and the world, that should any future adventurer reach the North, he—as on y to turn abe and touch the South Pole.

After all this, it would be i present, to put it out, in Mr S Two Lectures of which the lead doctrine is nearly right, and very cient, the many other flagrant vitions of logic of which he has b guilty—he whose logic is so m admired by Mr Whalley, that t man, in his work on Logic, called in its ad to t settlement Definitions rendered by it of the sign at noonday.

On a precious sp me we cannot ose b Every addition with Mr t Lectu I, p. qu food t due skes, in general, a further ad more difficult. Every addition t the existing population diffuses under he means of still further addition.” In Lecture II, page 48, quoth Mr Senior, “If a single country can b found in which there is now less perty than is universal in a savage state it must be true that, under the circumstances in which that country is placed, the means of subsistence have a greater tendency to increase than the population.” But not only can a single country be found, but Mr Senior tells us—as we have seen—(Letter to Malthus, p. 74) —“that the cases in which food has increased in a greater ratio than population, will be found to be more numerous than those in which population has increased in a greater ratio than food!” Has not Mr Senior reason to be ashamed of himself for having laid down two propositions as both true—of which the truth of the one prevents the possibility of the truth of the other?

Mr Senior having thus “smoothed the raven down of Malthus till it smiled,” also tries to set right Mr Mill’s and Mr McCulloch’s opinions, which he thinks woefully wrong, on the Law of Population. Now Mr Mill’s are, beyond all doubt, those of Mr Malthus, driven unflinchingly, but legitimately, to extremest lengths; and Mr Malthus has himself passed the highest eulogium on Mr McCulloch’s exposition of the Principle of his Essay. Who, then, is right, and who is wrong? Who is Pretender, and who is King? Who is the Sir Astley Cooper—who the Mr St John Long?

Such being a slight sketch of the state in which the Science of Political Economy stands—which we observe Mr Senior calls (page 3) one of the “Moral Sciences”—with regard to the Law of Population, we turned for that reason, as well as many other feelings of the deepest interest to Mr Sadler’s Work. It is a Great Work. Three Volumes only pub (two being m consisting of 1 words of 1300 pag are divided to Four Books. In First, he sta the principles of the theory he opposes, that of Mr Malthus, together with something of its history, shewing that it is irreconcilable with itself in all its main positions, and especially with those checks which it announces as solely regulating the redundant numbers of mankind. Mr Sadler proves, that the ratios on which it is professedly built, are, when applied to the subject, fallacious in themselves, and ridiculous as connected with each other; that the direct checks, as they are termed, have never been necessary, or otherwise than injurious, in reference to the prosperity and happiness of the population of any community; that the wars of ancient Greece, or those waged upon the Roman empire, so constantly appealed to by the assertors of human superfecundity, originated not in excessive numbers; that the opinions of the ancient philosophers of Greece, particularly those of Plato and Aristotle, on the subject of population, have been either misunderstood or misrepresented; that the direct checks to population have diminished in their operation in every country as population has increased; and that, under the same circumstances, the influence of the preventive check has also constantly abated; that this check, the main prop of the system, is unnatural in itself, and its imposition, therefore, unlawful, wicked, and cruel; that as proposed to be enforced on the lower classes of society, it is in the utmost degree partial; that it would also be as impolitic as it is cruel and unjust, were it possible to enforce it; and lastly, that the defence put forth for the consequences it necessarily involves, is, whether considered in a political, religious, or moral point of view, utterly untenable. This Book contains twenty-three chapters.

Book Second is entitled, "Of the Theory of Human Superfecundity: its Principle, as founded upon the Population of the United States of America and of China, stated and disproved." The increase of population in the United States of America has long been appealed to, as the one triumphant demonstration of the geometric ratio so often advanced. In this section of his work, Mr Sadler shows that the data on which that demonstration is founded are utterly erroneous, both as it regards the number of inhabitants, at the period from which it dates its calculations, and the circumstances which have mainly contributed to its rapid increase. For Mr Sadler, in utter disproof of these supposed doublings, (in twelve, fifteen, twenty, or five-and-twenty years,) shews, from official records, that the population of the Colonies, at the period from which the terms of duplication are usually dated, was at least five times as large as computed by Mr Townsend, Mr Malthus, and others; that neither in the New England provinces, constantly appealed to, nor in the United States generally, has the doubling, so often assumed, nor any geometric duplication at stated intervals, ever taken place; and that the real increase of the inhabitants of America has, at all periods, been greatly accelerated by emigration. That this emigration has been immense, from the earliest period of American colonization to the date of the last census, Mr Sadler shews, first, by a series of direct historical proofs, extending through the whole interval; secondly, by its effects on the manners, customs, and language of the different states, as described by American writers, and attributed by them to that sole cause; thirdly, by sundry statistical documents of various kinds, all demonstrating the same fact; fourthly, by the very censuses of the United States, which, it is proved, could not otherwise contain the facts which they exhibit, especially those striking deviations from the laws of nature, regarding the proportion of the sexes, and the rate of mortality, which they manifest throughout. The great effect which a certain, and relatively small, number of adults, proceeding to a community and marrying there, naturally has upon its increase, is computed; and, in conclusion, it is calculated, even on the admission of those who have confidently pronounced Emigration to be "immaterial," that its effect, according to their own admission, would account for the greater part of the entire increase that has taken place in that country.

Respecting China—the empire in which we have been long instructed to believe that the Principle of Population has finally produced those evils which are asserted to be its inevitable consequence—the fallacies put forth as to the number of its inhabitants, and their condition, are fully exposed, and the deductions of the anti-populationists consequently overturned. This Book consists of eighteen chapters.

In the Third Book, the numerous fundamental errors in those calculations on which the system has chiefly relied is exhibited, and a series of mistakes exposed, which Mr Sadler says he believes have been but rarely paralleled, at least in works professedly scientific, and, in his opinion, fatal to the whole theory. The fundamental error of Mr Malthus, that the number of marriages is regulated by the number of deaths, and in a direct, if not indeed exact, proportion to them, is disproved by a series of tables, relating to the several countries where the necessary facts have been collected; and especially by those respecting England, which, during the last forty years, have been given annually in the Censuses. It is afterwards shewn also, by other tables, that periods of comparative scarcity are constantly those of greater, and not, as asserted, of less prolificness. And proofs are given, derived both from the lower and elevated classes of society, that the preventive check, as far as the postponement of marriages, to the utmost extent which the advocates of such an expedient dare propose, would not have the effect they contemplate, but the contrary one—as such a postponement, were it possible, would increase the number of the births, and diminish the proportion of the deaths, of the children resulting from the marriages so postponed. It consists of eighteen chapters.

The Fourth Book is devoted to the development and demonstration of an essentially different Principle of Population, established by references to every national register of human existence which has hitherto been published in any part of the world, and are in perfect unison with the nature, interests, and duties of mankind, under all possible circumstances of society. To this is added a Dissertation on the Balance of Food and Numbers throughout animated nature, which still farther illustrates and extends the Principle of Reproduction in human beings, as enunciated and proved throughout the Treatise. Of this Dissertation we gave an account some time ago—accompanied with many long extracts, in which there breathed the finest spirit of religion and philosophy, and of which the eloquence is equal to that of any prose composition of our age. None of our readers can have forgotten them—none, we are sure, will dissent from our judgment of their merits. The Fourth Book consists of twenty-four chapters.

The Treatise will be concluded by two other books—Fifth and Sixth—not yet published. The Fifth will comprise an examination of different countries of the world, in reference to the principles at issue; and in which it will be shewn, contrary to the position maintained in the prevailing theory, that as the population of each has increased, the general prosperity has been still more advanced, and that a corresponding improvement has taken place in regard to the moral and intellectual character of the species. It will also be shewn that no country upon earth contains at present any thing approaching to the number of inhabitants for which nature has evidently contemplated to provide. The last Book will consist chiefly of deductions from the Law of Population thus established, touching the rights, interests, and duties of mankind; wherein will be discussed several important principles of Political Philosophy, in reference, especially, to our own country. In conclusion, a view will be taken of the future progress and improvement of society, as suggested by the preceding principles, and which reason and religion warrant us in anticipating.

We have adopted the simplest way of letting our readers know the aim of Mr Sadler, in his great—his stupendous Work; for it is no less, whether we consider the vast range of his enquiries, or the consummate talent by which they are all conducted. To review such a Work, to any purpose, would require many long articles—many more, we fear, than we may be able to find room for, according to the plan and character of this Magazine. Yet, most assuredly, we shall do all we can to make our readers acquainted with its leading principles, and with some of the many thousand proofs by which they are established. Not now, however; at present we have an easier task—to vindicate this noble Work from one of the basest attacks ever made by ignorance and folly on learning and wisdom. But before coming to the cattiff, a few words of Mr Sadler, and of the conduct towards him of some other critics of a better kind—critics to whose talents and integrity, though we differ from them in many, perhaps most, great political questions, we have never withheld our testimony.

The great abilities of this remarkable man were known to us, and to thousands, before he entered Parliament. There he at once took his place in the highest order of speakers—and there, now that Brougham and Huskisson are gone, we know not who is his equal—either in eloquence, talent, or information. His two speeches on the Catholic Question proved him an orator. And he has never spoken in the House since, without his power being felt, although he has not put it forth again in the same splendour with which he opened his career. So much the better that he has not—for genius like his seeks not for occasions of display, but waits till they come—till great questions arise that demand it. Such questions are now about to be debated, and on these he will bring his great powers to bear—we shall hear the voice of Sadler, we trust, above those of many would-be statesmen, on Parliamentary Reform. That he appeared in public life as a Tory, an anti-Catholic, an anti-Revolutionist, and an enemy to that disastrous mercantile system misnamed Free-Trade, was sufficient to bring upon him, at once, the abuse of a great part of the press. Whigs, republicans, radicals, all regarded him with sincere fear, and hypocritical scorn; and from all their enginery, paper-pellets were showered on the member for Newark. But they all bounded off his shining shield like hail-stones from crystal as hard as bright—and many—most of the clumsy crew, finding that they could make no impression, dropped away sulkily from the assault. A sulky sneer is almost all they now venture on—and their severest sarcasm is the epithet eloquent applied to him in italics, a sarcasm which sometimes escapes through the fingers of the compositor. His great work on the Law of Population, to these gentry proved a stumbling-block. They approached it with an air of mixed caution and insolence not a little ludicrous; and “into such strange vagaries fell as they would dance;” but one and all staggered over it to their discomfiture, and on recovering their feet, walked away in an opposite direction, with a few angry imprecations, not altogether uninspired by a sense of their own stupidity, for having needlessly got into a scrape which it required merely common sense to have avoided. Even such intelligent persons as the political economists of the Globe, Morning Chronicle, Spectator, and Examiner, after their first fall, shook their heads, and knew not what to make of it—muttered some incoherent sentences about long tables and intricate calculations, and thenceforward were mute.

“’Twas pitiful—’twas wondrous pitiful”—for, men of talents like these, and men devoted, if you believe them, to economical science, in the pure love of truth, were bound, and ought to have been impelled, to sift the tables and calculations thoroughly in the fanners—and if there was nothing but chaff, the winds would have winnowed it away, and Mr Sadler stood before the public a convicted impostor. Instead of acting thus, a few paragraphs were all these scribes indited upon, and almost all against, a Treatise, on a subject of paramount importance, consisting of upwards of thirteen hundred pages; and whatever these scribes may think, or pretend to think, of the principle it propounds, discussing all the questions in political economy, which the consideration of such a subject embraces, and thus affording opportunities without end of convicting the author of ignorance or error, if ignorant and erroneous his speculations were, sophistical the reasonings, and false the facts by which they were supported,—the utmost reach to which their candour could be stretched, was to acknowledge that Mr Sadler was a man of some industry—that here and there he made a few good observations on practical matters—and that he evidently meant well though he did not know how to set about it, being an amiable person, but of ordinary abilities. Then the style of the Treatise was too declamatory—too rhetorical—too poetical—which being interpreted, means, that Mr Sadler is not as dry as Mill, nor as dull as McCulloch.

Against such a work written by such a man, who at length “insupportably his foot advanced” in the Edinburgh Review? Who is the Harapath sent against Samson? But Sadler, though a Samson, is not a blind one—nor has he been captived by the Philistines. It behoved Harapath, therefore, to come on cautiously, and to know the use of his “weaver’s beam.” But instead of a giant, lo! a dwarf! And instead of a

"weaver's beam," lo! a rotten staff, or rather a "frush saugh-wan," that, at the very first attempted blow, caught on Samson's fore-arm, lies into flinders, and leaves the little Cockney-champion at the mercy of one, whose contempt, strong as it is, does not save the anility from annihilation.

To be plain, the Edinburgh Reviewers, ever since Mr Sadler's first effulgence in Parliament, have been the chief sneerers. A dozen times, at least, has his name been sibilated through the teeth of these serpents, whose hiss, however, is worse than their bite. The old fangs have expended all their poison, and the reptiles keep merely mumbling the hand they seek to sting. When these writers are at their severest, they link together the names of Sadler and Southey: thinking that, by

"Apt alliteration's artful aid, they expose these two distinguished persons to public derision. But the Public—of late unusually pensive—has lost her wonted relish for impertinence, and merely whispers in an under tone to a friend—perhaps Christopher North—"Chastise those Cockneys!" and they are chastised.

In their "pride of place," these high-born and high-bred gentlemen think it excessively absurd, that a Leeds manufacturer should be a Member of Parliament, and the author of a Treatise on the Law of Population. They have expressed their astonishment—nay their anger—that a "manufacturer of linens" should become a "manufacturer of speeches"—a sentiment which, we presume, was submitted in foul sheet to the Warden of the University of London for his in primatur. The ablest writer in the Edinburgh Review on Political Economy, and who, we believe, has frequently in this sort of spirit sneered at Mr Sadler, was not very many years ago a common day-labourer, and might have been seen digging and ditching, if not with much skill or alacrity, at least with that dogged perseverance, for which, more than by any higher quality, he is still distinguished. To his honour, let such useful labours be here recorded; but to his dishonour, be it likewise here recorded, that his elevation from a peasant's to a professor's chair, (and a peasant's chair was his, though now he be the proprietor of a small hereditary farm, on which may the sun shine brightly, and the dews softly descend,) has not been accompanied by suitable elevation of moral feeling, else had he, who once earned his bread by the sweat, not as now of his brains, but of his brow—and perhaps the bread so won was as well-baked as that he now eats—scorned all alliance with the scorners of honest and honourable industry, far more abhorred the suspicion of being himself the bitterest among them, and moved inwardly about the midriff by the droll idea of a Leeds linen-manufacturer being able absolutely to make a speech in the London House of Commons, forgetful how much drollery to him should be the idea of himself, now absolutely a professor of political economy in the University of London, in days of yore professing but to break stones on the highway, or to heap up the highway-mire in small dirt-keels, till the dung-wagon came by, and tumbled away with its inmate to fields about to rejoice in the ethereal spirit of the spring.

Now, for Professor McCulloch, we have no little respect. True, that he is still a very vulgar person,—indeed the most so of any man we can charge our memory with,—sometimes in his writings quite brutal. His native coarseness seems not to admit of any refinement—it won't polish. But we respect him for his abilities, and for that strength of character which, in untoward circumstances, supported him through a considerable education, till ultimately he became entitled by mind, though not by manners, to "sit at good men's feasts," and associate with persons in a condition of life far above what his own once was, but not much above that to which he has been raised chiefly by his own merits. For Mr Sadler, too, we entertain no little—nay, the greatest respect, even although he still is, we believe, what he has long been, a "manufacturer of linens." More fortunate than Mr McCulloch, in early life it was his lot to receive a finished education, and to live from boyhood to the present hour among a class of persons whom we cannot help calling, whatever the Edinburgh Review may say, gentlemen. In the prosperous town of Leeds, one of not the least prosperous in mere worldly affairs, he has for many years been admired by all his townsmen, by men of all parties, as by far the richest in mental endowments;—while honour bright, integrity without a flaw, morals unstained, and manners the most delightful, to say nothing of those accomplishments which throw a charm over all the intercourse of domestic and social life, all meeting together in his character, have given to it a dignity which his genius—great and original as it is—of itself could never have bestowed. That such a man should be a “manufacturer of speeches” no more surprises us than that he should be a “manufacturer of linens.” Mr Sadler is an ENGLISHMAN.

But now to business.

CHAPTER II.

THE Reviewer starts boldly, and with an air of conscious superiority over Mr Sadler, which, in the long run, becomes, as we shall see by and by, almost too ludicrous to look upon in a person whose endowments are so poor. “We did not expect,” says he, “a good book from Mr Sadler; and it is well that we did not; for he has given us a very bad one. The matter of the Treatise is extraordinary, the manner more extraordinary still. His arrangement confused, his repetitions endless, his style every thing which it ought not to be. Instead of saying what he has to say with the perspicuity, the precision, and the simplicity, in which consists the eloquence proper to scientific writing, he indulges without measure in vague, bombastic declamation made up of those true things which boys of fifteen admire, and which every body who is not destined to be a boy all his life weeds rigorously out of his compositions after five-and-twenty. That portion of his two thick volumes which is not made up of statistical tables, consists principally of ejaculations, apostrophes, metaphors, and similes, all the worst of their respective kinds. His thoughts are dressed up in this shabby finery with so much profusion and so little discrimination, that they remind us of a company of wretched strolling players who had huddled on suits of ragged and faded tinsel, taken from a common wardrobe, and fitting neither their persons nor parts, and who then exhibit themselves to the laughing and pitying spectators in a state of strutting, ranting, painted, gilded beggary.”

Why did the Reviewer not expect a good book from Mr Sadler? Was it because Mr Sadler had made a distinguished figure in Parliament, and delivered a first speech there which in the opinion of Plunkett entitled him to be called a debater of the highest order? Was it because Mr Sadler had published a book on Ireland, its Evils, and their Remedies, which Mr Spring Rice, a person not ignorant surely of the state of his native country, though an opponent of Mr Sadler in most great questions of domestic policy, pronounced full of wisdom, and of itself sufficient to entitle its author to the name of a public benefactor? No doubt it was. Pray did the Reviewer ever speak in Parliament? And if he did, was his eloquence of that commanding character

“Whereof all Europe rings from side to side?”

What book, good, bad, or indifferent, has he written? A few articles in Reviews—containing no “statistical tables”—we answer for it—but “ejaculations, apostrophes, metaphors, and similes,” sufficient to smother the somnolent. The “matter of the Treatise is extraordinary,” but does the Reviewer understand it? We pledge ourselves to shew, that at this moment he is as ignorant of “the contents,” as an unbegotten child. We fear, from what we have heard, that he sets himself on the wrong side of five-and-twenty, by a good many years—and yet “destined to be a boy all his life;” for what have his best compositions been, but a tawdry bedizenment of flower, froth, fume, foam, flash, flutter, and feather of speech—a strange specimen, certainly, of the “perspicuity, the precision, and the simplicity, in which consists the eloquence proper to scientific writing.” As to his simile of the strolling players, which he manifestly sports as something of his own, quite new and original, it is not so old, perhaps, as the days of Theopis, but it may be traced through a long line of owners, as ambitious as himself of novel illustration, till lost in remote antiquity. His own beggary—we shall shew—is not exactly of the kind he describes Mr Sadler's to be. "Strutting and ranting" it is—but neither "painted nor gilded," for the poor wit—it would seem—belongs himself to a set of strollers, who could not, on the present occasion, afford to go to the expense of a roll of gold leaf, or a pot of colour.

"The spirit of the book is as bad as its style," quoth Simon Sensitive; and why? Because it applies strong epithets to the theory and doctrine of Mr Malthus. These epithets, the simpleton says, are applied to Mr Malthus himself personally: "Mr Malthus is attacked in language which it would be scarcely decent to apply to Titus Oates." To this charge, Mr Sadler says, "I reply in his own language, it is 'utterly false.' I have not once applied these terms personally to him, or to any other individual. How have I differed from Mr Malthus himself when discussing the same subject, or even when treating of others infinitely less exciting? For instance, will the Reviewer say of Mr Malthus, that, when he speaks of Plato's 'detestable' views, he calls Plato detestable? That in 'execrating' the supposed expedients of the legislators and philosophers of Greece, he describes those great men as 'execrable?' Or to come to our own times, that, in asserting the end which Paley had in view, the encouragement of marriage, to be 'absolutely criminal,' he stigmatized Paley as 'absolutely criminal?'" Poo, poo, poo! The Reviewer begins already, with all his airs, to look small; and he shall be made also to sing small, before Mr Sadler lets him out of his clutches.

Mr Sadler, in his Treatise, has expressed his belief that no law unnatural in itself, grossly partial in its operations, and tending to inflict moral guilt, or unnecessary suffering on the species, can be of divine original. Such is the nature, he thinks, of the alleged Law of Population laid down by Mr Malthus. He has not, however, entered on the mysterious theme of the Origin of Evil.

"But fools rush in where 'wise men' fear to tread;"

and, accordingly, the Reviewer does enter on that theme, and, in a style worthy of one "destined to be a boy all his days," he asks Mr Sadler, how he accounts for mad-dogs, for malaria, and for headaches?—and twits him for possessing a piety which "would be proof against one rainy summer, but would be overcome by three or four in succession." All this is not only indecorous but irreverent; and is enough of itself to shew that the senseless scoffer and sneerer has not sense to understand how to approach so awful a subject. He concludes his wretched series of witticisms on the origin of evil, thus:—"Mr Sadler says, that it is not a light or transient evil, but a great and permanent evil. The Reviewer is alluding to Mr Sadler's belief that the great and permanent evil of the law of population, as laid down by Mr Malthus, is not one of the laws of God. What then? The question of the origin of evil is a question of aye or no; not a question of more or less." Such is his Natural Theology. A few passages back, he had spoken of Butler and Paley, and referred Mr Sadler to them, as to the masters of moral and religious wisdom, by which his own great mind had been enlightened. Mr Sadler then takes him at his word—and asks, "What says Paley? His express rule is this, that 'when we cannot resolve all appearances into benevolence of design, we make the few give place to the many, the little to the great; that we take our judgment from a large and decided preponderance?' Now, in weighing these two authorities, directly at issue on this point, I think there will be little trouble in determining which we should make 'to give place;' or, if we look to 'a large and decided preponderance' of either talent, learning, or benevolence, from whom we shall 'take our judgment.' The effrontery, or, to speak more charitably, the ignorance, of a reference to Paley on this subject, and in this instance, is really marvellous."

The Reviewer is indeed a pitiable spectacle—now; and there let him stand in the stocks, like a Sabbath-breaker, while we quote a passage from Mr Sadler's reply to the culprit—as a specimen of that “portion of his two thick volumes—not made up of statistical tables—and consisting principally of ejaculations, apostrophes, metaphors, and similes—all the worst of their respective kinds.” We quote it as a specimen of “thoughts dressed up in shabby finery,” and “reminding the Reviewer of a company of wretched strolling players”—a many hundred times stolen and strayed simile, now found in possession of a person who, ostentatious as he is of its display, would be unable to explain how he honestly came by it—a person answering to the description in the Hue-and-Cry—of “shabby-genteel.”

“It has been the triumph of Moral Philosophy to exhibit Deity, even to the simplest apprehension, as dispensing the pleasures of existence among mankind, with a bountiful, indeed with an equal hand; and as also balancing even the sufferings of humanity, which it has, however, generally regarded as His kind and fatherly correctives, with a like impartiality. Such have been among the clearest, as well as the most cheering, doctrines of Natural Theology; such are the views which Butler took, and which Paley also has admirably illustrated. The latter writer, indeed, when balancing, as he often does, the respective happiness of the different ranks of life, seems constantly to give the preponderance to the labouring classes; but then, the whole of their simple enjoyments, as described by him, are compounded of the domestic charities. Bereave them of these, and Moral Philosophy is speechless. More cheerless beings in time of health, or more desolate in periods of suffering and affliction, imagination can hardly portray, than the labouring poor of either sex would generally be, were they to become the slaves of the ‘preventive check.’ The cottages would then be emptied of all but wretchedness; and the void so created, filled with pollution and misery. The false and pernicious system of Political Economy latterly prevalent has indeed gone far already to destroy the comforts of those former abodes of contentment and happiness; when it shall have applied its last and great panacea to the poor, ‘the preventive check,’ it will then have filled up the measure of its iniquity, and of their endurance. I hope, indeed, better things, and brighter days; but they will never arrive, if we continue to neglect our obvious duties, and lay the nuisances of society, which this wretched frenzy has itself chiefly occasioned, and which ought (and instantly) to be abated, upon the laws of nature and of God.”

There spoke the Christian philosopher. And here he speaks again. “I am not very willing to be betrayed into a theological dispute with an antagonist with whom, perhaps, on subjects such as this, I hold few things in common, but I may just remark, that, on the Christian hypothesis, (if it be not irreverent to call Christianity an hypothesis,) no doubt whatever exists as to the origin of evil, and I have yet to find among the fables, which some think of equal authority with divine revelation, a better solution of the mystery. Nay, even Natural Theology, by whomsoever expounded, teaches us to attribute unbounded benevolence to the Deity, and to recognise him as educating from those seeming evils which occasionally afflict mankind, the means by which he guards and perpetuates their general welfare; and above all, as manifesting, in the various dispensations of His providence, regarding every rank, the most visible and perfect impartiality. These, I think, are the views which all writers on Natural Theology have taken upon this subject; I am sure they are those of the great names to which he refers me—Butler and Paley.”

What think ye now of the critic, who has pronounced that “the spirit of Mr Sadler's Treatise is as bad as its style,”—“that its thoughts are dressed up in shabby finery,”—“that they remind him of a company of wretched strolling players, exhibiting themselves to the laughing or pitying spectators, in a state of strutting, ranting, painted, gilded beggary.” Wordsworth has told us, —“that he who feels contempt

Even for the meanest thing, hath faculties
Which he has never used!”— a noble sentiment—and as we ~~under-~~

to use all our faculties at present, that we may be able to exhibit in their true light those of Mr Sadler, even for this meanest thing we shall do all we can not to feel contempt—but 'tis impossible to prevent it—and therefore really Mr Wordsworth must pardon us, for despising "this rude indecent clown" from the very bottom of our souls—as we feel you too, gentle reader, must do from the bottom of yours—though from a long perusal of Maga, you are a creature made up in equal proportions of intelligence and love.

Having thus removed the rubbish which forms the patch of the Reviewer's article, let us demolish the barbarous edifice itself—razz it to the ground—and not leave one stone upon another. We shall do so sometimes by our own blow—but generally by Mr Sadler's. He is the Pounder.

"The great discovery," says the Reviewer, "by which Mr Sadler has, as he conceives, vindicated the ways of Providence, is announced with all the pomp of capital letters." It is—and you are a child for saying so. But let us hear what you have got to say against the "great discovery" itself—supposing that it had been announced in Small Pica. "The Law of Population," says Mr Sadler, "may be thus briefly enunciated: THE PRODIGIOUSNESS OF HUMAN BEINGS, OTHERWISE SIMILARLY CIRCUMSTANCED, VARIES INVERSELY AS THEIR NUMBERS." Hereupon the Reviewer waxeth witty—and asserts that Mr Sadler "has not the faintest notion of what is meant by inverse variation. Had he understood the proposition which he has announced with so much pomp, its ludicrous absurdity must at once have flashed upon his mind. Let it be supposed that there is a tract in the back settlements of America, or in New South Wales, equal in size to London, with only a single couple, a man and his wife, living upon it. The population of London, with its immediate suburbs, is now probably about a million and a half. The average fecundity of a marriage in London is, as Mr Sadler tells us, 2.35. How many children will the woman in the back settlements bear according to Mr Sadler's theory? The solution of the problem is easy. As the population on this tract in the back settlements to the population of London, so will be the number of children born from a marriage in London to the number of children born in marriage of this couple in the back settlements. That is to say—

$$2 : 1,500,000 :: 2.35 : 1,762,500.$$

The lady will have 1,762,500 children: a large 'efflux of the fountain of life,' to borrow Mr Sadler's sonorous rhetoric, as the most philoprogenitive parent could possibly desire."

Now, who is he that asserts that Mr Sadler is ignorant of mathematics—even of the simplest terms of the science? A person, we believe, who at Cambridge—where he made some figure as an English and Latin versifier—with difficulty and danger passed the Pons Asinorum, and in the Senate-house narrowly escaped the fate of Wooden Spoon. Utterly destitute now as then of all scientific acquirements, he sports Joshua King—nay, holds his head higher than Airy. Mr Sadler rebukes him for his impertinence, and tells him, with dignity, that he is in wilful error—for that the book he professes to review contains throughout proofs that its author is not unfamiliar with the mathematics, which were with him an early and a favourite pursuit. With the Rule of Three inverse, on which proportion his criticism turns, "there is not a boy of ten years old, in the little day-school of the village where I am writing these pages, who is not as particularly conversant as the Reviewer himself with that rule of proportion, regarding which he pronounces that I have not the faintest notion." Nothing, indeed, can be more ludicrous than the self-complacency and pride with which the Reviewer "solves his problem." He manifestly conceives that he has performed a most profound and operose achievement. All the "Cocker" burns in his eye, as he looks at the long array of figures his skill has conjured up—and the astonishing result—"all made out of the builder's brain—the Lady with 1,762,500 children." Wonderful calculating boy! Bidder and Colburn, hide your diminished heads! What it is to be at once an arithmetician and a wit!

But Mr Sadler crowns our prodigy on the spot—ere he has ceased to wonder at the miracle he has wrought —with a paper fool's cap. He shews that he had himself disclaimed the use of the terms in their mathematical and consequently secondary sense, and of course adopted them in the literal and primary sense, as expounded by our best lexicographers, and used by our best writers. He expressed himself thus:—"THE PROLIFICNESS OF HUMAN BEINGS UNDER EQUAL CIRCUMSTANCES, VARIES INVERSELY (inverse-like; Horne Tooke!) (in an inverted order; Bailey!) (reversely; Encyclopædia Metropolitana) AS THEIR NUMBERS, (comparative multitude; Johnson.) OR, AS (at the same time as, Johnson) THEIR NUMBERS vary." He also limited and fixed the sense in which he used those terms thus: "the prolificness of a given number of marriages will, all other circumstances being the same, vary in proportion to the condensation of the population; so that that prolificness shall be greatest, where the numbers on an equal space are the fewest, and on the contrary, the smallest, where those numbers are the largest." He has also "defined practically," throughout his work, the sense in which he used the word "inversely" as applied to the influence on population of prolificness, so that, according to the law of population which he has developed, "more" (population) "requires less" (prolificness), "or less" (population) "requires more" (prolificness): agreeably to the definition of the term in question given by Dr Hutton in his mathematical and philosophical dictionary. Pray, Master Reviewer, how do you feel now? We need not ask how you look. The fool's cap becomes you exceedingly—and you are really a very pretty fellow.

But a word or two more in your ear. You say that Mr Malthus knows well the meaning of the mathematical terms he uses—but that Mr Sadler has not the faintest notion of the meaning of those he "enounces." Now, Mr Malthus, in his book of Definitions, in which he avowed, and indeed his sole aim, is perspicuity and precision, speaks thus: "Prices and values vary as the demand directly and the supply inversely. When, therefore, the demand is given, prices and values vary inversely or the supply; when the supply is given, directly as the demand." Now,

Master Reviewer, does Mr Malthus here intend what the words used in their mathematical sense imply? Don't be in a hurry—for then you would be in a flurry—and then you would smack of the Wooden Spoon. Does Mr Malthus mean to say, that the demand for wheat being given, and remaining the same both as to the numbers requiring it and the quantity required, that if the supply were to fail one half, the price would be merely doubled? Do you think, sir, that that is his meaning? Why, by your stupid stare, we begin to suspect you do—in which case, you must believe Mr Malthus to be as utterly ignorant of political economy as you are yourself; but if, in spite of your stupid stare, you are forced to confess that Mr Malthus is no such ignoramus, then please to play off a little of the same exquisite wit on the reverend gentleman, as you flashed into the eyes of the Honourable Member, for he too, in spite of his anti-population principles, and we must say, in violation of the conduct proper in a clergyman, has by the word inversely, let out the secret of his connexion with the "Lady with 1,762,500 children."

One other whisper in your ear. Mr Malthus, speaking of M. Muret's Theory, says, that it implies "that the fruitfulness of women should vary inversely as their health." Now, sir, do you think that Mr Malthus imputes to M. Muret this belief—that the women who survive to double the average age, shall be endowed with only just half the average fruitfulness? You cannot—you may depend upon it—he such an ass. Be assured you cannot—for the births and deaths in the places M. Muret refers to, are given by him in numbers—and the proportions these exhibit do not vary in the inverse ratio, M. Muret's term—or vary inversely—Mr Malthus's—in a mathematical sense—but they "vary inversely," according to the literal, primary, and common acceptation of the terms—as they have been explained by Horne Tooke, Bailey, Johnson, and Richardson—and used by M. Muret, Mr Malthus, and Mr Sadler.

Gentle readers all—we request you to look at the Reviewer standing there crowned with his paper fool's cap—with one finger in his mouth, and another in his eye—and what think you of the wit and arithmetician now? You think just as Mr Sadler thinks—who says, “I would not needlessly dwell upon a mere verbal dispute; but as the Reviewer, who passes over great part of my argument in a convenient silence, is so ostentatiously learned for several pages together upon this ridiculous quibble, it seemed proper in me to retort upon him his own imputation of ‘ignorance;’ and I will, without pronouncing as confidently regarding him as he has of me, just hint a suspicion, which his parade of learning has forced upon me, that he is in reality about as deep in mathematics as Goldsmith’s Ephraim Jenkinson was in Greek. After all, whether my principle is happily expressed, is not the dispute; definitions rarely are, there being nothing, as Sir Humphrey Davy says, ‘more difficult than a good definition,’ but that I was ignorant of the mathematical meaning of the term which I used in a popular, and, as I still contend, in a proper sense, is—to retort the language of the Reviewer—‘False!’” We “announce” this “great discovery”—though Mr Sadler has not done so—“with all the pomp of capital letters.”

Let us now exhibit our fool’s-cap-crowned Reviewer in another light. Hitherto Mr Sadler has been exposing him as a hypocrite—a would-be wit—an ignoramus—and the booby of the lowest form of arithmetician in a little day-school of a pleasantly-situated village, in the midst of meadows, and embosomed in trees. See him now misrepresenting and mutilating the meaning of a statement simple as truth can be, and clear as the day.

Mr Sadler, in speaking of Mr Malthus’s geometrical and arithmetical ratios, said, that “as far as nature has to do with the question, men might plant twice the number of peas, and breed from a double number of the same animals, with equal prospect of then multiplication.” And so he might. But what says the Reviewer to this? He says, “Why, if Mr Sadler thinks, as far as nature is concerned, that four sheep will double as fast as two, and eight as fast as four, how can he deny that the geometrical ratio does exist in the works of nature? Or has he a definition of his own for geometrical progression, as well as for inverse proportion?”

A word in your ear. Never has Mr Sadler admitted that the geometrical principle of increase, either of plants or animals, any more than of human beings, is, on the same space, possible—on the contrary, it is the grand aim of his work to prove it impossible; but the truth is, that the Reviewer first garbles a sentence to suit his purpose, and then shews that he is ignorant of the meaning of the terms it contains! What are Mr Sadler’s words? “With equal prospect of their multiplication.” And what is the meaning the Reviewer attributes to these words? “With prospect of then equal multiplication!” This is either foolish or knavish—foolish if he cannot see the distinction—knavish if he does—and yet boldly ~~denies~~ that there is any—for the distinction expresses a difference which involves the entire dispute.

Thus it is that Mr Sadler cuffs the Reviewer’s ears, which find the paper fool’s cap no protection. “Let me ask the learned divines who contribute to the pages of the same Review, whether, in the beautiful parable of the Sower, our Saviour does not hold forth to all who receive his word into honest and good hearts, an equal prospect of increase—and whether that is the prospect of an equal increase? Or, to avoid again falling under the lash of such critics, in taking illustrations from the Sacred Volume, and to appeal to the Reviewer himself as a profound mathematician, which, from his familiarity with the Rule of Three inverse, it is evident he must be,—I would ask him—whether, if I say that on the Newtonian system there is equal prospect of the motions of Jupiter and Saturn, I am saying that, on the Newtonian system, there is a prospect of the equal motions of Jupiter and Saturn? Or, as doubtless he is as great a politician as he is a mathematician, will he say whether, when Horne Tooke (probably as good a philologist as himself) says, that ‘there is a very great difference between having an equal right to a share, and a right to an equal share in the representation,’ he is uttering nonsense?” The Reviewer is absolutely ignorant of the plainest principles of construction."

Is it not pleasant to see a clegg-headed, well-informed man flogging the bottom of a muddy-noddled and ignorant boy? It is.

But the flogging the Reviewer has got as yet is far from being equal to his deserts. So he must get some more—one other stripe—but a tingler. For to ignorance he has added, in the attempt at argument noticed above, wilful misrepresentation. Not only does he totally suppress the nature of the argument in which the passage he criticises occurs, but he has actually omitted the first part of the sentence itself, so as to make the remainder express, as he sillily thinks, what he knew was not the meaning of Mr Sadler. Mr Sadler was shewing that human food could be made to multiply as fast as human beings—in a world, generally speaking, "all but unoccupied;" where he said, for instance, that men might plant twice the number of peas, and breed from a double number of the same animals, with equal prospect of the multiplication. Expound that sentence in his own way, and the Reviewer, being, though a boy, not exactly Wordsworth's Idiot Boy, son of Betty Foy, must see that there is no inconsistency between it and Mr Sadler's entire theory. Nay, he knows that the equal multiplication of the same number of human beings, under otherwise similar circumstances, on an equal space, is a part of Mr Sadler's theory. Aye, so well does he know it, that elsewhere he interprets the principle so rigidly, as to demand in proof of it, the very same degree of multiplication, though the circumstances Mr Sadler has specially enumerated as constantly affecting the principle, are dissimilar! And yet, here, the poor creature dreams that he has detected ignorance and inconsistency in Mr Sadler, when, in treating of the subject as referable to a world "all but unoccupied," that gentleman assumes that a pea might be planted, or a sheep introduced, in the unoccupied parts, with at least equal prospect of multiplication, compared with the increase in parts possessed and cultivated! The brazen effrontery of misrepresentation can go no farther than this. So the other stripe—the tingler.

Here is an example of the ludicrous and loathsome love of malicious misrepresentation, which, in the mind of this Reviewer, is absolutely a disease. Mr Sadler gives a list of the number of emigrants who had arrived in ten of the ports of the United States in the year 1817—for which he is indebted to Dr Seybert, an author of whom he speaks in terms of the highest respect. He thinks that the number in that list is probably too small—the accounts from which it was framed having been, in all likelihood, casually obtained. Indeed, he proves that the numbers received by Dr Seybert fell far short of the real ones—and he proves it by direct evidence—no less than twenty ports having been omitted, which, even as early as 1796, had been placed under custom-house regulations. And having proved it, he very properly says, "that accounts thus obtained, if not wilfully exaggerated, must always fall short of the truth." The infatuated Reviewer, after some other unprincipled impertinence, says, "We will, however, suppose with Mr Sadler, that Dr Seybert, finding himself compelled to choose between two sins, preferred telling a falsehood, to exaggerating, and consequently underrated the number of emigrants!!!" If the Reviewer be not Wordsworth's Idiot Boy, and the son of Betty Foy—what is he?

But Mr Sadler, having thus "flogged the offending Adam out of him," finds that the offending Adam, after a short flight, will return to his former habitation. No alternative is left—but to resume the knout, which he wields "with a skill and dexterity" which may well excite the envy even of Christopher North.

Intoxicated with the fumes of his own vanity served up to his nostrils by his own flattering self on a flaming censor, of which the smell is far from being agreeable to the bystanders, who rather turn their faces a little to the one side, the Reviewer exclaims, "Does this principle" (the law of population illustrated by Mr Sadler) "vindicate the honour of God? Does it hold out any new hope or comfort to man? Not at all. We pledge ourselves to shew, with the utmost strictness of reasoning, from Mr Sadler's own principles, and from facts of the most notorious description, that every consequence which follows from the law of geometrical progression, laid down by Mr Malthus, will follow from the law, misnamed a law of inverse variation by Mr Sadler."

Mr Sadler and Christopher North will force you to redeem that pledge—or behold the knout. Step forth then, sir, to the middle of the floor—and now for your "utmost strictness of reasoning," and your "facts of the most notorious description." Here they are. "London is the most thickly peopled spot of its size in the known world. Therefore the fecundity of the population of London must, according to Mr Sadler, be less than the fecundity of human beings living on any other spot of equal size. But though, according to Mr Sadler, the fecundity is less in London than elsewhere, and though the mortality is greater there than elsewhere, we find that even in London, the number of births greatly exceeds the number of deaths. During the ten years which ended with 1820, there were 50,000 more baptisms than burials within the bills of mortality. It follows, therefore, that even within London itself, an increase of the population is taking place by internal propagation alone."

Mr Sadler begins with contradicting the whole statement. Perhaps the Reviewer is the only man in London who does not know that an immense number of the propagators there, are, and have always been, derived from a constant and immense influx of inhabitants from the country. Dr Price states, that of 3226 married persons examined at the Westminster Infirmary, only 824 were born in London. In the higher ranks the proportion would be smaller. The Reviewer might have seen this fact quoted by Mr Malthus.

But the Reviewer, in his all-comprehensive ignorance of "facts of the most notorious description," of course does not know one fact which has never been lost sight of by any one writer who has hitherto addressed himself to the subject,—that the registers of the burials in London are notoriously and immensely deficient. Neither has it been once denied, that, relatively to the registered births, the registered burials have constituted a great and growing deficiency.

The population of London, Mr Sadler observes, from 1700 to 1750, appears to have been nearly stationary. In the former year it is calculated to have been 674,350; in the latter, 676,250—but from that time to the date of the last census in 1821, it had nearly doubled, having become 1,274,800. Now, the births nearly conformed to this increase, the ratio having somewhat diminished, so far, therefore, confirming Mr Sadler's principle. From 1700 to 1750, the annual registered births averaged, according to the published registers, 17,000; from 1810 to 1820, that average was 28,189; thus the population had increased 72 per cent, the births 67 per cent. Now, presuming that the entered burials were equally complete, it is obvious that the deaths also would have increased in something like the same proportion. But how stands the fact? Why, the deaths from 1700 to 1750 averaged, in the same tables, 24,365; from 1810 to 1820, (the population having then nearly doubled,) they averaged 22,331 only! Most absurd would it indeed be to attempt to account for so immense a relative diminution by any minute calculation about the improvement of human life—and well, therefore, is Mr Sadler, after such a statement, entitled to say, "Can another word be necessary to expose to ridicule the equally confident and ignorant assumptions of our Reviewer, founded upon such data as these?"

But Mr Sadler does not quit the Reviewer on this exposure of his ignorance—but, following up his blow, prostrates him on the bosom of his old mother earth. According to the foregoing number of annual burials, the mortality in the metropolis is only one in between forty-nine and fifty of the entire population. In the bills of mortality the ages of the deaths are classified; and it appears that more than a third of the number of the born die under the age of five years. Suppose then, for a moment, that the documents on which the Reviewer builds his refutation of Mr Sadler's theory were true—what follows? Why, that even were the population stationary, all Londoners who survive the age of five, live, on the average, above threescore and ten years! What a shew of grey-headed Cockneys!

But Mr Sadler cannot help giving a slight kick to the Reviewer, now that he is down—not to hurt him—but simply to shew his contempt. It is stated in the abstract of the registers of 1811, and also in that of 1821, that in the last six months of 1794, it was ascertained by the collector on the then tax on burials, that 3148 persons were interred without being registered, and that it is not likely that the whole number of interments, or even of burialgrounds, were discoverable for the purpose of taxation. This rectification was imperfect, even in 1794—what then ought to be the additions at the present day? But let the Reviewer take the fact, as stated in the abstract of the registers in 1794—and apply it to his calculation of an increase of above 50,000, decennially, to the population of London, by internal propagation only, and pray, what has become of his “utmost strictness of reasoning,” and his “facts of the most notorious description,” and his pledge to prove Mr Sadler a Malthusian?

But the Reviewer stirring on the ground, as if he were striving to get up, Mr Sadler, to keep him down as long as it may be his will and pleasure, sets his foot upon his neck—thus. The accounts which prostrate Pomposo has assumed as relatively correct, regarding the prolificness of London, inform us, that there were 284,897 registered births, and 120,605 marriages, during the ten years from 1810 to 1820. These numbers give 2.36 as the prolificness of each marriage. Now, we learn from other documents, that about half the deaths in London consist of persons under twenty years of age. It follows, therefore, that if even all the survivors were to marry at twenty, still that a married couple can only yield on the average 1.18 child each, that will survive to marry. Therefore, in a single generation, according to those statements, as far “as internal propagation is concerned,” 2 diminish to 1.18, or 200 persons to 118; and yet the gentleman on the ground—flat maintains that there is nothing in Mr Sadler's “boasted principle” to prevent the whole earth from becoming “as thick with human beings as St Giles's!” But assuming the correctness of the documents to which he appeals, and on which he builds his pretended refutation of Mr Sadler, then, asks that inexorable statist, what is there, on the principle of the person prostrate beneath his feet, to prevent St Giles's parish from becoming a Salisbury Plain?

“It is thus,” quoth Mr Sadler, “that the Reviewer has redeemed his pledge, evinced ‘the utmost strictness of reasoning,’ and shewn, ‘from facts of the most notorious description,’ that my principle is one of superfecundity. He has done this by assuming that there are fewer deaths in London now than there were a century ago, (now when there are more than double the number of people to die,) and consequently that half the population bid fair to be what are called, in Gulliver's Travels, Struldbrugs, or immortal; or, at all events, that those who survive the age of five years, live, at present, to between three and fourscore each, not here and there one, but the whole of them on an average. An old Parr, therefore, according to him, would be no curiosity in London.” The imagination again beholds in astonishment street and square all crowded with Cockneys,

“Who look so old and grey,
In truth you find it hard to say
They e'er could have been young.”

The Reviewer having, he says, shewn (shewn!!) that Mr Sadler's Theory, if it be true, is as much a theory of superfecundity as that of Mr Malthus, then says, “but it is not true—and from Mr Sadler's own tables we will prove that that is not true.” Mr Sadler answers, “if he does not make use of my tables for the purpose, his chance of refutation is very slight.”—And indeed it is—for no table, poor fellow, does he keep of his own—he cannot afford it—and most ungratefully, but impotently, tries to upset the table spread for him in the wilderness of his own intellectual powers, by a man who is entitled, by the endowment of nature, to be liberal of gifts to paupers—even though, as in this case, they too often prey on the charity they abuse. The Reviewer, accordingly, suppresses every thing that is necessary, either to comprehend or prove Mr Sadler's Theory, and selects from two or three tables, out of a hundred, one fact or two, out of thousands, which, in his ignorant spite, he conceives to be irreconcilable with it. Such is his method of induction—and yet, would you believe it? he quotes Lord Bacon—and, no doubt, prides himself on being a strict disciple of the Verulam School!

Now, had the Reviewer shewn not one or two facts merely, but dozens—aye scores—irreconcilable with Mr Sadler's theory, he would not, by such shewing, have proved it false—but, as a philosopher, would have been called upon by the love of truth to find some explanation of these apparent inconsistencies—since many hundred facts had been not only brought forward all reconcilable with it, but accountable only by it, for one that might seem to contradict it. But it is somewhat surprising—if, indeed, any thing can be surprising in the stupidity of the person of whom Mr Sadler has made such an exposure, and such a spectacle, that the fact or two which he has put his paws upon among the mighty multitude, turn out utterly “feckless,” admit of the easiest explanation, or rather have no bearing whatever against the theory he in vain would, even in the most insignificant point, impugn.

Thus, among a great number of others, Mr Sadler gives one table, which proves the principle for which he contends, from the counties of England classed, most scrupulously, according to the condensation of their inhabitants. And he has afterwards added one of the county of Lancaster, from which he deduces that the same principle seems to be in operation even in the minutest divisions of the county when similarly classed. But on the strict accuracy of this table, having had to compute the areas of the several Hundreds himself, he lays no stress; nor, of course, did he expect that in single instances the existence of the principle would have been clearly manifested, nor indeed does the nature of his proof require it. Knowing all this, the Reviewer, most unlike an honest enquirer after truth, and most like a dishonest enquirer after falsehood, takes this very table, to fish out of it, if possible, “some fact,” to prove that Mr Sadler's theory cannot be true!

But he is no angler—either with the fly or worm—ignorant alike of surface and ground-fishing—and accordingly he flogs the waters he has muddied in vain—not a fish will either rise or bite, to reward his pains and his patience; he has not so much even as “one glorious nibble.”

Here is his objection. “In Almondness, where, Mr Sadler tells us, the population is 267 to the square mile, there are 415 births to 100 marriages. The population of Almondness is twice as thick as the population of the nine counties referred to in the other table; yet the number of births to a marriage is greater in Almondness than in those counties. Once more, Mr Sadler tells us, that in three counties in which the population was from 300 to 350 on the square mile, the births to 100 marriages were 353; and he afterwards rates them at 375. Again, we say, let him take his choice. But from his table of the population of Lancashire, it appears that in the Hundred of Leyland, where the population is 364 to the square mile, the number of births to 100 marriages, is 391. Here, then, we have the marriages becoming more fruitful as the population becomes denser.”

Here we think we hear the little Bantam—feathered down to the toes—and as proud of his red fiery comb and wattles, as if what ——“seems his head,

The likeness of a kingly crown had on”—— clap his wings and crow—forgetting that even in the fable it is not such a cock that is said to frighten the lion.

Mr Sadler asks him if he does not recollect a reason more than adequate to produce this difference, which he himself, the Reviewer, recognises, when talking of the New States of North America? That reason is—the removals which take place to any particular country or district, consisting mostly of individuals in the prime of life. Many of these, doubtless, are unmarried; but many are married; and thither they go to better their condition, or to find employment for their children. Now, does the Reviewer, asks Mr Sadler, write in English, and not know that there are vast numbers of such settlers, who annually proceed to Lancashire? Ignorant as he is, how should he have known that in respect of the two very divisions in question, their rate of increase during ten years, from 1811 and 1821, proves the fact? For the Hundred of Almondness has increased 28 per cent during that term, and that of Leyland above 21 per cent; so that the increase on both is above 24 per cent in ten years, or about half as much again as that which was taking place in the kingdom at large during the same period! Yet Mr Sadler has ascertained that there is a much smaller proportion of marriages celebrated in these two hundreds, than there is, on the average, in the whole kingdom. Why? Because, obviously, a considerable portion of the increase is made up of the constant accessions of those who are already married. Is not, then, a difference of about four per cent in the prolificness of Leyland, for instance, compared with that of the four English counties the Reviewer refers to, most satisfactorily accounted for? Nor dare he to deny it. For the Reviewer himself has accounted for differences, in some cases amounting to about 100 per cent, in the proportion of the children in America to the prolific females, to the same cause—emigration. Will he swallow a camel, and boggle at a gnat?—the body of an elephant, and choke upon the tail?

Mr Sadler has given what the Reviewer calls "a long table of all the towns of England." It, he says, "is alone sufficient to upset the whole theory." Hear him. "We find that the fecundity in towns of fewer than 3000 inhabitants is actually much greater than the average fecundity of the kingdom, and that the fecundity in towns of between 3000 and 4000, is at least as great as the average fecundity of the kingdom. The average fecundity of a marriage in towns of fewer than 3000 inhabitants is about four; in towns of between 3000 and 4000 inhabitants, it is 3.60. Now, the average fecundity of England, when it contained only 160 inhabitants to a square mile, and when, therefore, according to the new law of population, the fecundity must have been greater than it now is, was, according to Mr Sadler, 3.66 to a marriage. To proceed: the fecundity of a marriage in the English towns of between 3000 and 4000 is stated at 3.56. But when we turn to Mr Sadler's table of the counties, we find the fecundity of a marriage in Warwickshire and Staffordshire rated at only 3.48; and in Lancashire and Surrey at only 3.41. These facts disprove Mr Sadler's principle; and the fact on which he lays so much stress, that the fecundity is less in the great towns than in the small towns, does not tend in any degree to prove his principle."

Again we hear the Bantam crowing. He ceases his scraugh—and says that the fact of the fecundity of Manchester being less than the fecundity of Sandwich or Guildford, is a circumstance that has nothing to do with Mr Sadler's theory; but that the fecundity of Sandwich is greater than the average fecundity of Kent—that the fecundity of Guildford is greater than the average fecundity of Surrey—as from Mr Sadler's own tables appears to be the case—these are facts, he says, utterly inconsistent with his theory. We say they are not.

The statistical account of all the places mentioned by the Reviewer in this triumphant passage is thoroughly known to Mr Sadler. The Reviewer knows no more of it than it they were in the moon. All he knows is what Mr Sadler has told him in his tables, about the mere numbers of their population. And did the infatuated quibbler never for a moment stop to consider, whether it was likely or not that the man who constructed the tables should know how they bore upon his own theory? Did no suspicion ever enter his mind that, in all this botheration of his about tables, he might flounder into a trap-door in the floor, and break his neck? In the first place, then, concerning the very first town he mentions, Sandwich, the census remarks, that part of its liberties lie in the adjacent hundreds, and are entered among them, a fact which of itself divests the computation of all certainty.

Secondly, as to Guildford, the other instance, the same census states, that its registers include those of three Dissenting congregations, the only ones inserted in the returns of the whole county, with the exception of that of a small body of Quakers, which, as including the marriages also of that denomination, does not at all affect the proportion. So ignorant is the Reviewer of the very census he selects for his purpose! Indeed, he will not learn, let Mr Sadler din it into his ears ever so often, that there are frequently such variations in the ecclesiastical jurisdictions, that in some cases they leave a town without a single marriage—as in the case of Macclesfield.

But, thirdly, Mr Sadler flings these answers from him, in the carelessness of a man provided with other irresistible proofs of the ignorance of his antagonist, and proceeds by a more simple and decisive method to dispose of the entire objection. He leaves the Reviewer in the condition of a braggadocio, who, having called upon a crowd to behold in what grand style he would run you through the body, finds his own weapon twitched out of his hand and over his head, and yours beating a tattoo on his skull, which rings like an alarm-bell all round the neighbourhood. "That the fecundity of Guildford is greater than the average fecundity of Surrey—as from his own tables appears to be the case—these are facts utterly inconsistent with his theory." So has said the Reviewer—believing the population of Surrey to be rural in the extreme, and to be sprinkled over hill and plain in pretty little single cottages, fitter themes for Poetry than Political Economy. This assertion, Mr Sadler rightly represents as the climax of absurdity. In the last census, Surrey numbered 394,656 inhabitants, and to say not a word of the other towns in the county, above two hundred thousand of these are within the bills of mortality. Pray be so good as to inform us and yourself, good Master Lieutenant, how it is utterly inconsistent with Mr Sadler's principle, that the fecundity of Guildford, which numbers about 3000 inhabitants, should be greater than the average fecundity of Surrey, made up, as the bulk of the population is, of the inhabitants of some of the worst parts of the metropolis? And, pray be so good as to inform us and yourself, good Master Lieutenant, after you have drawn in your breath on having answered the above query, why the fecundity of a given number of marriages in the clean little rural towns you allude to, while in the act, as you suppose, of demolishing Mr Sadler's principle, should not, according to that principle, be somewhat higher than that of an equal number, half-taken from the heart of Birmingham or Manchester, and half from the populous districts by which they are surrounded? Why should you stare like a stuck pig, or make mouths like a monkey at Mr Sadler, on being told by that gentleman that the average fecundity in towns of fewer than 3000 inhabitants is about four, or towns of between 1000 and 3000, 3.66 to a marriage, while that of a marriage in Warwickshire and Staffordshire—where you think according to his principles it should be greater—is somewhat less—being 3.48—in Lancashire and Surrey but 3.41? Surrey is settled. Well, then, with respect to Warwickshire. Do you not know that in Warwickshire, but about half the population is comprised in large towns? On the top of the "cheap and nasty," did you never pass through Birmingham? Soho! Soho!—As to Staffordshire, besides the large and populous towns in its iron districts, situated so close together as almost to form, for considerable distances, a continuous street—heard you never of the potteries, a great population recently accumulated, not included, indeed, in the towns distinctly recorded in the censuses, but vastly exceeding in its condensation that found in the places to which you allude? What puzzles you with Lancashire? Don't you know that one fourth of the entire population is made up of the inhabitants of two only of the towns of that county? And that far above half of it is contained in towns, compared with which, those you refer to are villages? Nay, even the very hamlets of the manufacturing parts of Lancashire are often more populous. So you perceive, silly sir, that when you asserted, and pledged yourself to prove, that "Mr Sadler's own tables," the "long table of all the towns of England," "are alone sufficient to upset his whole theory;" you had "not the faintest notion" of the consequences of your rashness—namely, an exhibition or rather ex-posure of your own ignorance—an ignorance almost too perfect to be credible in a world like this—too perfect, assuredly, long to live pure here below—and destined, after passing before our eyes in brief Review, to be for ever relegated to Limbo.

CHAPTER III.

PERHAPS the Reviewer, whose total ignorance of his own country has been exposed in the preceding Chapter, is more at home in Prussia, or the Netherlands, or America—countries into which he follows Mr Sadler, to smash his principle there too—that is, to fling plate after plate of cracked crockery against the walls of a church, with the savage purpose of reducing the whole fabric to ruins.

He fixes upon a table regarding Prussia, which, of course, as usual, "completely disproves Mr Sadler's whole principle." Such is the grim look of this table, that he is at first loath to approach it. "We are sorry," quoth he, "to disturb Mr Sadler's complacency." But this amiable weakness—this Christian repugnance to the infliction of mental pain—by an effort of stoical magnanimity he conquers—and forthwith, to the disturbance of Mr Sadler's complacency, like a giant refreshed with wine, doth he, as we said before,

"Insupportably his foot advance."

But something catches his toe—he stumbles and trips—and Mr Sadler, sorry to have even thus far had "his complacency disturbed," comes across the nape of his neck with his critical cane—almost like the very Crutch—and lo! the Reviewer on the ground, for the fortieth time at least—for no one of the most unfortunate among the unfortunate youths of whom we read in the annual registers of many lands, ever in so short a time experienced as many ups-and-downs—to say nothing of the rubs—of life.

From the table in question, regarding Prussia, it appears, that at more than one period (1754-1784) when collections of the facts required were made, those facts are found to corroborate Mr Sadler's principle. But Mr Sadler plainly intimated that the later document was the more complete and correct. Indeed the table of the date 1754, is very imperfect. But Mr Sadler gives two others—of the same date, 1784—one drawn up by Baumaun, the other by Basching—which also vary considerably, and because they did so, Mr Sadler inserted them all in his work—for though never dreaming, he tells us, of their critical accuracy, more especially of the correctness of the first one, still he found they were equally confirmatory of his principle, though taken at two different periods, and by three different individuals. But the Reviewer appeals exclusively to the document notoriously and grossly defective, and then exclaims that it is perfectly clear, that Mr Sadler's principle is erroneous. He then prates about the Seven Years' War—the 1754, and the 1784 of which Mr Sadler shows that he knows nothing, except a small portion of misunderstanding, picked out of a table given as defective, but which, though told to the contrary, little Obstinacy would persist in quoting as complete.

But Mr Sadler, no way "sorry to disturb his complacency," does not suffer the Reviewer to continue chuckling over the said table—with his legs under the mahogany—and as he waxeth pot-valiant, prating of the Seven Years' War. The documents now referred to, when properly arranged, and they were properly arranged, though our wisacre could not see how, indicated the truth of Mr Sadler's theory—and he never said they did more—they tended to shew that the prolificness of human beings, however estimated, varied in Prussia, at these different periods, inversely to the condensation of the population. But since the publication of Mr Sadler's work, he has seen another census of Prussia, namely, that of 1819.

year 1827, in the Bulletin Universel. See how it corroborates the principle. In those provinces of Prussia where there are less than 2000 inhabitants to the "mille carré," the births to 100 marriages were 491—where there are from 2000 to 4000 on the same space, the proportion lessened to 432; where there are from 4000 to 6000 inhabitants on the same space, it sunk to 443; while in the capital the proportion was 371 only.

But farther. Between the years 1784 and 1827, the population of Prussia has considerably increased. In 1784, there were in Prussia 44,679 marriages, and 209,819 births; or a proportion of very near 470 births to every 100 marriages. In 1827, however, the marriages were 106,270, and the births 490,600; or 461 births to 100 marriages, shewing that in Prussia, as else where, the prolificness of marriages diminishes as the population condenses.

But finally, the population of Prussia, within the ten years ending with 1828, had increased about two millions. Yes, good Master Lieutenant, it had; and as we believe there were some wars, not long before that period, in which Prussia was not allowed to stand altogether aloof, you may perhaps ask Mr Sadler how this increase is reconcilable with his theory, just as you asked him, a little while ago, very foolishly we fear, to look at the increase of the Prussian population during the long peace which followed the Seven Years' War, than which you say no fact is better ascertained in history, and which, we are sure, Mr Sadler never felt the slightest intention to doubt or deny—the good old worthy and well-ascertained fact being of the most harmless description. The population of Prussia, then, within the ten years aforesaid, has increased, Mr Sadler tells us, about two millions. But "in what proportions? Taking periods of three years each, and commencing with 1819—from that year to 1822, the increase was $6\frac{2}{10}$ per cent; from 1822 to 1825, it was five per cent; from 1825 to 1828 it was $3\frac{3}{10}$ per cent: therefore the annual increase has been regularly diminishing, though the country has been all the while steadily advancing in prosperity, and receiving annually, according to Malte-Brun, a vast accession of inhabitants by emigration.

The Reviewer has not made much of his motion to Prussia. But he is off to the Netherlands—and so is Mr Sadler—and so is Christopher North.

"It is scarcely necessary," says the Reviewer, "to say any thing about the censuses of the Netherlands, as Mr Sadler himself confesses that there is some difficulty in reconciling them with his theory, and helps out his awkward explanation by supposing, quite gratuitously, as it seems to us, that the official documents are inaccurate." To this piece of impertinence, Mr Sadler thus gives the squabash. "As it was scarcely necessary to say any thing about the censuses of the Netherlands, it is a pity that what has been said is again infere misrepresentation. What he says about my supposition being gratuitous, is gratuitously 'false.' The fact is as well known as that there are censuses of the Netherlands in existence; and moreover, I refer the Reviewer, for my 'quite gratuitous' supposition, to M. Quetelet, whom, had he understood the subject on which he has ventured to write, he would have known to be the great authority on this branch of the statistics of the Pays-Bas."

And what truth may there be in the Reviewer's other assertion, "that Mr Sadler himself confesses that there is some difficulty in reconciling the censuses of the Netherlands with his theory?" Why it is as "gratuitously false" as Mr Sadler has declared the other to be; for Mr Sadler, having examined and faithfully presented us with the striking proofs which they give of the truth of his theory, so far from "confessing that he had some difficulty in reconciling them with it," says, "these, then, are the results deduced from examination of the censuses of the kingdom of the Netherlands, which superficial observers have observed negative the principle I have examined; on the contrary, they establish a species of proof in its favour, founded even on the very objections which have been urged against it, exhibiting the law of population accomplishing, with equal certainty, its ultimate designs, when the circumstances under which it operates are the most varied, and so adjusting them into a series of minute and constant adaptations, as still to regulate the increase of human beings by the space they have to possess, and the means provided for their sustentation."

Mr Sadler, then, has said and shewn, that the Reviewer went to the Netherlands for no other purpose, at least he has not attempted to effect any other, than to tell two gratuitous falsehoods.

Let us now accompany him to America—to the United States.

"The argument which Mr Sadler has drawn from the United States, will detain us but for a very short time. He has not told us—perhaps he had not the means of telling us—what proportion the number of births, in different parts of that country, bears to the number of marriages. He shews, that in the thinly peopled States, the number of children bears a greater proportion to the number of grown-up people, than in the old States; and this, he conceives, is a sufficient proof that the condensation of the population is unfavourable to fecundity. We deny the inference altogether. Nothing can be more obvious than the explanation of the phenomenon. The back settlements are, for the most part, peopled by emigration from the old States, and emigrants are almost always breeders."

Let us see how Mr Sadler smashes this basket of brittle ware.

First, why should the argument drawn from the United States, detain the Reviewer but a short time? Mr Sadler has devoted several hundred pages of his work to America, and given numerous tables. Is that large part of his work good or bad—strong or weak—true or false? A glorious opportunity does it afford—if bad, weak, and false—for the Reviewer to settle Mr Sadler; but he saw that it is good—strong—and true—and therefore, he could waste page after page of puerile, yea "maist bairnly" botheration about mere words, shying things—and is in a hurry to be off—"the United States will detain us but a very short time"—and during that very short time, why he keeps shut eyes and ears, and on his return home, begins verifying his experience, by reference to some paragraphs in pamphlets, about the back settlements.

Secondly, Mr Sadler is in no such hurry to quit the United States—nor are we—not—gentle reader—we hope are you; for Mr Sadler, having proved, by the direct evidence of the registers of the births and marriages of every country in Europe which has furnished these facts, that the prolificness of human beings, under similar circumstances, varies inversely as their condensation, proceeds, in his Care of Work, to deduce the same important principle from the statistics of America. "But why not from the registers of the births and marriages here too?" The Reviewer, with his usual candour, slyly says, 'Mr Sadler has not told us—perhaps he had not the means of telling us.' "I had not the means of telling you," replies Mr Sadler—"but for a reason of which, from your ignorance of the subject, which may be some apology for your mode of speech, you do not seem to be aware—namely, because no such lists exist."

Thirdly, the Reviewer, in the passage quoted from him, and now undergoing the process, not of gradual decay, but sudden demolition, says 'that Mr Sadler merely shews, that in the thinly peopled States, the number of children bears a greater proportion to the number of grown-up people than in the old States, and this Mr Sadler conceives, is a sufficient proof that the condensation of the population is unfavourable to fecundity.' "This," replies Mr Sadler, "is also, I regret to say, a wilful misrepresentation. I say nothing of 'grown-up people' as such—and the Reviewer again misstates my argument, for the express purpose of concealing it from those of his readers whom he hopes, by a tissue of such falsifications as these, to prevent from reading it for themselves.' But read it will be—in good time—by many thousands—in the original Work—meanwhile, what it is, shall shortly be stated in Maga.

Fourthly, then, Mr Sadler states his own proposition—which the Reviewer has barely misstated—thus: The proportion of children under ten, to the females between sixteen and forty-five—or in other words—the child-bearing women—varies inversely to the condensation of the population. Will the Reviewer dare to deny that Mr Sadler has proved this? If he do, he must at the same time deny that the children under ten in America have been born of females between sixteen and forty-five. Mr Sadler's demonstration is founded on great and uniform variations, obeying the degree of condensation of the population, and the Reviewer, preposterously as he opines on all the topics on which he blindly touches, would hardly on this occasion shuffle in the preventive check. But to be sure, there is no saying what opinions the witty father or husband—we wot not what to call him—of the lady with 1,762,300 children, may hold about the period by nature allowed for child-bearing—and it is very possible, so odd are some of his other notions—odd enough to startle the most enthusiastic of Malthusians—that infancy is not the bearer of mere dolls—nor old age the season of mere dotage—but that human beings, “to speak with strict accuracy,” never precocious or premature—and never effete—from bright-haired childhood to “hoary old,” may be, and are, actively occupied in peopling the earth.

Fifthly, the Reviewer having, as we have seen, misstated Mr Sadler's argument, let us now see how he refutes it. We must here, too, requote a few of his words. “Nothing can be more obvious than the explanation of this phenomenon. The back settlements are, for the most part, peopled by emigration from the old states—and emigrants are almost always breeders. They are almost always vigorous people in the prime of life.” Good—granted—and given to him by Mr Sadler, from whom, notwithstanding, he stole it. But though good—granted—and given to him by Mr Sadler, from whom, notwithstanding, he stole it, the observation of the Reviewer about the vigour of emigrants has nothing whatever to do with the question at issue. For the question at issue is not whether emigrants in the prime of life multiply in proportion to their numbers infinitely faster than can an entire population, consisting of due proportions of infancy, childhood, old age, weakness, and decrepitude, in short, made up of all ages and conditions of life—a fact which none but he, and the school of which he is a most ignorant disciple, ever doubted—but the question at issue is, whether an equal number of married women, from sixteen to forty-five years of age, would not, on his principle, have an equal chance of profligateness, whether they were, for example, residing in the state of Massachusetts or Missouri? In this total eclipse and irrecoverable dark—the Reviewer accounts for the great difference and variations in the prolificness of these populations, by what Mr Sadler justly calls one of the strangest reasons ever urged, and which it is indeed “difficult to keep one's countenance” (a favourite expression of countenance with the Reviewer) while reading, to wit, “that emigrants to the back settlements are almost all vigorous people in the prime of life.” They are; but pray—thou “wale o' wiseness”—is a given number of females between sixteen and forty-five, in the back settlements, more “vigorous,” more in the “prime of life,” than an equal number of precisely the same age in the other states—in the front settlements? If they are, what made them so? From what race of parents were they born? of what wondrous land are they the Antiochenes? “Had I,” says Mr Sadler, “in proof of my theory, asserted that the females migrating with their fathers or husbands, to London or Manchester, were, just as the argument demanded, more or less vigorous than those they left behind, it would have sounded somewhat paradoxical; but that they should be a younger class, though at exactly the same ages, would indeed involve a ‘phenomenon’ and yet this is the very reason which the Reviewer has assigned, why there are, in proportion to the females of the ages specified, more children under ten in the new than in the old states of America; and why the difference is constantly and precisely conformable to the variations in the density of the population! ‘Nothing can be more obvious,’ says he, ‘than this explanation of the phenomenon.’ One thing, however, is full as much so, namely, his reason for misstating my position, and for his writing ‘grown-up people’ instead of je-males between sixteen and forty-five; the truth simply stated would have exposed his 'obvious reason' to the derision which it deserves. But if the Reviewer will truly meet my position, and offer me a reason 'obvious' or occult, distinct from my principle, why, in an universally marrying country, the proportion of children compared with that of the prolific females, is greatest where the population is least, and least where the population is greatest, and why the variations in this prolificness should conform constantly, uniformly, and universally to the principle now fully explained—he will then do more than he has yet attempted. At present, the most charitable conclusion I can form regarding my antagonist, is, that he is perfectly ignorant of the subject, an opinion fully confirmed by the reckless confidence, and the amazing complacency, with which he pronounces concerning it."

Sixthly—"It is perfectly clear," says the Reviewer, "that children are more numerous in the back settlements than in the maritime states." Why so? Why should the children in the maritime states be less numerous than in the back settlements? You will not avow yourself of Mr Sadler's "reason why"—so we ask your own? Does the preventive check operate so much more powerfully in the maritime states as to account for the "phenomenon?" No. It cannot—for your school holds that the preventive check is almost unknown any where in America, and therefore surely not experienced in the most prosperous part of it. Do the children under ten years of age emigrate—in large bands adorned with flowers, and led in hymning procession by their guardian angel—unaccompanied by their parents, who from their lily or dandelion hands fling adieu-kisses to their disappearing progeny with their pretty faces turned towards the back settlements—where their vigour will be found far to surpass that of the native children of the same age, nay their very age itself to be younger than the same age of the white peccaninnies born under laws that afford an astounding specimen of the Irreducible Case? No. None of these reasonable-looking solutions is the right one. They are all plausible—but here is the true solution —and it is indeed, as Mr Sadler says, an unique. "It is perfectly clear," quoth the Reviewer, "that the most prolific people go to the uncoccupied land!" "He indeed betakes himself to miracles infinitely more monstrous than any my theory involves, even as expounded by himself. He thus finally attempts to account for the superior prolificness of the thinly-peopled states of America, by a sort of migratory principle or instinct operative on human beings, infinitely more incomprehensible than any thing that has hitherto been said to occur in the animal kingdom. It seems that in this wonderfully marrying and prolific country, those who are destined to be the most prolific, are made aware of it by a sort of second-sight, and accordingly move off to the uncoccupied parts! The argument regarding the United States, he said, should detain him but for a short time. I think it would have been wiser in him not to have been detained by it at all."

Seventhly, Mr Sadler has not yet done with the Reviewer on his Trans-atlantic trip—who seems not only to have gone and come in a steamer, but to have lived when in the new world in vapour, and since his return to the old, to have ended in smoke. "He is a poor philosopher," says Mr Sadler, "who can gravely expound a phenomenon" of a general character, by a reason which can only apply to a single instance, but which in this single instance does not apply. Other documents there are, to which the "perfectly clear reason" of the Reviewer ought to be equally applicable—but which they leave entirely in the dark. These documents Mr Sadler furnished him with in his Work—but the Reviewer saw and shied them—for they struck him blind and dumb. There are almost as many inhabitants in Ireland as there are free white persons in America. Now, many as are the circumstances to disturb those ratios of increase, in Ireland, on which Mr Sadler's argument is founded, still they are sufficiently manifest to corroborate the general conclusion, and to silence the Reviewer's objection, already however, say we, silenced as deafly as any mud-fort with a single gun and a single engineer as blind as the sand-bag behind which he in vain sought to shelter himself, was ever silenced by one discharge from a park of heavy artillery. Mr Sadler gives a table which proves this; and if he declines entering into particulars respecting towns of various population, and does not compare, for example, the small town and territory of Carrick Fergus with the metropolitan county of Ireland, it is for the same reason that induced him not to acquiesce in the solution which, we have seen, the Reviewer insisted on in an earlier part of his discourse, namely, that on Mr Sadler's principle, the town of Grandford ought to be less prolific than the borough of Southwark. Mr Sadler did not choose again to crush in that empty noddle such another crocheted, as that the inhabitants of Surrey were the most rural in the modern Arcadia, though some hundred thousands of them were comprehended—as a species of nondescripts, a queer kind of half-bred between cultivators and Cockneys—living paradoxically within the Bills of Mortality—and fearfully interred in burial-grounds—once severely taxed in that enormous city by Cobbett cycled “The Wen.” But supposing that the Reviewer were to summon up resolution to look at these tables, and that his eyes told him that the facts therein contained were true, would he then begin to draw comparisons between the “maritime and back settlement” of Ireland? Would he talk of the people of Ulster “moving off to the uncultivated land” of Munster, and so forth? Would he picture bands of emigrants more “in the prime of life,” and more “vigorous” than the natives of the spots to which they proceeded, whose print of life, and whose vigor, were necessarily the same as their own? Would he print in their faces and figures, in the daunting style of a Salvator Rosa, the consciousness, or rather the prophetic intimation, mysteriously inspired, of their superior prolificness to that of their brethren, blessed indeed with equal brouge, but not with an equal power of begetting a progeny to stock and preserve it in its race richness.

What the better is the Reviewer of having paid a visit to Prussia, the Netherlands, and America? The air of England and Ireland did not seem to suit his constitution. The poor fellow was somewhat sickly—but he is now in the last stage of a galloping consumption—not a dainty on any one of the many tables Mr Sadler has covered for him can he even taste with the tip of his tongue—and nothing is left for him but to lay him down and die—to give up the Edinburgh Review, Sadler, and the Ghost.

But we are sorry to see that he is determined to die hard—an impatient sinner. He indulges in misrepresentation in what his affrighted friends fear may be the last gasp. All unlike as the “puny whipster” is to the strong man described dying in that powerful and original poem, the Grave, by Blair, yet of him it may be said, in the last convulsions,

“See how he lyes about him!”

Mr Sadler, before proceeding to prove that his theory of population, which he has hitherto established by statistical evidence, is in unison with, or rather required by, the principles of physiology, reminds his readers of the difference between those who hold the fecundity of mankind and himself, in regard to those principles which are to form the basis of his argument. They contend—Malthus, though not Senior—that production precedes population; he, on the contrary, maintains, that population precedes production, and is the cause of it. They teach, that man breeds up to the capital, or in proportion to the abundance of food, he possesses; he asserts, that man is comparatively sterile when he is wealthy, and that he breeds in proportion to his poverty. But he tells us, that he does not mean by poverty a state of privation approaching to actual starvation, any more than the persons he opposes would contend that extreme and culpable excess is the grand patron of population. In a word, they hold, that a state of ease and affluence is the great promoter of prolificness—he maintains, that a considerable degree of labour, and even privation, is a more efficient cause of an increased degree of human fecundity.

Mr Sadler's Assailant then returns to the charge—and after saying in his usual small sneering way—a way, by the by, very common, and exceedingly disgusting in social life—"that to prove this point [what point? which one of several points?] Mr Sadler quotes Aristotle, Hippocrates, Dr Short, Dr Gregory, Dr Percival, M. Villermi, Lord Bacon, and Rousseau." He does. But now Mr Sadler has a greater authority for "this point" than any of these—that of the equally witty and wise person, whose article now in hand shews what a world this would have been, had it been produced by a fortuitous concurrence of atoms. "We will not dispute it," quoth the Oracle. But though he will not dispute—he will mangle and misrepresent it—and finding it easier and safer to buffet a dead body than a living soul, the caput mortuum of his own imagination, than the bold brow of Mr Sadler's reason, he commences his operations—thus. "The poverty of man—must (according to Mr Sadler) be in inverse proportion to their numbers." "These are his own words"—says Mr Sadler, "not mine." But let him use what words he will—can he look at Ireland, where the condition of society is perhaps presented in more appalling extremes than in any other civilized community on earth, and deny that the fact he attempts to controvert exists? "Mr Sadler tells us"—quoth he—"in one of those tables which we have already quoted, that, in the United States, the population is four to a square mile, and the fecundity 3.22 to a marriage; and that, in Russia, the population is twenty-three to a square mile, and the fecundity 4.94 to a marriage. Is the North American labourer poorer than the Russian boor? If not, what becomes of Mr Sadler's argument?" Oh! dolt! dolt! dolt! What insatiation has sent him to Russia? He asks what has become of Mr Sadler's argument? Let him go to the fourteenth chapter of the first book of Mr Sadler's Treatise, and there he will find it in all its vigour, intrenched against all attacks even of stoutest foes—let him assail it there, and like a rat he will be drowned in the ditch. "Does he not see," eloquently asks Mr Sadler, "a difference between the American freeman and the Russian slave, in every thing that gives superiority to human beings—in his origin, his information, his capital, his country—in a word, in his entire condition, physical, moral, political? And whence did he derive those advantages, but from the circumstance of his having been schooled in, and recently sprung from, the most densely peopled districts of Europe? And to his close intercourse with these, he still mainly owes his retention of them. If the Reviewer means to meet the question fairly, let him compare countries otherwise similarly circumstanced, and then see whether my position, even as he has 'announced' it, will not hold good. Let him say, for instance, whether the Russian boors would not be richer and happier, if they were liberated in their condition, and multiplied in their numbers. Or, as he seems to argue that the poverty of men must be, not in inverse, but direct proportion to their numbers, will he say, to compare nearer neighbours, whether the Russian boor is richer than the Dutch boor, who belongs to one of the most densely populated districts in the world; where, in the very same number of the Review, we are told of 'opulence and a taste for the conveniences and enjoyments of life, diffused even among the lowest classes,' and 'that at this moment the Dutch are, beyond all question, the richest and most industrious people on earth.' Or, if he compare districts of the same country, will he contend that the richest population is that which is found in the least populous parts; or, that, as the population increases, the community becomes poorer? He refers to Russia and America—is such the case in either instance? As to the latter country, the periodical valuations, which have taken place there have disproved such a supposition altogether. Hence one of their latest writers, who glories not a little in their growing numbers, nevertheless remarks, concerning the different states, that it has been calculated that 'capital accumulates with more than twice the velocity of population.'"

Miserable indeed—and wretched beyond any condition ever seen before—except perhaps, that of some poor diseased creature among one of the forlorn tribes who extract maintenance from worms wriggling from the wet wood of wreck-drift.

rarely blown on the shores of Terra del Fuego—is now the plight of our Reviewer. But though stripped to the skin—a worse fate befalls him—that skin itself is stripped off his body—yes, Mr Sadler slays him alive—and over the entire superficial “establishes a raw.”

For having, as he thinks, demolished Mr Sadler's system, nothing will satisfy him but to establish his own—having pulled down—he must needs build up—but alas! the poor mason has neither materials nor tools, nothing but heaps of rubbish and his two awkward and unhappy hands. Yet to work he sets, as if he were sole master-builder—at once architect, journeyman, and apprentice—and all the while that the shapeless rubbish is blinding his eyes with small particles of dusty lime till they water like the rheumy optics of an old woman, does he remain in the delusion that he is building—a School! Aye,—a School of Political Economy!

Mr Sadler, after proving the geometrical duplication of a given population in twenty-five years, to be impossible—and by many calculations, as he thinks, demonstrated it to be an arithmetical one—assuming too, the very degree of prolificness attributed to the Americans by Mr Malthus, or even by Dr Franklin—has then shewn, not by a series of suppositions, but of tables, that the prolificness assigned by the former to American marriages, is quite insufficient to double the population every twenty-five years, which Mr Malthus asserts has been there the very slowest increase. Why kept the Reviewer aloof from all these calculations—calculations which, even on Dr Franklin's hypothesis, that all should marry at twenty, and all the married should have eight children, of whom one-half should also live to marry at twenty, (suppositions which Dr Babbage's tables quoted by all the Economists shew to be false,) and that these again should be similarly fruitful—that no marriages whatsoever should be barren, nor any interrupted by the death of either of the parties before they had yielded their full number of children—and lastly, that all who marry should live sixty-five years each, one with another—calculations too, through a series of regular entries continued through the term of 208 years—and proving, to what Mr Sadler boldly avers is no less than a mathematical demonstration, the slowest rate of duplication contended for by this Reviewer, doglike sneaking at the heels of these supposed masters in science—to be—impossible? Why, we repeat the question, did this illustrious geometrician and arithmetician keep far aloof from all these calculations? Why did not the Wooden Spoon shew that he was worthy of standing high on the Tripod, or rather that whatever men might idly suppose, he could count his fingers, without any very long and laborious process, and declare, as if by the intuition of genius, that they were—ten, including a brace of Tom Thumbs?

Instead of thus covering his digits with glory, what does he? Why—“Keen,” says Mr Sadler, contemptuously, “as he is in checking my arithmetic, he passes over this part of my work, comprising many chapters, without a single observation, and still has ‘disposed of my principle;’ and having thus disposed of it, he goes about to contend for the opposite notion, by assuming as a fact, that which, after having examined my tables, he knows to be impossible, and proving it, by what all Europe, and I may add America, knows to be false.”

What is that? Why, that the white population of the United States does increase by 32 per cent every ten years. Mr Sadler defies him to the proof—and is willing even that he shall proceed in lending it on all the incredible—the unnatural—the impossible suppositions of Dr Franklin.

But it would puzzle Mr Babbage himself to make a calculating machine in the shape of a Wooden Spoon—and this one fresh from the hand of nature, declines the task. Yet it attempts to reason, and really in a style not a little remarkable for timber. “Our reason,” quoth the Spoon, “is this”—our reason for assuming an increase every ten years of 32 per cent. “There is in the United States a class of persons whose numbers are not increased by emigration—the negro slaves. During the interval which elapsed between the census of 1810, and the census of 1820, the change in their numbers must have been produced by procreation, and by procreation alone. Their situation, though much happler than that of the wretched beings who cultivate the sugar plantations of Trinidad and Demerara, cannot be supposed to be more favourable to health and fecundity, than that of free labourers. In 1810, the slave-trade had been but recently abolished, and there were, in consequence, many more male than female slaves—a circumstance, of course, very unfavourable to procreation. Slaves are perpetually passing into the class of free men; but no freeman ever descends into servitude—so that the census will not exhibit the whole effect of the procreation which really takes place. We find, by the census of 1810, that the number of slaves in the Union was then 1,191,000—in 1820, they had increased to 1,538,000—that is to say, in ten years they had increased 29 per cent—within 3 per cent of that rate of increase, which would double the number in twenty-five years. We may, we think, fairly calculate, that if the female slaves had been as numerous as the males, and if no manumissions had taken place, the census of the slave population would have exhibited an increase of ten per cent in ten years."

The folly and ignorance of this is indeed portentous. That increase which Mr Sadler has shown to be impossible, under all the suppositions of Dr Franklin, who created a golden age, in which people had nothing else to do but propagate, and to propagate from earliest puberty on to green old age, in neither sex becoming impotent or effete—this mimic believes to have been realized by negro slaves, in an American house of bondage, in spite of numbers of them perpetually passing into the class of freemen, and in spite of the comparative scarcity of females in proportion to males, a circumstance which he very profoundly remarks, is "of course very unfavourable to procreation!"

But every single statement or assertion, in this, "our reason," is false. Do not mind the lines in Italics. Mr Sadler tears to pieces the whole concern.

In the first place, the female slaves were, at a nubile age, as numerous as the males, which we kindly mention, just that the Reviewer may see that he can't open his mouth, but out comes a mistake.

For, even if the computation be made to commence at fourteen, instead of about sixteen, and to end at twenty-six, the whole difference between the males and females at that age, in a population of above a million and a half, is only 652. Our arithmetician does not see this, but Mr Sadler does; and so, at his pointing out, does all the world, but the Wooden Spoon.

Secondly, The Reviewer says, "And if no manumissions had taken place." What have manumissions to do with the matter? Nothing. Do manumitted slaves not propagate? They do—and none the worse or less frequently, one would think, for manumission. Add, then, the free coloured population, and the slave population, in 1810, and in 1820, and the deuce is in it, if you do not get at all the manumissions. Now, the total number in 1810, is 1,377,810; and, in 1820, it is 1,771,638, actually giving a less increase than that in the slaves only, instead of amounting, as it ought to do, on the principle of the Reviewer, to 32 per cent! "I can retort the Reviewer's compliment, with the utmost sincerity," adds Mr Sadler; "he is, indeed, a bad arithmetician."

Thirdly, "Slaves," says the Reviewer, "are perpetually passing into manumission." Be it so. "I hope and believe," says Mr Sadler, "this to be the case in America and to a considerable degree. But the Reviewer does not mean to say, that, in gaining their freedom, they lose their country or their colour. There they are; and included among another class of persons in North America, the free-coloured population,—to which I have in vain directed the Reviewer's attention in the volumes under criticism. I will make another attempt. As the number of them is not more than a sixth or a seventh of that of the slaves, it is very obvious, that the constant passing of numbers, however moderately estimated, from the large to the small community, must have had a great effect upon the increase of the latter. Now, the free coloured population have women enough among them to satisfy even the Reviewer's ideas on the subject. The number of these free coloured inhabitants, of both sexes and of all ages, in 1810, was 186,446; in 1820, it amounted to 233,530; having, therefore, increased, during that period, something above 25 per cent. But to take the very lowest supposition regarding manumissions, at how much smaller an increase than that must he arrive, when we calculate that which has taken place from procreation only! Thus, then, the population of America contains within itself a distinct class, exhibiting those results which completely overturn all the fables which have been uttered regarding American increase 'by procreation, and by procreation alone.'"

Fourthly, Now for the squabash. The Reviewer has most audaciously said, that, between 1810 and 1820, "the numbers of the slaves in the United States were not increased by emigration." The assertion is false; and if the Reviewer did not know it to be so, he is the most ignorant man now extant. Is there a man, asks Mr Sadler, who is not aware, that long after the act of Congress of the 2d of March, 1807, and up to a very recent date, if not even to the present hour, the slave-trade has been carried on in America to a prodigious extent? Why, the proceedings of the legislature, and of the courts of justice there, give witness to the fact. In Congress, several acts have been passed between 1810 and 1820, of which the object was the suppression of the slave-trade. On the 10th of May, 1820, Congress passed an act constituting the offence piracy, and in spite of the aversion of the legislature of that country to capital punishments, adjudging those found guilty to suffer death! Nor has even that law, with such a penalty annexed to its violation, been found effectual; for, in 1821, in a report of the House of Representatives, we find, that "it is still a melancholy fact, that the disgraceful practice is now carried on to a surprising extent!" In April, 1822, a committee of the Senate declare, "The African slave-trade now prevails to a great extent." Mr Sadler does not say that this nefarious trade, so extensively carried on by the Americans during the period in question, was directed to the supply of the home-market exclusively—he is too well-informed on the whole question to say so; neither does he attempt to extricate the proportion of it that was so engaged. But he refers the Edinburgh Reviewer to the American Reviewer, who says, "in 1824, the laws were still found to be imperfect, as they neither afforded a sufficient check to the trade of American citizens on the coast of Africa, nor provided any means of redeeming and restoring to their country the unfortunate victims who might, in violation of the laws, be introduced into the States." Indeed, distinct information has been frequently given, and from undoubted authority, of the different stations where, and the various channels through which, it has been conducted, and imports of slaves effected into the Southern States.

That the actual number of slaves introduced between the years 1810 and 1820—during which period the intimated Reviewer says there were none at all—was vast, is most certain. In the report of the American Society for colonizing Free People of Colour, for the year 1821, it is stated, that in the course of twenty-five years, during one half of which period the Reviewer asserts that the import had entirely ceased, 1,200,000 slaves have been imported from Africa! The report of a Committee of the House of Representatives states the "average annually withdrawn from Western Africa to be a mean somewhere between fifty and eighty thousand!" Now, what is the sole object of the American Colonization Society? The re-emigration of the blacks. And why should Congress have assisted that Society, in that attempt, and also put forth a similar estimate in proof of its absolute necessity, if America had not fully shared in these immense African importations?

Fifthly, Now for the squabash of squabashes. The Reviewer, to prove his position that the American slave population doubled itself in twenty-five years, or nearly so, by procreation alone, asserted, as we have now seen, in the face of all evidence, that there was no importation of slaves between 1810 and 1820. But, grant for a moment that this monstrous falsehood is a truth, and let Mr Sadler be let loose upon him as he lies behind that position. Why, if the importation of slaves between 1790 and 1800 was unlimited, which nobody is denying, and between 1810 and 1820 it had totally ceased; and if the laws of nature were not reversed during these periods, merely to serve the Reviewer's argument, and to render America in this respect "independent of commerce," would not, Mr Sadler asks, the increase between 1790 and 1800 have been vastly greater than that between 1810 and 1820? But, alas! and alack-a-day for the simpleton, it is absolutely less! The number of the slaves in 1790 was 697,697; in 1800, 896,849, exhibiting an increase of 28 per cent. But in 1810 they amounted to 1,191,364, and in 1820, 1,538,128, or an increase of 29 per cent. And still the Reviewer argues, with figures like these before him, and against facts of the most striking and "notorious description," that the increase in the latter period was "from procreation only."

Finally, Now for the squabash of all squabashes, intensified beyond itself into something for which squabash is an inadequate appellation. In the slave-holding states, it appears, that there are astonishing irregularities in their increase—and we might almost say, decrease. They cannot be said to be owing to variations, surely, in procreation—more especially by the Reviewer, and the school in which he is hoody of the lowest form—who all contend with so much pertinacity for an arbitrary and fixed ratio of human increase, under all circumstances, as a law of nature. Now, in the states in which it is well known that the law of abolition has been in a great measure operative, little increase, and in one of them a positive decrease, has taken place; but in the new slave-holding states, where it is as notorious as the sun at noonday, that that trade has been actively pursued, there have these varying and vast augmentations occurred. Mr Sadler gives us a table from which it appears, that in the district of Colombia,—in which we are assured the slaves are exceedingly well treated, marry universally, and in which slave-labour and service is constantly preferred,—and where on that as well as on many other accounts, we may rest assured that the slaves are increased by other means than procreation only—a fact, indeed, to which Dr Torrey bears witness—still the increase there in this favoured Colombia—is little more than half of what it ought to be on the Reviewer's hypothesis—it being but 18 per cent instead of 32—while in Missouri again, it has been 239—and in Illinois 445. The table contains all the slave-holding states of the great American republic—with the rate of increase of the slave population in each, during the periods 1790—1800, and 1810—1820. To these Mr Sadler adds—separately—Alabama—which in 1820 contained 41,579 slaves, claimed by the Reviewer as the product of "American procreation alone," though in 1816, the total number was only 10,494, giving an increase, therefore, of about 300 per cent in—four years! "Procreation alone," indeed! Why they must at least have imported one propagator—the daughter, with all her mother's powers and charms, of the Reviewer's lady, with the small family, as we say in Scotland, meaning a large family of small children—the Reviewer's lady who sat, like the myriad-breasted Cybele, with 1,762,500 children round her knees!

The Reviewer, we think, had better never return to England, but, becoming a citizen of the United States, remain in America all the rest of his days. Nay, perhaps, since he so greatly admires the slave population there, who are not only "so much happier than the wretched beings who cultivate the sugar plantations of Trinidad and Demerara," but increase their numbers by "procreation alone," in a style which sets all imitation on the part of free labourers at defiance, bidding

"Europe and her pallid sons go weep," who knows but he may become himself a Slave Proprietor, and crack his finger and his thumb at the Anti-slavery Reporter, the African Institution, and at all that his friend Thomas Babington Macaulay has written and spoken against all sorts of slavery, and in favour of all sorts of liberty all over the world?

We must now bid the Reviewer farewell. We wished to have shown how Mr Sadler has proved that his ignorance of the British Peerage is equal to his ignorance of the American slaveage; but we cannot encroach on another sheet, having limited the Double Number of Maga to 288 pages—enough surely to satisfy the maw of the most greedy subscriber.

A very few words—at parting—with the Public. Pamphlets seldom or never sell very widely—and therefore Mr Sadler's assailant has hitherto had a great advantage over him, in the circulation of his wit, wisdom, and erudition. But now Mr Sadler is on something more, perhaps, than an equality with him there; and we call upon the Public to judge between the combatants. We also call upon the Periodical Press to do Mr Sadler justice—if not for his own sake, for that of the best interests of mankind. The settlement of such a question cannot be barren of consequences to Society; on all hands it is admitted to bear most powerfully on the welfare and well-being of the State. There may be others, but we have not seen any thing like justice done to Mr Sadler by any of the London newspapers, except the Atlas and the Standard. In the Atlas appeared an enlightened view of his doctrines very soon after the publication of the work; and we do not doubt that the same able writer will continue to defend and vindicate the cause of Truth. The great talents of the Editors of the Standard are well known, and such a daily paper has it in its power to expose, widely, the ignorance and presumption of the spiteful persecutors of a man who is one of the brightest ornaments of this age. We shall go hand in hand, and heart with heart, with such allies, in the support of principles, of which the maintenance is essential to the liberties of the land—the civilisation of the species.

The Reviewer has accused Mr Sadler of carrying on his controversy with Mr Malthus, "with all the license of the seventeenth century"—and adds, "We are quite as little afraid of a contest, in which quarter shall be neither given nor taken, as he. But we would advise him seriously to consider, before he publishes the promised continuation of his work, whether he be not one of that class of writers who stand peculiarly in need of the candour which he insults, and who would have most to fear from that unsparing severity which he practises and recommends."

Nothing can be more ludicrous than the sight of these words now; and as the Reviewer—in spite of the buffeting and bastinadoing he has received at the hands of Mr Sadler, whom, without any provocation—for how could that gentleman have insulted him?—he attacked with all the license of the nineteenth century—will probably be instigated, by the bruises under which he must still be smarting, to return to the charge,—it is our intention to be present at the conflict, to see fair play, and to record the issue. In a former number of the Edinburgh Review, "Malthus is backed against Sadler—more fearful odds than any offered at Tattersall's." We know not if that celebrated courser is going to start for the stakes; but should he, and also Auchingoul, and half-a-dozen untried horses besides—we back Sadler ten to one against the field; odds which we believe never were offered at Tattersall's, but which were offered, but not taken, in the days of Eclipse. We also offer a thousand to one—meaning thereby a thousand gold sovereigns glowing from the mint, to one brass shilling, pale from the pot—against Reviewer.

ON THE FRENCH REVOLUTION, AND PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

NO. III.

"WHAT surprised me most," says the elder Segur, "on my return from Russia to Paris in 1790, after an absence of four years, was the sudden metamorphosis which many of our ci-devant philosophers had undergone, and the vehemence with which they declaimed against a revolution which they had been mainly instrumental in producing. They could only endure their own doctrines, it would appear, in theory. One day some one reproached the Abbé Sabatier with his ill humour at the States General, which he had been the first to demand, and of which he was in reply the father—'True,' he replied, 'but they have changed my States General at nurse.'"*

These words convey a brief abstract of what has occurred in all sudden changes of the form or equilibrium of government, with a view to extend the power or ascendancy of the lower orders. Universally it will be found, that "the States General have been changed at nurse." The principles adopted by the populace, when they become the electors, have gone so far beyond what was contemplated or intended by the first promoters of the measure, that they could no longer recognise their own offspring, and found, with anguish, that a spurious, base-born progeny had been substituted in its room.

Yielding to the popular clamour, and in the hope of regulating the movement of the revolution, Necker granted a liberal parliamentary reform to France. He doubled the number of popular representatives, by a royal ordinance, six months before the meeting of the States General in 1789. It is impossible to study, with sufficient minuteness, the consequences of this great concession, because it was adopted from precisely the same views as the reform now so much the object of discussion. The proceedings of the Constituent Assembly, are the picture of the unavoidable consequences of such sudden additions to popular power—the pacification of France, the prototype of what may be anticipated from the great supposed tranquillizing measure of the British empire.

The first measure of the reformed Parliament of France, was to compel the House of Peers to sit and vote with them in one assembly, which at once rendered the common omnipotent, because they outnumbered the peers two to one.

The next step was, to confiscate

* Segur's Memoirs, vol.

the whole property of the church to the service of the state, reserving only a miserable pittance to the ministers of religion.

The third, to give a right of voting at elections for the legislature to every man in France who was major, not a pauper, and worth the produce of three days' labour.

The fourth, to abolish all titles of honour, and privileges attached to land of every description.

The fifth, to put all offices under government—judges, bishops, prefects, mayors, magistrates, officers in the national guard, into the immediate gift of the whole people.

The sixth, to confiscate the whole property of such of the emigrant nobles as failed, by a certain day, to return to France.

The seventh, to issue a paper currency on the credit of the confiscated landed property, which soon fell to a discount of one-fiftieth of the sum for which it was originally issued. In other words, an assignat, originally worth fifteen francs, fell to the value of one franc.

These violent convulsions produced, as their natural consequence, a prodigious embarrassment of the finances, and diminution of the public revenue. The national income, which in 1789 was £ 21,000,000 sterling, fell in 1790 to £ 17,000,000. It was found impracticable to continue paying the dividends on the public debt, notwithstanding the lavish confiscation of land which took place for behoof of the treasury, and some years after, the revolutionary government solved the difficulty, by striking off, at one blow, two-thirds of the national debt, in other words, destroying two-thirds of the uninvested capital of the kingdom.

It might have been imagined, that these concessions would have satisfied the warmest advocate for freedom in France. According to the argument of the conceders, tranquillity, unanimity, and happiness should have prevailed, for the people had got every thing for which they contended. Was this the case? Were the succeeding years of France distinguished by harmony, unanimity, and prosperity? The Constituent Assembly expired, and a new legislature, framed on the principle of universal suffrage, convened. The whole corporations of France were dissolved, and the magistrates of every description chosen by the universal suffrage of the inhabitants. The freest discussion of every thing went forward—all restrictions were thrown down—the majestic body of the people installed in the full possession of sovereignty—and the fairest trial given to democracy which the world had ever beheld.

The first effect of this universal enfranchisement was to rouse the democratic spirit to the very uttermost through all France. The people would no longer brook any control or government from their superiors. To be in office, to hold power, was a sufficient ground for unpopularity; and all the ministers who were successively placed at the head of affairs were dismissed, after an unprosperous reign of a few months. Next, the legislature itself, the creature of public favour, the darling of the democracy—the assembly, purged of all aristocratic influence, in which neither the king nor the nobles had returned a single member, fell into universal obloquy. The whole history of the Legislative Assembly was that of a general conspiracy to overthrow the representatives of the people, by the very persons who had seated them in power.

This insurrection at length took place; the people broke loose on the governors they had chosen for themselves, and the 10th August overturned at once the throne, the legislature, and the altar. The municipality of Paris, albeit chosen by the universal suffrage of the householders of that great city, was possessed as not sufficiently democratic, and a new and more determined set of men seated in their stead. The National Convention ensued, during which the very elements of society seemed to be falling to pieces. The new municipality of Paris, within three weeks after they had entered upon their functions, hired a band of murderers to massacre all the captives in the prisons; and within three days 6000 innocent victims were slain by the populace. The sovereign multitude would not delegate to others the holy work of extermination; with their own hands they hewed down the victims who were let loose from jail, to be baited by the dogs of the Revolution. Shouts of joy rent the air as they fell, screaming, beneath the blows of the people; while benches were prepared for the neighbouring "gentlemen and ladies" to behold the spectacle, and bands of drunken cannibals danced like furies of hell round the dead bodies of the slain. Mounted on a pile of dead, Billaud Varennes exclaimed, "This day, illustrious citizens, you have risen above yourselves; continue your glorious work; a louis d'or is prepared for every one who joins in the holy enterprise; assert the majesty of the people, and let every blow which descends strike terror into the sanguinary despots who are preparing to enslave us."

The dissolution of every other tie in society tends to strengthen the last and greatest, that of terror.—Anarchy leads to despotism; amidst the strife of contending multitudes, a few men of iron arise, who rule with bloody sway their trembling subjects. Danton, St Just, and Robespierre, were the natural result of the Revolution—of that universal frenzy, which, dissolving all other ties, brings men back to the unerring and unextinguishable instinct of self-preservation. The Reign of Terror, the establishment of five hundred Bastilles in France, the daily execution of an hundred victims in Paris, the immuring of two hundred thousand captives in the revolutionary dungeons, were the natural and inevitable consequences of the sudden and fatal concession of power to the people.

Well might Sabatier exclaim, they had changed his States-General at nurse. But if he said this in 1790, when the ferment was beginning—when every thing was as yet cœur de rose, when philanthropy was in every mouth, when the people were exulting in their new-born sovereignty, when the regeneration of society was still fondly anticipated, when no blood had as yet been shed, what would he have said in 1794, when darkness, thick as midnight, had settled over France, when her best and bravest had perished on the scaffold, when her people, in sullen despair, writhed under the famine which their violence had created, or sunk under the agony which their passions had produced. "The strongest of all human instincts," says Freron, himself one of the warmest of the republicans, "was fast giving way under the protracted suspense of the Reign of Terror. Death itself seemed preferable to the incessant apprehension of it."

Symptoms of this terrible progress being about to commence may already be seen in this country. Since the question of reform was agitated as a party measure in November last, what extraordinary progress the principles of anarchy have made in the minds of the people! How easily proposals are entertained, and projects canvassed, which, a year ago, would have excited the well-founded alarm of every thinking man! The vote by ballot is demanded with loud cries in all the popular meetings, a reform which does not, at the very least, disfranchise the rotten boroughs, and give a vote to every householder in every great town, is spoken of as worse than nothing. The property of the church is already marked out as the first victim; and hints, not obscure, are thrown out, that no relief can be effectual till the landlord is cut down. All these wild and extravagant ideas have been set afloat within three months by the mere prospect of concession to the people. Till that was held out, no such ideas were prevalent. The nation was thinking nothing about reform in June last. History will not fail to record that remarkable fact. All the subsequent outcry has arisen from the acquisition of power by the populace in Paris, and the prospect of its acquisition by the hewers in this country.

It is a total mistake to suppose, as the reformers all endeavour to represent, that the fall of the Duke of Wellington's ministry was owing to his declaration against reform. That, no doubt, stirred up a host of newspaper writers against him, but the vote in the House of Commons was occasioned by very different and many concurring causes. The first of these was the original and fatal secession of a large portion of the Tories at the time of Mr Canning's elevation to power. This divided them into distinct bodies, actuated by no small rancour at each other, at the very time when the antagonists were hourly increasing in vigour, and indefatigable in their endeavours to gain proselytes. The second was the emancipation of the Catholics; a measure which, as it jarred on the strongest feelings of our nature, excited the most vehement animosities among the partisans of administration. The third, the successful issue of the Paris revolt, which awakened the revolutionary ardour of the democratical, and blinded the eyes of a large proportion of the conservative party.

These causes, but especially the fatal schism consequent on the emancipation of the Catholics, had so much weakened the supporters of the Wellington administration, that it was foreseen by all persons at all acquainted with Parliamentary tactics, that it could not stand the first shock of a new parliament. Indeed, it is well known, that, in the preceding session, they had existed on a kind of tolerance only; and that, in the divisions on the King's speech in spring 1830, they would have been thrown into a minority, but for the desertion of Mr Hobhouse and a large portion of the Whigs, avowedly done to prevent Ministers being outvoted. Every member of Parliament knew, before the reform question was ever agitated, that Ministers would be in a minority on the first important division. Such were the consequences of the divisions among the Tories, and the heart-burnings consequent on the adoption of a measure hostile to the feelings of a large and respectable part of their number.

"Il ne faut pas nous fâcher," said Napoleon, "des choses passées." We refer to these facts merely as disproving the assertion, that it was the popular wish for Reform which overturned the Duke of Wellington's ministry. It fell owing to very different causes; prior concession was its original bane; grasping at popularity its inherent vice; the division among its friends the immediate cause of its overthrow.

In truth, nothing has so completely demonstrated the appalling danger of Reform, as the effect which has resulted from the prospect even of obtaining it. The vehemence of the democratic faction, the vigour of the revolutionary press, the extravagance of the levelling party, have been quaidrupled since it was announced as a Cabinet question by the present Ministry. We are much mistaken if Lord Grey has not already found that his Reform has been changed at nurse.

The mania for Reform is now quite equal to the rage for joint-stock companies five years ago. We all recollect the mischief done by the warm and enthusiastic colouring which Lord Goderich, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, gave to the prospects of the nation at the commencement of 1824. Similar and greater disasters are threatened by the vigorous exertions made in favour of Reform at this time by the radical faction. It is not now individual fortunes which are likely to be ruined, but the institutions of society which are threatened with overthrow—the whole capital of the kingdom which is likely to become the victim of spoliation. If the measure be at all successful, no prudence or moderation on the part of Government will be able to prevent its consequences. They will speedily fall under the tempest they have excited, the moment they attempt to moderate its fury.

No argument is more frequently urged by the Reformers, and none is more utterly unfounded, than that the concession of Reform is the only way to prevent a revolution. In truth, there is no danger whatever of such a catastrophe but from its adoption.

We would widely err if we estimated the opinion of the really influential and respectable portion of the community, from the speeches at public meetings, or the intemperate discussions of the daily press. The quiet and inoffensive citizens do not frequent such assemblies; they detest the strife of the forum, and form their opinion by their firesides, from the obvious tendency of the proposed measure upon their interests and fortunes. The speeches of the violent reformers have fortunately unfolded their views: they see, that though a moderate and rational reform is contemplated by Ministers, most immoderate and irrational changes are looked for by the great bulk of their followers. They see, moreover, that even if the wisdom of the Cabinet were to reject all such extravagant projects at this time, the evil is only postponed, not removed;—that the ground now gained by the levelling party, would immediately be intrenched, and made the point from which future attacks would be directed against the constitution;—and that within a few years, every outwork would successively be lost, and the bulwark of order assailed from the very posts which had been established for its defence.

It is a trite observation, but not the less true, that the inroads of popular ambition are like the letting out of the waters: a child's hand can at first repair the chink in the dyke; but when the aperture is enlarged, and the flood has begun to rush through, the strength of a nation is unequal to the task. We need not turn to the French Revolution for a proof of this eternal truth. The history of the last three months demonstrates it in this country. The theme of all the reform meetings, the boast of all the democratic press, that "the cause of reform is making such rapid progress, that it is advancing with unheard of velocity, that you might as well stop the fall of Niagara as arrest its course," only demonstrates the extreme peril of agitating such subjects, and the inundation of revolutionary changes with which we would be overwhelmed if the projects of the reformers, even to the smallest extent, were carried into execution.

Of all the errors which are boldly put forth by the democratical party, and which, by constant repetition, impose upon the uninformed, there is none more extraordinary than the assertion, that the French Revolution was owing to the resistance made to popular reform. The fact is diametrically the reverse: its horrors were not owing to resistance, but concession. "The life of Louis XVI," says Mignet, the ablest of the republican historians, "was one uninterrupted course of ameliorations, without any good result. He fell under his projects of reform, as another monarch might have been expected to do from their refusal."^{*} "History will record," said Tronchet, in the eloquent peroration of his speech in defence of Louis, "that the king ascending the throne at 20 years of age, gave a shining example of morality, justice, and economy: he dishonoured it by no weakness, no corrupt passion, and he was the constant friend of the people. The people wished that a destructive tax should be removed—he removed it: they wished the abolition of servitude—he abolished it: they demanded reforms—he granted them: they wished to change the laws—he consented to it: they wished that millions of Frenchmen should recover their rights—he restored them: they demanded freedom—he gave it: no one can dispute that he had the glory of anticipating his people in sacrifices, and now he is himself demanded as such!—Citizens! I add no more; I pause before the Genius of history; but recollect that she will judge of your decision, and that hers will be the voice of ages." Well might the historian add, "it was all in vain: the passions were deaf, and incapable of foresight."[†]

In truth, whoever attentively considers the influence of passion on human conduct, and the history of revolutions, will be at no loss to perceive, that such consequences must necessarily result from the sudden concession of power to the people. On the verge of a revolution, and for years preceding it, the passions of all classes are roused, and of course the voice of reason is unheard. We have only to look, therefore, to the causes which inflame the passions of the individual, to discover what will convulse the frame of society in such circumstances. Now, what inflames the passion of love, or hope, or revenge? The prospect of success, and the near approach of gratification. The desire for reform with which all revolutions are more or less allied, is influenced by the same causes. It is repressed by the absence, and stimulated by the presence of hope. Meet it manfully, shew a determined front to the designs of the innovators, and the passion for change which, like love, lives only on hope, speedily dies. Concede any thing, rouse expectation of future acquisition, and the tempest of anarchy is at hand.

Let no one delude himself with the opinion, that there is no danger of a revolution in this country, because we have not the real grievances to complain of which weighed down the French peasantry prior to the first revolution. He is but a novice in history who imagines that real grievances have much influence in producing revolutions. It is not experienced evil which excites the passions, but anticipated power. In no part of the world is oppression so severe as in Turkey; but in none is a revolution less likely: in none is it felt so little as in England, but in none is the revolutionary spirit in a certain class more powerful. France had not, for centuries, enjoyed such general prosperity as from 1815 to 1830; but the government under which all these advantages had been experienced, was annihilated, without any practical evil being felt, the moment it attempted to invade the influence of the people.

^{*} Mignet, i. 13.

[†] Ibid. l. 23.

The state into which society has grown in Great Britain, in consequence of the immense extent of our manufacturing establishments, renders our population in a peculiar manner open to the seduction of revolutionary principles. Hundreds of thousands of men are assembled within a narrow compass, incessantly kept in communication with each other, and fed by the intemperate discussions of the public press. When they are told that all their distress is owing to the borough-mongers—that justice, equality, and universal prosperity, would immediately follow reform—that the public burdens would be instantly reduced by a popular parliament, is it surprising, if they imbibe revolutionary principles, and become ripe for any convulsion? In England, property is more unequally divided than in any other country in the world: 1,800,000 persons are stated by Colquhoun to be vagrants and paupers, while the great bulk of the national property is in the hand of a comparatively small number of individuals. The land is almost entirely engrossed by a few hundred great proprietors, and the labourers have seldom any fixed interest in the soil. This is a most dangerous state of society; at least as likely to lead to a convulsion as the old régime in France.

But if the condition of a large portion of the people renders the spread of revolutionary principles unavoidable, the state of another affords the best security against their excesses. All that is necessary, is to rouse this great but inert mass into action. The higher and more enlightened classes possess a vigour and determination, a habit of acting for themselves, and combining for the public security, which do not belong to the aristocracy of any other country. The moment property is endangered, the most respectable part of the middling ranks will join them. The most unthinking must perceive, that if the property of the freeholders is menaced, (and reform, notwithstanding all the efforts of Ministry, would speedily lead to that,) public credit is gone: that every bank in the island would break—every man's creditors be instantly brought upon him, and universal bankruptcy deprive the lower orders of their only means of subsistence. The only danger consists in this powerful body being disunited: in timidity paralyzing their ranks, and division of opinion rendering them incapable of any exertions for the common cause. Now, therefore, is the time: this is the moment to come forward, and steadily resist all those projects which, commencing with reform, would terminate with revolution. As yet, they are the ruling party; a powerful demonstration of strength, a triumphant vote in Parliament, would at once dispel the danger: if they recedent from their posts, or disunited, all the efforts of patriotism may hereafter be unable to avert unheard of public calamities.

It is worthy of especial consideration, what would be the consequence of any sudden accession, however small, to the influence of the popular party in the House of Commons. If twenty boroughs, now in the hands of the aristocracy, are disfranchised, and the representations given to twenty considerable unrepresented towns, there will be forty votes added to the popular, and forty subtracted from the aristocratic side. This, of itself, is sufficient to overturn the constitution. No one can doubt, that the whole, or nearly the whole, members returned by these great towns would be on the popular side. Every one knows with what difficulty the aristocracy maintain their ground against the encroachments of their opponents, even under the present constitution of the House of Commons: what would they do if forty were withdrawn from their ranks, and added to those of their enemies?

When we use the word aristocracy, we mean the possessors of property, the higher classes generally, and not the titled proprietors in particular. In this sense, it includes all those whose expenditure and influence vivifies and directs the remainder of society.

No argument can be more unfounded than that which contends, that because the peers have a separate house of their own, therefore they should be excluded from any share in the commons, and that that branch of the Legislature should be yielded up entirely to the popular representatives. Whatever the theory of the constitution may have been, its working, as Delolme long ago observed, is, that the three powers balance themselves in the House of Commons. It is there that the real struggle is fought, and the equipoise of the constitution maintained. Nothing could be more discordant to society, more dangerous in its sequences, than to see the House of Peers and the House of Commons arrayed in open contest with each other. The urging the ambition of the populace, the other actuated by the tenacity of the aristocracy. The example of France proves, that such a contest could not go on, without the peace of the state being endangered, and blood flowing from the collision of such opposing bodies. But if the peers are to be deprived of all influence in returning members for the lower house, how is such a collision to be prevented? If the House of Commons is composed of mere popular representatives, the aristocracy must either resign the struggle, or defend themselves within the precincts of their own branch of the legislature. And thus, on all the numerous questions in which the interests of the different classes of society run counter to each other—in the corn laws, the regulations of trade, the church tithes, &c., the indecent and ruinous spectacle would be presented of one branch of the legislature arrayed in open hostility against the other. All this is prevented at present, by the unobtrusive and unnoticed contests between these different classes which go on in the House of Commons; and of this immense advantage we should be deprived, if reform were carried.

Farther, the supporters of reform forget that the peers are disqualified for such a contest by the important circumstance, that, by immemorial custom, they are excluded from the management of the public purse; and, consequently, do not possess the means of maintaining their ground against their adversaries. It is quite evident, that a body, possessing the exclusive control of a revenue of £50,000,000, would speedily annihilate one that could reckon on nothing but the revenue of their private estates. Without supposing that they actually came to blows, the influence and ascendancy of the Commons, from this circumstance, would be paramount. In all societies of men, those who keep the purse speedily become the ruling power.

Are, then, the reformers prepared to concede to the House of Peers an equal share with the Commons, in originating, modifying, or negating money bills? Are they willing to have a Chancellor of Exchequer in the House of Lords, whose jurisdiction and powers are to be co-extensive with those of the same office in the House of Commons? And on what principle of justice can this be denied to the aristocracy, if they are to be deprived of the boroughs which alone permit them to be represented in the money assembly of the lower house? At present they are represented, because the members returned from their boroughs attend to their interests in the matter of taxation: but if they are deprived of their members, who is to attend to their interests? Certainly it will not be the members for the great cities, for they will be instructed by their constituents to lay as large a portion of taxation as possible on the nobility. Certainly it will not be the county members, for they will be sufficiently burdened with the maintenance of the interests of the commoner proprietors, without adopting those of the other branch of the Legislature. Certainly it will not be the tribunes of the people, for they will be incessantly waging war with the aristocracy. Thus the result will be, that the greatest mass of property in the country must remain unrepresented in an assembly, disposing, with absolute sway, of the powers of taxation, and professing to represent all the great interests in the community.

The aristocracy, say the reformers, return a large proportion of the House of Commons. This is the eternal theme of complaint; and such a state of things is said to be an entire perversion of the object of the popular branch of the legislature. Unquestionably they do, and unquestionably they ought ever so to do. The greatest proprietors in the country ought to return the largest part of the representatives who are to dispose of the money concerns of the whole community.

The objection is founded entirely on the sound of words. It is inconsistent with freedom, say the reformers, that the peers should return any considerable number of members in the House of Commons. Call the House of Commons "the Finance Committee of the Nation," which it really is in the matter which we are now discussing; and the tautology of the objection is at once apparent. Can any thing be more reasonable, than that the persons who have the greatest interests at stake, should have the principal voice in the management of the common purse?

Suppose an objection were made to the proceedings of a copartnery, or a body of creditors on a bankrupt estate, upon the ground that the greatest partners, or the largest creditors, had contrived to get a preponderating influence in the management of the common stock; would such an objection be tenable? Does not the law of every country, the practice of every copartnery, the common sense of mankind, demonstrate that such a result is indispensable for the common good? And what else is it that is so much complained of in the influence of peers in the House of Commons?

But property, it is urged, would still have its weight, even under the reformed system: its influence can never be destroyed: what is desired is not to deprive it of its just preponderance, but of the undue ascendancy which it has acquired.

The private, or, as they are called, the rotten boroughs, are the channel by which this influence is now exercised, and it is this channel which it is proposed to stop up. If it be removed, in what way is the influence of property to be felt, except by bribing the electors? It is quite clear there is no other means of attaining the object: for experience has demonstrated, that when the elective franchise is generally thrown open, the lower orders become inaccessible to any other influence from the higher. In America, under the system of universal suffrage and vote by ballot, men of the greatest fortunes cannot command a single vote; their own menial servants vote against them. In France, upon the dissolution of the Constituent Assembly in 1791, the experiment was tried on a great scale, of the effect of universal suffrage; and the consequence was, that not one member was returned in the interest of the crown or the nobility. "The influence of the aristocracy," says Lacretelle, "was totally sunk in the Legislative Assembly; not one deputy was returned either in their interest, or that of the throne."* In so far, therefore, as experience goes, there is no reason to believe that wealth would possess any influence upon elections, if the elective franchise were considerably extended, except through the medium of actual corruption.

Bribery, it is said, is the immoral influence of wealth. Its genuine and legitimate influence is independent of such base expedients, and will remain the same under any, even the most liberal, system of government.† The argument is plausible, and has been ably put; but its sophistry is apparent upon attending to a well-known distinction.

Great possessions in the country, and among the rural population, unquestionably secure a certain degree of influence, if the landlords are resident among their tenantry, and conduct themselves with an ordinary degree of humanity towards the poor.

If England were composed, as it once was, of such a peasantry, there would be comparatively little danger in reform. But the case is widely different with the manufacturers in towns, or with the manufacturing population in country villages. They have no sympathy with their employers—they are bound to them by no ties of affection—swayed by no feelings of common advantage. The landlord generally knows his tenantry, and the connexion between them descends from father to son: the master manufacturer knows nothing of his operatives, and his employment of them is often as transient as their affections. History, in every age, has recorded examples of the country proprietors taking the field, supported by their tenantry; but it has none to produce of manufacturers appearing, backed by their workmen, except in support of revolutionary projects. Santerre, and the great manufacturers of the Faubourg St Antoine, came forth at the head of their terrific bands of pikemen, to besiege the National Convention, and attend the cars that led the victims from the prisons to the guillotine: but on none but such occasions have the manufacturing classes been in the least swayed by their employers.

It is impossible it should ever be otherwise. Large bodies of men, when assembled together, are always governed by their passions: the manufacturers, from being permanently put in close contact with each other, are everlastingly in the condition of a mob. Attachment to their superiors or employers they have none; jealousy and animosity towards them they have in abundance. The radical press rapidly circulates through their dense columns, incessantly stimulating their passions, and urging them to measures of hostility to the higher classes in the state. It is in vain to say, their interests will teach them to act otherwise. Interest and the deductions of reason have no influence when the passions are excited. It had none at Paris, though the first effect of the glorious three days was to steep the artisans who gained them in unheard of misery: it had none at Brussels, though the Flemings were immediately reduced to the most squalid wretchedness: it had none in Ireland, though the continued agitation of that unhappy country blasts its inhabitants with a desolation worse than the sinroom of the desert.

Indeed, if the matter be considered abstractly, there seems no reason to doubt that this always must be the case with representatives chosen by the great body of the people. There is a natural jealousy in the middling orders of their superiors; an aversion which is so nearly allied to noble and independent feeling, that it is impossible either to wonder at or blame it. It will subsist as long as the human race. It was as strong in the days of Gracchus and Marius as at this time. It will be found admirably stated in the speech of Marius in the Jugurthine war. Declamations against the vices of the nobility; invectives at patrician corruption; extravagant eulogiums on plebeian virtue, always have, and always will be, the most popular topics with the middling and lower ranks. It consoles them for the inequality of fortune, to have the pleasure, at least, of abusing those who are above them.

Nothing can demonstrate the prevalence of this feeling so strongly in the people in this country, as the character of the journals which have the largest circulation among the middling ranks. Read the papers which are most in request with that numerous body. Are they the moderate or aristocratic papers, those which support the Constitution as it stands, and throw cold water on the sanguine anticipations of the reformers? These journals are universally abandoned, and the whole columns of the popular newspapers filled with invectives against the higher orders. This disposition, being a fixed principle in human nature, may be calculated upon with perfect certainty, as one of the moving powers in society. Every plan of reform must be founded on this, as an inherent principle in the machine.

But if this be the case even at this time, how much more strongly would the same principle operate, if reform were carried, and the ambition of the lower orders continually excited by exercise of their franchise! The abuse of the higher orders in the London press is already sufficiently strong, but it is nothing to what would ensue if reform were carried. This is the usual progress of all such changes. Stronger flattery of the populace is required, more abject submission to the majesty of the people imposed, with every successive addition made to their power. Moderate language is immediately denied; extravagant eulogiums upon themselves, unmeasured vituperation of their superiors, considered as an essential preliminary to the favour of the people. To those who are unacquainted with the history of the French Revolution, it is hardly credible in how short a time this change in the popular taste can be effected. To those who are, innumerable illustrations of these observations will suggest themselves.

It such be the unavoidable tendency of human nature, upon every concession of power to the lower orders, upon what conceivable basis, save actual corruption, is the influence of the great proprietors to be founded? Let any man say, whether a great forty proprietor in the neighbourhood of Manchester, Leeds, Birmingham, or Glasgow, could induce the householders of those great cities to support him in a contest with a popular candidate. Who are the members returned for Westminster, Preston, Middlesex? If the right of voting be extended to a great number of similar places, popular representatives of the same description will be returned from them all.

But if the aristocracy are to be driven to the necessity of expending their fortunes to maintain their ground against the incessant attack of the democracy, what a boundless scene of corruption and venality must ensue! The late scandalous scenes at the election in a single great town, demonstrate in how wholesale a manner corruption will be carried on, when it is necessary for men of fortune to exert themselves to secure the return from numerous bodies of electors. The gratuity of ten or fifteen pounds a man, is the simple expedient by which, and by which alone, a return from large classes of electors can be secured.

Thus the result of reform will be, either that the higher ranks will lose their influence altogether, and become the victims of the encroachment and spoliation of their inferiors, or that, in defence of their existence, they will be driven to an extensive system of corruption. Either alternative is infinitely to be dreaded. The first is the commencement of a revolution; the last is poisoning the sources of freedom, and converting the poor into the hiring supporters of the rich.

No method could be devised by which the influence of the aristocracy, that influence which is essential to the existence of a mixed government, could be secured in a way so little obnoxious, so little subversive of public morals, so little conducive to corruption, so little galling to the feelings of the people, as by the decayed boroughs. It is usual to hold up these boroughs, Old Sarum, for example, in which there are only two or three voters, as the most scandalous instances of corruption. It might with as much reason be contended, that a city in which there are only two or three alehouses, is the most scandalous example of inebriety. If corruption is to be exercised, it is incomparably better that it should be dispensed on a fee than a number of voters, on two or three householders in Cornwall, or ten or twelve families in Scotland, than on 20,000 or 30,000 weavers in Manchester, or as many ragmats at Faversham. The conduct of the reformers who expect to abolish corruption in the rotten boroughs with one stroke, and with another to contend for the extension of the elective franchise to hundreds of thousands of corruptible weavers is another species as absurd as it would be to condemn two or three gin-shops in back lanes of the city, and at the same time set up two or three thousand in all the streets of the metropolis.

The aristocracy of land and of wealth will not submit without a struggle to be deprived of all their influence. The great merchants, bankers, and freeholders, will soon discover the tendency of the violent reformers: they will see that, under the name of reducing the burthen of the people, a fatal blow will be struck at public credit, and all their enterprises ruined by general bankruptcy. The landholders will see that the church is only the first victim; that their own estates are the real and ultimate object, and that strenuous exertions must be made to avert a catastrophe worse than death itself.

Corruption, incessant wholesale corruption, must be practised to dilute the fountains of popular ambition, by mingling with them the poison of private selfishness. The great cities, like the Prietorian Guards of Rome, will sell the empire to the highest bidder; and corruption, emerging from the decent obscurity of the rotten boroughs, will stalk with shameless prostitution through the land, and convert the rights of freemen into the vehicle of the basest passions.

Our object, say the reformers, is not revolution but restoration. We do not wish to change the constitution, but to remove those excrescences which time has fastened upon its parts. The observation is plausible, and has been illustrated with much eloquence; but it admits of an easy answer. Can the reformers, when they abolish the decayed boroughs, abolish at the same time the changes in society which have rendered them necessary? Can they abolish the millions of manufacturers who have sprung up within the last century, crowded together in great cities, limited in information, profligate in habits, reckless in disposition? Can they abolish the swarms of Irish who are always ready to fill up the vacancies in the ranks of labour, lowering thereby their wages, degrading their habits, augmenting their discontent? Can they abolish the national debt, which is a continual source of oppression to the people, and yet cannot be touched without producing evils far greater than its continuance? Can they abolish the democratic press, which panders with incessant activity to the diseased appetites of these enormous assemblages of men; ever inflaming their passions, never strengthening their reason, or correcting their infirmities? Can they abolish the mental cultivation which has given the craving for political excitement to multitudes incapable of acquiring the information, or exercising the thought, which political subjects require? Can they restore the good old days of English simplicity; when the moral evils of manufacturing cities were unknown; when the largest borough out of London did not contain 20,000 inhabitants; when every three or four acres had their little farmer; when the barons lived in rustic plenty on their estates, diffusing plenty by their hospitality, exercising influence by their example? If they can do this, they may with some reason contend for the disfranchisement of the decayed boroughs; if not, let them not deceive mankind by professions of restoring the Constitution to its pristine state, or destroy the bulwarks which time has gradually raised against the new and portentous flood of democracy.

There is no person who must not be sensible that the power of the people "has increased, and is increasing." Whether it ought to be diminished, is an ulterior question, upon which parties will of course differ; but the simple fact that it has increased, is too obvious to admit of dispute. Indeed, it is upon the assumption of this fact, that the reformers ground their main argument for a change in the state of the representation, because it is said the Constitution must be modified according to the increased intelligence of the lower orders. But if this be the fact upon which all parties are agreed, on what principle of expedience are their passions to be inflamed by a still farther increase? If there were any symptoms of the liberties of the people being on the decline; if the popular journals were fast veering round to arbitrary principles; if the people were become careless or negligent of their rights; if infringements on public freedom were evidently in the contemplation of Government, and passive acquiescence were to be expected from the people, then it would indeed be reasonable to propose reform, as the only means of reviving the democratic spring of the Constitution. But if the reverse of all this is avowedly the case; if the power of the people is evidently increasing with extraordinary rapidity; if the boast of the reformers be true, that at every successive dissolution of Parliament a number of boroughs are thrown open, and that on no occasion did this happen to such an extent as on the last election; if the aristocracy are now evidently and avowedly overmatched by the Commons, where is the expedience, or what is the necessity for the concession of additional Parliamentary influence to the popular party? If a man's pulse be already risen to 100, is that any reason for invigorating his system with brandy till it rises to 120? If the system already evince a flow of blood to the head, is that a reason for indulging him in seasoned dishes until the tendency to apoplexy is irremediable?

In the lapse of time, the popular and aristocratic influence have become predominant in different parts of the country; but, upon the whole, their opposing powers have been so nearly balanced, that no violent change has taken place in the constitution, nor any thing farther been effected than a considerable addition to the power of the people. Cornwall and Scotland are the great fortresses of the aristocratic; London and the manufacturing districts, of the democratic factions. If the fortresses are to be dismantled on either, it should be on both sides. If the Scotch and Cornish boroughs, which enable the aristocracy to maintain the struggle with the democracy, are to be demolished, then let the great fountains of democracy be closed; let the manufacturing districts be shorn of their members, and the agitation of the London press discontinued. If the reformers will propose this, then they will have some title to insist for the demolition of the strongholds of the aristocracy; if not, there is no reciprocity in their measures, and under the name of reform they are really aiming at the extinction of the opposite party.

The reformers printed lists of the majority and minority on the famous division on Sir H. Parnell's motion, which threw out the late ministers, and pointed with exultation to the difference between the county members of England and those of Scotland. Two-thirds of the former, it was said, voted against ministers; two-thirds of the latter in their favour. This was deemed decisive in favour of reform in Scotland. It is astonishing that they did not see that the inference lay the other way. Assuming that to have been a trial of strength between the conservative and reforming party, is it not clear, that if the composition of the English county members be such, that two-thirds of them incline to the democratic, it is indispensable that the Scotch and borough members should incline to the aristocratic side? If they did not do this, the whole weight would be on one side, and the constitution speedily subverted.

This is the true answer to the constant complaints which are made of the elections in Scotland, and of the close boroughs in England. They are the means, and the only means, by which the aristocracy in either country maintain their ground, and the constitution is prevented from being swallowed up in the flood of democracy. The very fact to which the reformers so constantly refer in favour of their argument, viz. that the county members of England, and those who are elected for large boroughs, are for the most part favourable to reform, that is, inclined to the democracy, is decisive against any farther change in the representation. It demonstrates that the popular party have already got as much as is consistent with the existence of a mixed government; and that if they got more, or the aristocracy lose any part of what they now possess, the balance will be so loaded on the other side, that the equilibrium will be destroyed, and a revolution must ensue.

To make out a case of expedience, the reformer should be able to shew that the fact was just the reverse, that the most popularly elected members were the most disposed to uphold the Constitution; that the county members of England were the firmest friends of the existing order of things; and then they might come forward with much reason and argu-
 "You now see how it is; the county members, the representatives of the great towns, are for the most part ranged on the side of Government. Liberty is evidently endangered; an infusion of popular vigour is requisite to prevent the privileges of the people from being overwhelmed by the ascendancy of the aristocracy." Can any man of sense doubt that this reasoning would indeed be well founded; and that in such circumstances of declining public spirit and endangered liberty, an infusion of popular power would really be requisite? But how can the same change be required in circumstances confessedly just the reverse? If reform would be requisite upon the decay of popular influence in the Constitution, how can it be also requisite upon its increase?

According to the arguments of the popular party, the stronger they are, the more power they should receive in the Legislature. This was just the principle of Napoleon; the stronger he was the more he required; and because he was fenced round with the Confederation of the Rhine and a girdle of vassal thrones, therefore it was indispensable that he should demolish Russia also. It is curious to observe how ambition in every department of human affairs adopts the same principles. Possibly there may be a retreat from Moscow for popular as well as imperial ambition.

The three great causes which render the maintenance of the aristocratic boroughs indispensable to the balance of the Constitution, are, 1. The prodigious increase of our manufacturing population. 2. The experienced democratic tendency of that body. 3. The revolutionary tendency of the public press, which feeds their passions.

In every age, and in every part of the world, large manufacturing bodies have been actuated by turbulent and democratic principles. The democracies of Athens and Rome in ancient, of Florence and Genoa in modern times, were nothing but the artisans and manufacturers of those great cities. Ghent and Bruges have in every age been turbulent in the extreme; and Lyons and Rouen were, through all the French Revolution, the stronghold of extreme republican principles. It was from the Faubourg St Antoine, the seat of all the manufactories of Paris, that those terrific bands issued,—who deluged France with blood, and filled every house with mourning. And it was on the same spot, and to support the same principles, that those columns proceeded, who, by overturning the Bourbon dynasty, have already steeped Paris in unheard of distress, and promise to unfurl the standard of revolution through Europe. What the principles of our manufacturers are, is already known, from the journals which they read. Nobody take in papers which displease them; and the manufacturers read nothing but the most extreme radical publications.

The number of this democratic body is a most formidable consideration. From the census of 1821, it appears, that out of a population of somewhat above 14,000,000, only 4,800,000 were employed in agriculture.* At this time, it is certain, that the population of the island exceeds 15,000,000; and that of them, only 5,000,000 are employed in the cultivation of the soil. In other words, two-thirds of the whole population are engaged in trade and manufactures. The great bulk of this enormous body are, and ever will remain, attached to radical principles. If any approach to universal suffrage is made, two-thirds of the House of Commons will be returned in their interest, and they will soon rival the Constituent Assembly of France.

Every concession, however small, made to the manufacturing interest in the House of Commons, is to the highest degree dangerous. They are already too strong, and have been gradually becoming so for a century back. The same silent change which has covered rural districts with crowded cities, and converted two-thirds of our people into artisans, has wrought a corresponding alteration in the balance of power in the Constitution. The power of the manufacturers "has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished." Concede to them Parliamentary reform, even in a modified form, and they will speedily become irresistible. The present clamour is raised precisely because they know that, if conceded, it will make them the ruling power in the State.

The liberal and radical press is another power in the Constitution, the growth of the last forty years, which has already become of the most formidable character. Nothing is more erroneous than to imagine that public discussion, as now carried on in this country, leads to the present extrication of truth. It tends, on the contrary, more than any thing else, to the diffusion of error. Truth will indeed be in the end triumphant; but it will become so only on the cooling of passion, and the decay of interest. It will not be found while the newspapers are seeking it.

Future ages will observe, with astonishment, the mental hallucinations under which the present generation have laboured. The delusion about the national debt was one; the joint-stock mania a second; the cry for reform a third. It is the public press which perpetuates and spreads these baneful errors of national insanity. Nobody reads any thing but what coincides with his wishes; the arguments are followed which fall in with preconceived opinions; none other so much as looked at. The moment either party meet with any thing hostile to their wishes, they lay it aside; but there is this essential difference between the two, that the clamour of the reformers, as it is addressed to the passions of the great bulk of readers, becomes proportionally louder, and forces itself upon the consideration of the opposite party; while the arguments of their opponents, being acceptable to a comparatively inconsiderable class, are less heard of, and remain utterly unknown to the great body of the people.

Public opinion, of which so much is said, when formed upon the public press or the events of the day, and not on a cool consideration of history, is just as unworthy of consideration as the transports of a mob. It is all formed on hearing one side only. It is not like the verdict of a jury, made up on a consideration of the evidence on both sides; eleven out of the twelve, of the great jury of the nation, stop their ears the moment the evidence for the opposite party begins.

"It is for the interest of the people," say the reformers, "that they should be well governed; they, therefore, will choose the best representatives: the thing is as clear as demonstration."⁶ It is for the interest of mankind, it may be added, not to sin; vice is as imprudent as it is dangerous: therefore, all men will be virtuous. To hold that the real interests of men always govern their actions, is to know little, very little, of human nature. Does youth, thoughtless extravagant youth, never follow the career of passion, to the utter ruin of the real and permanent interests of life? Is the voice of reason always heard in opposition to that of passion? Whence the hundred thousand prostitutes who nightly walk the streets of London, or the ten thousand illegitimate children who are annually thrown upon the public in Paris? Whence the innumerable gin-shops, which disgrace the metropolis, and swallow up all the fortunes of life, for the gratification of a few intoxicated moments? When these evils have ceased; when intoxication is unknown, irregular passion exterminated, and sober industry universal, the people may, possibly, follow their real interests in the choice of representatives, but not till then.

Was it for the real interests of the electors of Preston to return Mr Hunt? Has reason been triumphant, passion untelt, at all the reform meetings which have been held to support the administration in the measures they are to propose? Were the French electors all governed by reason when they returned the Constituent Assembly which unhinged the fabric of society, or the Convention which bathed the nation in blood? One would imagine that history is forgotten in political discussion at this time; the best proof that the people will not choose proper representatives is, that they are deemed capable, by able men, of being misled by such an argument.

Deeming themselves secure, under the wings of administration, of obtaining reform, the democratic party have lately made the most strenuous efforts to support vote by ballot. This, it is said, will effectually prevent bribery. Nobody will buy a secret vote. By this simple expedient corruption will be destroyed, and the constitution restored to its pristine purity.

If it were really true that the ballot would destroy bribery, we hold that of itself a decisive argument against its adoption. If it be true that the great bulk of the manufacturing interests, and of the inhabitants of towns generally, are, and ever must be, democratical in their principle, then the adoption of a mode of election, which destroys the influence of wealth, gives the finishing stroke to the aristocracy, the freeholders, and the proprietors of every description. If the borough electors are to be swayed by nothing but their inclinations, independent of the sway of property, the great majority of them will return a revolutionary parliament as certainly as a stone will fall to the ground. The law of gravitation is not more fixed or universal than the democratic tendency of all such bodies of men.

It is in vain to say, that the interests of the electors will induce them to pause before they return a parliament inclined to support such extreme measures. Did not the electors of France, the moment they obtained vote by ballot and an extended representation, return the Convention which brought the king to the scaffold, consigned 200,000 captives to the revolutionary dungeons, and supported the unspeakable horrors of the Reign of Terror? Do not the American electors, who vote by ballot, return a set of men, so slavishly bound to their separate interests, that no man of independence or fortune will submit to the degradation; and that they are actually obliged to pay their Deputies at Congress a salary to enable them to bear their expenses? Have not the Americans, in consequence, been driven by separate interests into a set of illiberal commercial measures, utterly ruinous to the best interests of the state? And what do these examples prove, but that the lower orders, voting for themselves by secret ballot, are alternately swayed by their immediate interests and their sanguinary passions; destroying, at one time, their whole superiors to gratify their revenge or quench their fears; and drying up, at another, the real sources of national prosperity to forward the local interests of the prevailing faction.

If, therefore, the matter came to a choice of evils, it would be incomparably better to have corruption at elections, and preserve the Constitution, than to get quit of it by vote by ballot, and bring on a revolution. It is no doubt a degrading thing to see the people of a great town openly and avowedly swayed by mercenary motives; but it is a thousand times better than to see a whole nation overwhelmed by a democratic convulsion. If the passions of the people are to be the moving principle of Government, we would rather it was their passion for gold than their passion for blood. If a revolting spectacle must be exhibited, it is better to see drunken manufacturers spending their bribes at the alehouse, than millions of industrious men writhing under the agonies of famine, as they are now doing in Flanders, from the insane passions of demagogues.

But the truth is, that the vote by ballot would not extinguish corruption. Human ingenuity is too strong for any such precautions; the thirst for gold too powerful to be checked by any possible devices. In a country such as Britain, where such mighty interests are at stake in the Government, where men of fortune have such powerful motives for entering the Legislature, wealth will always be exerted to command a place, till it is utterly swept away by a revolution. In one obvious way bribery may be continued in spite of the ballot. A whole borough may be purchased, as the Praetorian Guards of old, by a promised gratuity to every man, in the event of a particular candidate being successful. One candidate lets it be understood that, in the event of his being returned, he will give £20 to every elector; another goes as high as £30. The electors lay their heads together, as the Roman praetorians, and see weighty and sufficient reasons for preferring the £30 candidate. The election takes place by ballot—the £30 candidate is elected—and each elector gets that sum. No money is paid till the return is made, and the election unchallengeable; the candidate incurs no expense till his object is gained, and every thing goes smoothly on. At a recent election in England, it is said, this plan was adopted, and that every elector pocketed £18, 14s. on a subsequent division of the spoil. Against this species of bribery, the ballot is no sort of protection; and that it will be adopted, if that fatal measure is carried, is as certain as that the passion for gold will then actuate mankind, if not suspended by the passion for power.

Thus the introduction of vote by ballot will unnecessarily and gratuitously do mischief. The baser passions will love the shelter of a hidden act; multitudes, who are shamed into an upright vote by the prospect of exposure, will yield to the unseen temptation of mending their fortune. Bribery will be applied to the whole mass of the citizens; and independence, unable to stem the torrent, and deprived of the public reward of virtue, will, in hopeless resignation, yield to the baser motive. Corruption will be increased, because the multitudes who share it will at once diminish responsibility, and extinguish shame; and the safeguards, both of private virtue and public security, irrecoverably destroyed, for no other purpose but to afford concealment to venality and accelerate the march of revolution.

As the Constitution now stands, every interest is substantially represented. The agricultural interest send forth the county members,—men, in general, of ancient and respectable descent,—whose personal or family influence goes much beyond the numerical strength of their votes. The manufacturers, besides the cities which they actually command, purchase numbers of the aristocratic boroughs; and the most strenuous supporters of their interests are to be found in the representatives of the Cornish and Scottish freeholders. Nobody can maintain that their interests, at least, are not fully attended to in Parliament. The aristocratic party are represented by such of the close boroughs as are not sold to the mercantile or manufacturing interest; the radicals, by the members for the populous cities. Young men of talent, from the bar, or connected with the old families, are selected to support the different parties in Parliament, and thus obtain an entrance into the Legislature, which they could not obtain under any other system. In this way the aristocratic, the commercial, and the democratic parties are blended together; and each body obtain, by the purchase of boroughs or the members returned in their interest, an adequate share in the Legislature.

Who can ensure that, under the reformed or more democratic constitution which is proposed, the same, or any balance at all, will be maintained? How are young men of talent, such as Mr Canning, Mr Brougham, Mr Sheridan, or Mr Pitt, to obtain seats under the new system? They will be entirely excluded; for talent, unless actuated by the basest motives, will never submit to the degradation necessarily imposed upon the candidates for favour from a corruptible mob. In America, they have long since been utterly excluded from Congress; and their debates are conducted by a mere band of pensioned delegates, compelled to maintain the separate and rival interests of the bodies by whom they have been elected.

No delusion can be more dangerous, than that reform may be safely conceded if it does not go too far. It might as well be said, that the outworks of a fortification might safely be abandoned if the rampart is maintained. The democratic party are insatiable. They never will be satisfied till republican institutions prevail; and how can they exist with a national debt of £28,000,000 year-ly, with great estates and a titled nobility? Let the example of Ireland prove a warning, where every concession has been immediately followed by increased demands; and the country never was so near revolt as after the great tranquillizing measure which was held out as the only means of pacifying it. Let the example of France prove a warning, where reform, amelioration, and concession, were the harbingers of revolution; where the nobility, idly voluntarily surrendering all their privileges, were rewarded by confiscation, banishment, and proscription, and the King, whose whole life had been an incessant series of concessions, was at length brought to an ignominious death. It is the nature of sudden concession to produce such fatal effects, because it excites the passions and awakens the hopes of a revolution.

The early friends of reform, the greatest statesmen of England, checked the cry of innovation, when it was excited, not by the experienced wants of their country, but the influence of foreign example. Mr Burke and Mr Pitt, who both supported it in early life, became its strongest enemies when the French Revolution had proved its consequences and spread its contagion. Nothing can be so absurd, as to accuse them of inconsistency for so doing. Tempora mutantur, et nos mutamur in illis.

—The statesman must adapt his measures to the temper of the times, and not look for the sun all day in the east, because it once rose there in the morning.

Does the present state of society afford no reasons for similar caution? Is this the time to select for a sudden and portentous change in the Constitution, when the minds of men have been so strongly excited by the events in the neighbouring kingdom, where the revolutionary fever has again broke out, and the reckless and desperate in every country are roused from inactivity by the extraordinary success of the French convulsion? Changes which might be safely introduced in ordinary periods, become to the last degree perilous when following such an example.

Does the present state of France or Belgium afford any argument for an extension of the democratic spirit by enlarging the elective franchise in England? Look at the public securities of those countries. The French three per cents, which were at 87 in June, are now at 62. Two-thirds of the mercantile houses of Paris have become bankrupt; the misery pervading its de- population has been unequalled; the days of Robespierre. How are the government proposing to draw off the excited spirits, and employ the destitute workmen, of their country? By plunging in foreign wars, and leading the republican legions again into the career of European conquest. Such is the natural career of revolutions; convulsion produces misery, and misery goes on to war. War, in its turn, restores order, and liberty perishes in the conflagration she has raised. With this terrible prospect before our eyes, is there no warning to the legislators of Britain to beware; to leave any, even the smallest changes, to peaceable times, and cling the more steadily to the ark of the Constitution, that it is assailed by the winds and buffeted by the waves?

The duty of the nobles and commons of England in this emergency is sufficiently evident. Let them firmly resist the clamour for innovation; let them disregard the threats of revolt; let them rally round the conservative party. A little longer, and it may be too late. One reforming measure carried, and the democratic party are intrenched in the Legislature, never again to be shaken. Their fortunes, their lives, the salvation of their country, are at stake. There is no evading the danger but by steady and determined resistance. But to be able to face it, the fatal divisions of former times must be forgotten. They have brought the country, by their disunion, to the brink of ruin. Every man must be at his post; unbroken union among the friends of the Constitution is indispensable to save it from farther inroads.

And steady and determined resistance will most certainly save the Constitution. The excitement of the moment must subside if it is not kept alive by the prospect of victory. With such a prospect it never will be extinguished. Yield any thing, and no eye can foresee a termination to the convulsion; hold by the Constitution, and their speedy termination is at hand. Let the House of Commons pass one decided vote on the question, and the danger is at an end.

Revolt is never dangerous in any country but when it is headed by a large portion of the higher ranks; least of all is such a catastrophe to be dreaded but from such a beginning in this country. There has never been a revolution in England which was not headed by the House of Commons; never a formidable insurrection but such as was led by the nobility. Revolution will never begin but with measures adopted by the Legislature. The conflagrations of the peasantry are nowise formidable; mere physical strength, unsupported by moral influence, is speedily checked. It is the conflagration springing from rash measures of reform which is to be dreaded; it is the words spoken from authority that set the world on fire. Steadily resisting all such projects, let the British Legislature set themselves, not to "disturb the peace of all the world," but "to rule it when 'tis wildest;" let them attend only to the real evils of the country, and disregard the visionary projects for a novel distribution of its powers; let them investigate the condition of its poor, soften the severity of its laws, widen the channels of its industry.—By so doing, they may not gain the applause of the multitude; they may not be the idols of the populace one day, to become their victims the next; but they will command the esteem of the enlightened, and secure the admiration of the good; and when the madness of the people has passed away, when the spectre of discord has sunk, they will be venerated by the reformers themselves, not less for what they have refused than for what they have bestowed.

THE STORY OF AZIMANTUM.

CONCLUDED.

MENENIUS sat in the lonely hut which had been appointed for his dwelling, and while the shadows of night fell like the darkening hues of time, as they come deeper and deeper upon the brightness of our youth, hope waxed faint in his heart, and dim despondency spread like twilight over his mind. Alone, in the midst of a wild and barbarous land, the depths of whose obscure forest were probably unknown even to the fierce monarch whose sway they owned, how could he, unfriended, unaided, dream that he would ever discover that lost jewel, which had been torn from the coronet of his happiness? Never! never! never! to behold her again! To journey through a weary life, and fall into the chill, solitary tomb, without the blessed light of those dear eyes which had been the starlike lamps of his existence—to dwell for ever in ignorance of her fate, while his fancy, like the damned in Hades, could find nothing but the bitter food of horror and despair—Such was his destiny.

"Attila the king!" exclaimed a loud voice, as he pondered, and Menenius stood face to face with the Monarch of the North, while the light of the pinewood torch glared red upon the dark features of the Scythian, and gave to those grim and powerful lines a sterner character and fiercer shade. His voice was gentle, however; and, seating himself on the couch, he spoke with words which had in them the tone of unshared, undisputed, unlimited authority, but elevated by the consciousness of mental greatness, and tempered by admiration and esteem.

"Chief of Azimantium," said the Hun, "while the slaves of a vain and treacherous king wait long ere they are permitted to breathe the same air with Attila, the king of nations disdains not to visit the leader of the brave. Mark me, thou chief of the last free sons of Greece! The sword of thy country is broken—the sceptre of thine emperors passed away. The seed is gathered which shall sow grass in the palaces of kings—the clouds are collected which shall water the harvest of desolation. Greek, I boast not of my victories—it sufficeth Attila to conquer. But calmly, reasonably measure thy people against mine, and think whether the small band of Azimantians, were they all inspired by the God of battles with courage like thine own, could save the whole of degenerate Greece from the innumerable and warrior people of the north. What—what can Azimantium do, all unsupported, against a world?"

"Each son of Azimantium," replied Menenius, "can offer up a hecatomb of Scythian strangers, and give his soul to heaven upon the wings of victory. This will Azimantium—and then—perish Greece!"

A shadow passed across the monarch's brow.

"Be not too proud," he said, "be not too proud! A better fate may yet befall thy city and thy land. So well does Attila love Azimantium, that he claims her as his own from the Greek emperor; and to win her citizens to willingness, he offers his daughter—his loved—his lovely daughter to her chief. Pause!" he added, seeing the quivering of Menenius' lip; "pause and think! Reply not! but remember that thus may Greece be saved—that the safety or destruction of thy land is upon thy tongue. Pause, and let the sun rise twice upon the meditation of thine answer."

Thus spoke the monarch, and in a moment after, the Azimantine chief was once more left to solitude. Deep and bitter was the smile of contempt that curled the lip of Menenius; for in the proud glory of his own heart, he forgot how low Greece had fallen amongst the people of the earth, and in the imperishable memory of his love, the mention of another bride was but as the raving of insanity. "I!—I!—Menenius of Azimantium—I wed the daughter of the barbarian! I become a subject of the Hun!—I forget Honoria!"

Another day went down, and Menenius, with the Grecian ambassador, was seated in the halls of Attila, at the banquet which the proud monarch gave at once to the envoys of the Eastern and Western empire. On a raised platform in the midst of the hall was the couch and table of Attila, covered with fine linen and precious stuffs, while fifty small tables on either side were spread out for the guests invited to the royal feast. An open space was before the board of the monarch, and behind him the hall was filled with a dark fantastic crowd of guards, and attendants, and barbarian slaves. On the same couch with Attila sat his daughter Ierne,—that beautiful daughter whom Menenius had beheld at the dwelling of Bleda's widow; and as the Azimantine chief passed by, and poured the required libation to "Attila the Brave," the maiden's eyes fixed motionless on the ground, and the blood rose fast into her cheek, like the red morning sun rising up into the pale twilight sky. Menenius passed on unchanged and cold, and took his place with Maximin, the ambassador of Theodosius.

The fare of Attila was plain and rude, but the tables of his guests were spread with all that the fearful luxury of Rome itself could have culled from earth and sea. Ere long the cupbearer filled the golden goblet, and the monarch, rising from his couch, drank to Berez, the bravest of the Huns. Again, after a pause, he rose, but the cup was given him by his daughter, and Attila drank to Menenius, the bravest of the Greeks! Quick and sparkling flowed the mead, and then an old grey man poured to the wild chords of a barbaric lyre, a song of triumph and of battles, while at every close he proclaimed Attila's bridal day. At length a bright troop of young and happy maidens led in, surrounded by their linked arms, three brighter than themselves, from whom the Monarch of the North was about to choose a new partner for his mighty throne. Their faces were veiled; but through the long white robes that clothed them shone out that radiant light of grace and beauty which nothing can conceal. Slowly, and as if reluctant, they were brought into the monarch's presence. * *

Why quivered the lip of Menenius? Why strained his eye upon that first veiled figure? The veil is gone!—To him! To him she stretches forth her hands!—The table and banquet is dashed to atoms at his feet, and Honoria is in Menenius' arms.

A thousand swords sprang from their sheaths—a thousand javelins quivered round the hall. Traitor! Madman! Sacrilegious slave! was shouted in a thousand fierce voices, and a thousand barbarous tongues. But unquailing in the midst stood the Azimantine chief—his left arm round the beating heart of his young bride—his right, armed with that sword which had bowed many a hero to the dust, raised appealing to the Seythian king. "Monarch of the Huns," he cried, "this is the captive I have come to seek. As you are a man—as you are a warrior—as you are a king! By your oath—by your honour—by your justice! yield her to me, her promised husband, and put us safely off your land. Then if of all these brave and mighty men," he added with a frown, "who draw the sword against a single Greek, there be but ten who will meet me brow to brow in the battle plain, I will write it in their blood that I am neither slave nor traitor, but a bold man, who dares to claim and to defend his own!"

Fierce wrath, stern revenge, majestic admiration, had swept over the countenance of Attila, like the broken masses of a rent thunder-cloud hurled over the sky by the succeeding blast. "Hold!" he cried; "Warriors! put up your swords. Chief of Azimantium! you rob me of a bride; but if this be the captive you have come to seek, Attila's word is given, and safely, surely, she shall be returned to her home, were she as lovely as the moon. But with you, Greek, with your companions, Maximin, Priscus, and Vigilius, the king has still to deal, and, after what has befallen this day, expect nothing more than justice." As he spoke, he rolled his dark eyes fearfully around, then suddenly raised his hand, exclaiming, "Now, warriors! now!" and before he could strike a blow, Menenius, unprepared, was seized on all sides, and bound tight in every limb, together with the envoys from Theodosius.

All, for an instant, was wild confusion. Honoria, with the other women, were hurried from the hall; and Menenius found himself ranged with Priscus and Maximin before the throne of Attila; while, in the deathlike, ashy, quivering countenance of Vigilius, the interpreter, who stood beside him, he read detected guilt and certain death.

"Hired murderers, sent by an imperial slave to slay his conqueror and master," exclaimed Attila, after he had gazed for some minutes upon the Greeks, "do ye not tremble to find your baseness exposed in the eyes of all the universe? Stand forth, Edecon, and tell the warriors of Attila, how these men came here, under the garb of ambassadors, to slay by treachery, in peace, the king that, by battle, they could not vanquish in war. And you, warriors, lay not your hands upon your swords—Attila will do justice to Attila."

At the command of the king, Edecon, who had been ambassador for Attila at Constantinople, stood forth, and declared, that in an interview with the Euzuch Chrysaphius, that favourite of the weak Monarch of the East had proposed to him the assassination of his master, and offered him an immense reward. He had affected to consent, and had that very day received a purse of gold and jewels from Vigilius, the interpreter, who was privy to the whole. The plot he had instantly communicated to Attila, and the purse he now produced. Maximin and Priscus, he doubted not, were cunning men, sent to accomplish the scheme with art; and Menenius, beyond question, was the daring murderer to strike the final blow.

Maximin spoke loudly in his own defence, and Priscus learnedly on the improbability of the tale, while the mouth of Vigilius opened, and his lips quivered, but no sound found utterance. Menenius was silent, but he fixed his bold eye upon Attila, who glared upon them all like a tiger crouching for the spring.

"Maximin and Priscus," said the King at length, "Ye are innocent! Let them be freed. As for yon trembling traitor, guilt is in his eye and on his cheek; but the sword that should smite Vigilius would be disgraced for ever, and find no blood in his coward heart. Let him buy his life, and pay two hundred pounds weight of gold to him he sought to bribe.—As for thee, Chief of Azimantium!"

"Thou knowest I am guiltless, Hun!" replied Menenius, "and bonds such as these have pressed upon my arms too long."

"Of thy guilt or innocence I know nought," replied the King; "but this I know, that I will guard thee safely till thine Emperor send me the head of Chrysaphius, the murdering slave who first sought to tempt my subjects into treachery. Away with Vigilius, till he pay the purchase of his base life; and away with this Azimantium, till Orestes and Eslaw, my envoys, bring me the head of the eunuch from my slave the Emperor."

In the solitude of a dark unlighted hut, stretched upon a bear's hide, which had been cast down for his bed, lay the young Chief of Azimantium, pondering his hard fate, while the sounds of many a gay and happy voice without, struck with painful discord upon his unattuned ear. Dark and melancholy, the fancies flitted across his brain like the visions of dead friends seen in the dim atmosphere of troubled sleep, and he revolved in his mind that bold cowardice of his ancestors, which taught them to fly from the sorrows and dangers of their fate, by the sure but gloomy passage of the tomb. Was it virtue, he asked himself, or vice? wisdom, or insanity, that allied the last despair to the last hope, and made self-murder the cure of other ills? And, as he thought, sorrow took arms against his better mind, and whispered like a fiend, "Die! Die, Menenius! Peace is in the grave!" A new and painful struggle was added to the evils of his state, and still he thought of death as hours and days went by. Nor was this all; for, as the Dacians tame the lions for the imperial shows, the Huns strove to break his spirit, and subdue his high heart, by reiterated anxieties and cares. Now, he was told of wars with the Empire, and the fall of Greece: now, strange whispers were poured into his ear, of some direful fate reserved for himself: now, he heard of the great annual sacrifice offered at the altar of Mars, where a hundred captive maidens washed the platform with their blood. But still, like the great hero of the mighty founder of the Epic song, he rose above the waves that were poured upon his head, and still answered, "Never! Never!" when the name of Azimantium was connected with the dominion of the Huns.

It was one night when a darker melancholy than ever oppressed his mind, and despondency sat most heavy on his soul, that the door was cast open, and a blaze of light burst upon his sight. His eyes, familiar with the darkness, refused at first to scan the broad glare; but when at length they did their office, he beheld, in the midst of her slaves, that fair girl Ierne, whose offered hand he had refused. Her cheek, which had been as warm as the last cloud of the summer evening, was now as pale as the same cloud when, spirit-like, it flits across the risen moon. But her eye had lost none of its lustre; and it seemed, in truth, as if her whole soul had concentrated there to give fuller effulgence to its living light.

"Chief of Azimantium," said the maiden, "it is my father's will that you be freed, and I—that the generosity of Attila should know no penury—I have prayed, that though Menenius slighted Ierne, he should wed the woman of his love even in Ierne's father's halls. My prayer has been granted—the banquet is prepared—the maiden is warned, and the blushes are on her cheek—a priest of thine own God is ready.—Rise, then, Chief of Azimantium, and change a prison for thy bridal bed. Rise, and follow the slighted Ierne."

"Oh, lady!" answered Menenius, "call not thyself by so unkind a name. Write on your memory, that, long ere my eyes rested on your loveliness, Honoria was bound to my heart by ties of old affection; and, as your soul is generous and noble, fancy all the gratitude that your blessed words waken in my bosom. Oh! let the thought of having raised me from despair—of having freed me from bonds—of having crowned me with happiness, find responsive joy in your bosom, and let the blessing that you give, return and bless you also."

Ierne pressed her hand firm upon her forehead, and gazed upon Menenius while he spoke, with eyes whose bright but unsteady beams seemed borrowed from the shifting meteors of the night. The graceful arch of her full coral lip quivered; but she spoke not; and, waving with her hand, the attendants loosened the chains from the hands of the Azimantine, and, starting on his feet, Menenius was free.

* * * * *

In the brightness and the blaze of a thousand torches, the Chief of Azimantium stood in the halls of Attila, with the hand of Honoria clasped in his own. Sorrow and anxiety had touched, but not stolen, her beauty—had changed, but not withered, a charm. Every glance was softened—every feature had a deeper interest—and joy shone the brighter for the sorrow that was gone, like the mighty glory of the sun when the clouds and the tempests roll away.

The dark Monarch of the barbarians gazed on the work he had wrought, and the joy that he had given; and a triumphant splendour, more glorious than the beams of battle, radiated from his brow. "Chief of Azimantium," he said, "thou art gold tried in the fire, and Attila admires thee though a Greek.—Not for the beauty of thy form at all—let girls and pitiful lingers think of that!—not for thy strength and daring alone—such qualities are for soldiers and gladiators; but for thy dauntless, unshrinking, unalterable resolution—the virtue of kings, the attribute of gods.—Were Attila not Attila, he would be Menenius. Thou hast robbed me of a bride! Thou hast taken a husband from my daughter; but Attila can conquer—even himself. Sound the hymeneal! Advance to the altar! Yon priest has long been a captive among us, but his blessing on Honoria and Menenius shall bring down freedom on his own head."

The solemnity was over—the barbarian guests were gone, and through the flower-strewed passages of the palace, Honoria and Menenius were led to their bridal chamber; while a thousand thrilling feelings of joy, and hope, and thankfulness, blended into one tide of delight, poured from their mutual hearts through all their frames, like the dazzling sunshine of the glorious noon streaming down some fair valley amidst the mountains, and investing every object round in misty splendour, and dream-like light. The fruition of long delayed hope, the gratification of early and passionate love, was not all; but it seemed as if the dark cloudy veil between the present and the future had been rent for them by some divine hand, and that a long vista of happy years lay before their eyes in bright perspective to the very horizon of being. Such were the feelings of both their bosoms, as, with linked hands and beating hearts, they approached the chamber assigned to them; but their lips were silent, and it was only the love-lighted eye of Menenius, as it rested on the form of his bride, and the timid, downcast, but not unhappy glance of Honoria, that spoke the world of thoughts that crowded in their breasts.

A band of young girls, with the pale lerne at their head, met them singing at the door of their chamber. The maidens strewed their couch with flowers, and lerne gave the marriage cup to the hand of Honoria; but as she did so, there was a wild uncertain light in her eye, and a quivering eagerness on her lip, that made Menenius hold Honoria's arm as she was about to raise the chalice to her mouth. "Ha! I had forgot," said the Princess, taking back the goblet with a placid smile, "I must drink first, and then, before the moon be eleven times renewed, I too shall be a bride.—Menenius the brave! Honoria the fair! Happy lovers, I drink to your good rest! May your sleep be sound! May your repose be unbroken!" and with calm and graceful dignity, she drank a third part of the mead. Honoria drank also, according to the custom; Menenius drained the cup, and the maidens withdrawing, left the lovers to their couch. Honoria hid her eyes upon the bosom of Menenius, and the warrior, pressing her to his bosom, spoke gentle words of kind assurance, but in a moment her hand grew deathly cold. "Menenius, I am faint," she cried: "What is it that I feel? My heart seems as it were suddenly frozen, and my blood changed into snow. Oh, Menenius! Oh, my beloved! we are poisoned; I am dying! That cup of mead—that frantic girl—she has doomed us and herself to death."

As she spoke, through his own frame the same chill and icy feelings spread. A weight was upon his heart, his warm and fiery blood grew cold, the strong sinews lost their power, the courageous soul was quelled, and he gazed in speechless, unnerved horror on Honoria, while shade by shade, the living rose left her cheek, and the "pale standard" of life's great enemy marked his fresh conquest on her brow. Her eyes which, in the hour of joy and expectation, had been bent to the earth, now fixed on his with a long, deep, earnest, imploring gaze of last affection. Her arms, no longer timid, circled his form, and the last beatings of her heart throbbed against his bosom. "Thou too art dying!" she said, as she saw the potent hemlock spread death over his countenance, "thou too art dying! Menenius will not leave Honoria even in this last long journey.—We go—we go together!" and faintly she raised her hand, and pointed to the sky, where, through the enshement, the bright autumn moon poured her melancholy splendour over the Hungarian hills.—A film came over her eyes—a dark unspeakable grey shadow! and oh, it was horrible to see the bright angel part from its clay tabernacle!

In the athletic frame of the lover, the poison did not its cruel office so rapidly. He saw her fade away before his eyes—he saw her pass like a flower that had lived its summer day, in perfume and beauty, and faded with the falling of the night. He could not—he would not so lose her.—He would call for aid—some precious antidote should give her back to life. He unclasped the faint arms that still clung upon his neck. He rose upon his feet, with limbs reduced to infant weakness. His brain reeled. His heart seemed crushed beneath a mountain: but still he staggered forth. He heard voices before him. "Help! Help!" he cried, "Help, ere Honoria die!" With the last effort of existence, he rushed forward, tore open the curtain before him, reeled forward to the throne on which Attila held his midnight council—stretched forth his arms—but power—voice—sense—being—passed away, and Menenius fell dead at the Monarch's feet. "Who has done this?" exclaimed the King, in a voice of thunder. "Who has done this? By the god of battles, if it be my own children, they shall die! Is this the fate of Menenius? Is this the death that the hero of Azimantium should have known?—No! No! No! red on the battle-field—gilded with the blood of enemies—the last of a slain, but not a conquered host—so should the chief have died.—Menenius! Kinsman in glory! Attila weeps for the fate of his enemy!"

"Lord of the world! Lord of the world!" exclaimed a voice that hurried forward from the chambers beyond, "thy daughter is dead in the arms of her maidens; and dying, she sent thee word, that sooner than forbear to slay her enemies, she had drunk of the cup which she had mingled for them."

Attila smote his breast. "She was my daughter," he exclaimed, "she was, indeed, my daughter! But let her die, for she has brought a stain upon the hospitality of her father; and the world will say that Attila, though bold, was faithless."

There was woe in Azimantium, while, with slow and solemn pomp, the ashes of Honoria and Menenius were borne into the city. In the face of the assembled people, the deputies of Attila, by oath and imprecation, purified their lord from the fate of the lovers. The tale was simple, and soon told, and the children of Azimantium believed.

Days, and years, and centuries, rolled by, and a race of weak and effeminate monarchs, living alone by the feebleness and barbarism of their enemies, took care that Azimantium should not long remain as a monument of reproach to their degenerate baseness. Nation followed nation; dynasty succeeded dynasty; a change came over the earth and its inhabitants, and Azimantium was no more. Still, however, the rock on which it stood bears its bold front towards the stormy sky, with the same aspect of courageous daring with which its children encountered the tempest of the Huns.

A few ruins, too—rifted walls, and dark fragments of fallen fanes—the pavement of some sweet domestic hearth long cold—a graceful capital, or a broken statue, still tell that a city has been there; and through the country round about, the wild and scattered peasantry, still in the song, and the tale, and the vague tradition, preserve in various shapes The Story of Azimantium!

THE PROCESSION.

BY MRS HEMANS.

"The peace which passes her countenance like retaining," disclosed itself in her looks and movements. It lay

COLERIDGE.

There were trampling sounds of many feet,
And music rush'd through the crowded street,
Proud music, such as tells the sky,
Of a chief returned from victory.

There were banners to the winds unroll'd,
With haughty words on each blazon'd told;
High battle-names, which had rung of yore,
When lances clash'd on the Syrian shore.

Borne from their dwellings, green and lone,
There were flowers of the woods on the pathway strown ;
And wheels that crush'd as they swept along—
Oh ! what doth the violet amidst the throng ?

I saw where a bright Procession pass'd
The gates of a Minster, old and vast ;
And a king to his crowning place was led,
Through a sculptur'd line of the warrior dead.

I saw, far gleaming, the long array
Of trophies, on those high tombs that lay,
And the coloured light, that wrapp'd them all,
Rich, deep, and sad, as a royal pall.

But a lowlier grave soon won mine eye
Away from th' ancestral pageantry :
A grave by the lordly Minster's gate,
Unhonour'd, and yet not desolate.

It was but a dewy greensward bed,
Meet for the rest of a peasant head ;
But Love—Oh ! lovelier than all beside !—
That lone place guarded and glorified.

For a gentle form stood watching there,
Young—but how sorrowfully fair !
Keeping the flowers of the holy spot,
That reckless feet might profane them not.

Clear, pale and clear, was the tender cheek,
And her eye, though tearful, serenely meek ;
And I deem'd, by its lifted gaze of love,
That her sad heart's treasure was all above.

For alone she seem'd midst the throng to be,
Like a bird of the waves far away at sea ;
Alone, in a mourner's vest array'd,
And with folded hands, e'en as if she pray'd.

It faded before me, that masque of pride,
The haughty swell of the music died ;
Banner, and armour, and tossing plume,
All melted away in the twilight's gloom.

But that orphan form, with its willowy grace,
And the speaking prayer in that pale, calm face,
Still, still o'er my thoughts in the night-hour glide—
—Oh ! Love is lovelier than all beside.

THE BURIAL IN THE DESERT.

BY MRS HEMANS.

How weeps yon gallant Band
 O'er him their valour could not save !
 For the bayonet is red with gore,
 And he, the beautiful and brave,
 Now sleeps in Egypt's sand.—WILSON.

In the shadow of the Pyramid
 Our brother's grave we made,
 When the battle-day was done,
 And the Desert's parting sun
 A field of death survey'd.

The blood-red sky above us
 Was darkening into night,
 And the Arab watching silently
 Our sad and hurried rite.

The voice of Egypt's river
 Came hollow and profound,
 And one lone palm-tree, where we stood,
 Rock'd with a shivery sound :

While the shadow of the Pyramid
 Hung o'er the grave we made,
 When the battle-day was done,
 And the Desert's parting sun
 A field of death survey'd.

The fathers of our brother
 Were borne to knightly tombs,
 With torch-light and with anthem-note,
 And many waving plumes :

But he, the last and noblest
 Of that high Norman race,
 With a few brief words of soldier-love
 Was gather'd to his place ;

In the shadow of the Pyramid,
 Where his youthful form we laid,
 When the battle-day was done,
 And the Desert's parting sun
 A field of death survey'd.

But let him, let him slumber
 By the old Egyptian wave !
 It is well with those who bear their fame
 Unsullied to the grave !

When brightest names are breathed on,
 When loftiest fall so fast,
 We would not call our brother back
 On dark days to be cast,

From the shadow of the Pyramid,
 Where his noble heart we laid,
 When the battle-day was done,
 And the Desert's parting sun
 A field of death survey'd.

BRITISH COLONIES—JAMES STEPHEN.

LETTER TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE EARL GREY, &c. &c. &c.

By James Macquien, Esq.

MY LORD,

In my letter, under date January 4th, I pointed out to your Lordship, in some remarkable examples, the total disregard for truth which rules the enemies of the Colonies in every publication which they put forth. The statements which Mr Stephen has thought proper to promulgate in his new volume on Colonial Slavery, reflecting upon my character as an individual, and upon my works in defence of the Colonies, compel me for a moment to return to the same disgusting labour.

Accustomed as I have been to Anti-Colonial slanders, and to the bitter gall of the pens of its champions, such conduct and accusations as I am about to allude to, give me little concern. Their unguarded attacks only lay them open to severer castigation, while the soreness which they feel is evidence sufficient that the exposures which I have made of their scandalous proceedings have been felt in the proper quarters.

Not having, as Mr Stephen has, £3800 per annum from a public establishment in Great Britain, and being, moreover, one of those unfortunate individuals, who, by the laws of this free country, may be rendered the "property" of some of my fellow-countrymen, if I fail to pay for the food, clothing, and other necessaries sent from Great Britain for the use of those slaves which Mr Stephen and his righteous associates seek to take away, I cannot, on that account, spare five years, or one year (this time it would require) to make up a book which could properly expose all his tortuous windings, misrepresentations, and obvious falsehoods. I must therefore confine myself to a few of those, premising that these afford a fair specimen of the contents of his book, and of the manner in which every point and subject in it is treated and misrepresented.

At the close of his Preface, page 33, Mr Stephen tells us, that he took nearly a "year" to print his volume; the publications in defence of the Colonies, which he had to notice, having just appeared, or met my eye at certain points." Fudge! The report of the Privy Council in 1789, and the report of the House of Commons in 1788, Moody's, Macdonnell's, Macqueen's, Barclay's Colonial works, which Mr Stephen refers to, were all, with the exception of the last short pamphlet, written by the latter gentleman in 1829, published several years ago, and seen and noticed by Mr Stephen and his friends at the earliest day. So much for the confusion of facts and dates by Mr Stephen at the very outset!

At page 197, Mr Stephen, with his characteristic Anti-Colonial rancour, designates me the "dashing pensioner of the Planters," who "has exceeded his instructions;" and, not content with these epithets, he adds:

"Having mentioned those for whom, though once a mercenary antagonist, employed by the Assemblies and the planters, I have been paid by them for his pen, and noticed in the foregoing story his efforts to appease his readers, that the fact of his intentional falsehoods is far from matter of surprise or regret in the sugar colonies. His new work has been repeatedly announced in strings of colour by various newspapers (Times, &c.) and I have seen before me the Jamaica Courier of April 25th, 1828, in which the fact of his having received an annual income of £1000 sterling, is noticed in a different style. 'Our Master Macquien,' have observed the Courier (said of us), 'and again, 'Look Mr Macquien, are the hired advocates of slavery, &c.' Mr Macquien is thus contemptuously treated for having censured the alleged communication to a Jamaica printer of the Duke of Manchester's private letter to Lord Bathurst, and for his opposition to Mr Beaumont, and his pamphlet, entitled 'Compensation to Slave Owners,' a work which, it is added, has obtained the sanction of all liberal men in Jamaica—not for a sum of money, Master Macquien, &c."

This compound of undiluted venom is collected at the expense of truth, merely to give colour to the insinuation that your humble servant is, as a Colonist, hostile to emancipation, even if compensation was given. Here it is necessary shortly to observe, that Mr Beaumont is the Jamaica printer alluded to; that I never saw his "Compensation to Slave Owners;" that it is the first time I ever heard there was such a work in existence; and therefore, it is, as Mr Stephen knew it to be, false, that I ever opposed it; while it was not an alleged communication," but an actual communication to a Jamaica printer, not of a private letter from the Duke of Manchester to Lord Bathurst, but of a private and confidential letter from Lord Bathurst to the Duke of Manchester, which was given and published; and the publication of which was censured. This censure was the sole ground of Mr Beaumont's gratuitous and unjustifiable attack upon me, which should never have been noticed, unless I had found it garbled, and, for a vindictive purpose, brought forward in a work addressed to the King. Mr Stephen thus takes a polluted source as his authority, and he is welcome to the full benefit of it.

To refute the authority on which Mr Stephen grounds his slanders, and also Mr Stephen himself, I adduce the unanimous resolution and vote of the Assembly of Jamaica, Nov. 26th, 1825, and acceded to by the Council and the Governor, thus:

"Resolved, That it be recommended to the House, to direct the Receiver-General to issue to the agents, out of moneys in his hands, the sum of three thousand pounds sterling, to be paid by him to James McQueen of the City of Glasgow, free of all deduction, as a testimony of the high sense this House entertains of the valuable and unsolicited services he has rendered by his writings to the cause of SLAVERY and the West India Colonies, in revealing to and defeating the insinuated calumnies of a malignant faction in the Mother Country.

Here, my Lord, are no pensions, no mercenary applications, no "instructions," but the unexpected reward for "unsolicited services, in the cause of justice," and for "refuting the innumerable calumnies of a malignant faction in the mother country." Such were my labours; such was the reward. This was my offence in the eyes of Mr Stephen and his associates. I am proud, my Lord, of the reward, and the manner in which it was given. It refutes the silly accusations of Mr Beaumont, and the base application of these by Mr Stephen; and while I throw back in the teeth of both, with scorn, the charge of being "a mercenary antagonist,"—"a hired advocate of slavery," I fix upon Mr Stephen, without the fear of contradiction, the disgraceful brand, that to do me an injury, he has uttered a mean and a malevolent falsehood.

The censure, which, according to Mr Stephen, called forth the anger of his friend, Mr Beaumont, arose out of the following circumstance which took place in the House of Commons, February 27th, 1828:—

"Mr WILLIAM HORTON observed, that it appeared that a person of the name of Beaumont, in Jamaica, had in some manner possessed himself of a confidential correspondence between the Secretary of the Colonies and the Government of Jamaica, which he had published in a newspaper there. He boasted that he had received it from Mr Hume. He mentioned this to afford the honourable member an opportunity of stating, whether Mr Beaumont's statement was correct.

"Mr Hume observed, that he never had seen the correspondence, nor was it ever in his possession, and, as a matter of course, it could not emanate from him. All he knew of Mr Beaumont was, that he had presented a petition which he had brought to him from the people of colour in Jamaica."

In the Glasgow Courier of March 4th, 1828, the following observations were made by me on the preceding conversation:—

"A conversation, short, but of some interest, took place in the House of Commons between Mr Horton and Mr Hume, when the former stated, that Mr Beaumont had published, in a public journal in Jamaica, some private and confidential correspondence between Lord Bathurst and the Duke of Manchester upon colonial subjects, which Mr Beaumont stated he had obtained from Mr Hume. This Mr Hume denies, and says that he never saw the correspondence in question. By whatever means Mr Beaumont got possession of the correspondence, is immaterial; but nothing could be more unwarrantable and imprudent than the publication of it by him, knowing, as he must have known, that the correspondence was confidential," &c.

I leave the public to judge what cause of offence I had given to either Mr Beaumont or Mr Stephen in the preceding observations; and with this remark I leave the latter gentleman to consider what the world will think of him for dedicating and presenting a falsehood to our gracious Sovereign.

Mr Stephen, Preface, page 14, tells us, "It is not true, then, that zeal for Christianity, or what my opponents call enthusiasm in religion, made me an enemy to slavery. It would be much nearer the truth, for certain reasons, to say, that this enmity made me a Christian."

I for one, my Lord, disclaim ever having by such a charge done either Mr Stephen or Christianity such injustice. "Certain reasons" always appeared to me to excite his inveterate hostility to the colonies. Some of these may be found in the following list of places and salaries which this gentleman, and his family and relatives, receive from the public purse:—

The words "mercenary," "hired," "pensioned," &c., should never therefore escape Mr Stephen's lips, nor the lips of any of his family. They ought not to use such weapons. If they have no other and better arguments to adduce against an opponent, they ought to relinquish the contest.

Mr Stephen knows that I have no pension from any quarter. I challenge him to contradict me by producing one. My pension, my Lord, is the persecutions and the calumnies of himself and his associates. With regard to "instructions," I dare him, and I defy him, to bring forward the assembly, the planter, or the individual, either abroad or at home, who instructs or advises me, or who ever dared either to instruct or to advise me, what to write on colonial subjects. The praise, or the reproach of my writings in defence of the Colonies, are my own. I knew no adviser, instigator, instructor, or assistant in the cause.

By dislocating sentences, and suppressing words, Mr Stephen ekes out pages. I adduce the following as a specimen. Quoting a statement, originally I believe, from his own pen, viz.:—"The slaves, whether male or female, are driven to hard labour by the impulse of the cart-whip;" he connects with this, part of a sentence written by me in refutation, thus:—"This is either wholly false, or the facts are misrepresented. The slaves are not driven to work," &c.; and then, says he, the extract referred to "goes on as in my former quotation." This "former quotation," in page 120, of his work, runs thus:—"The persons called drivers, so far from driving them to the field, leave their houses and reach the places where they are to work, at least half an hour before a single negro approaches the place," and clinging to the subject dislocated, Mr Stephen, p. 196, further adds regarding this refutation; "but he does not stop here: he has the inconceivable confidence to add, 'wherever they go, or whatever they do, he goes before them, and stands before them, and not behind them: nor dare he use a whip to any one unless he is commanded.'"

The quotation, thus mangled and dislocated, Mr Stephen, moreover, introduces with the assertion, that it was in my work "natured in with the following exclamation,"—"when will the anti-colonial party tell truth—Never, while they can substitute falsehood or misrepresentation for it!"

Now, my Lord, the preceding "exclamation" did not usher in the quotation particularly referred to, but concluded observations upon, and a refutation of, the huge anti-colonial falsehood, that the 800,000 slaves in the West India colonies were branded with red-hot irons!

* Official return of last Session gives this L.1500. With cheese-parings and candle-ends, I am told it is equal to L.2000.

To understand Mr Stephen's special-pleading practice more clearly, however, I lay before your Lordship entire the accusation and the refutation alluded to, thus:—

Anti-colonist,—“The slaves, whether male or female, are driven to hard labour by the impulse of the cart-whip, for the sole benefit of their owners, from whom they receive no wages; and this labour is continued (with certain intermissions for breakfast and dinner) from morning to night throughout the year.”

To this my answer, page 256, was:—

“This is either wholly false, or else the facts are mis-represented. The slaves are not driven to their work; the whip is only used to punish them when they neglect their duty or commit a crime; the persons called drivers, so far from driving them to the field, have their houses and reach the places where they are to work, at least half an hour before a single negro turns out or approaches the place. Whenever they go, and what or they are about, he goes before them, and stands before them, for dare he use the whip to any one unless he is commanded. The master indeed gives his slave no wages, in that a conception of the word, but he gives him better, what the slave can less easily abuse, viz. clothing, food, a house, assistance for his hands to cultivate for himself, implements to cultivate his own fields; he protects and supports him in sickness, infancy, and old age; good or bad times make no difference to him, he is still provided for; justice is obtained for him without a fee, and he has no taxes to pay. Are these things nothing? Are they not wages such as millions of free men cannot possibly obtain? Why should these undeniable truths be so disingenuously concealed?”

This was my reply and refutation. Mr Stephen has refuted no part of it; but your Lordship will observe, that he has, with “inconceivable confidence,” suppressed the chief point at issue, in the words in capitals, viz. “The whip is only used to punish them when they neglect their duty or commit a crime.” Suppressing this, omitting a portion of what he had written, and withholding above three-fourths of my refutation, which bore on his whole charge, he makes it appear as if the part he quotes were the whole, and that whole directed against all, instead of being, as he makes it, directed against a fraction of his. What dishonesty! Moreover, because a black man is intrusted with a whip for the purposes above mentioned, is this country to be told, that every slave is driven to his work and at his work? Why, my lord, we may with equal propriety be told, that British soldiers and British sailors are driven to their duty and at their duty—to exercise and to battle, by “the cat o’ nine tails” and halberds, because these weapons are, under superior authority, used to designate authority, and to punish offences, or any neglect of duty amongst them.

The Report of the Legislature of St Vincent’s, adduced by Mr Stephen, confirms my statement, that no driver is permitted to use the whip, unless he is commanded. To refute this, Mr Stephen, with special-pleading sophistry, quotes (p. 199) a section of the St Vincent’s Slave law, thus:—

“That in order to restrain arbitrary punishment, no slave on any plantation or estate shall receive more than ten stripes at one time, and for one offence, unless the owner, attorney, guardian, executor, administrator, or manager of such plantation or estate, having such slave under his care, shall be present.”

Mr Stephen knows, and must know, that there is still one subordinate authority on every estate, besides those above enumerated, namely, the “overseer,” as he is called in the Windward Islands, and in Jamaica “book-keeper,” a white man; and it is his authority, not the authority of the driver, which is limited to ten stripes. There is, therefore, no error or contradiction on the part of either the Legislature of St Vincent’s, or your humble servant.

But the contradiction already alluded to extended to the latter clause of the anti-colonial accusation, thus:—

“The nature of this labour, and whether it was ‘hard labour’ or not, will best be ascertained by laying fully before the reader a plain and undeniable statement.”

“The days and nights in our West India islands are so nearly equal, that the difference is not worth taking into account, and may be taken at twelve hours each. The negroes are called to their work in the morning, on some estates by a bell, on some by the blowing of a shell, and on others by the crack of the whip; they seldom assemble till half-past six o'clock, and they quit their work again at six in the evening. During this period they have two hours to dinner, and one hour to breakfast, the latter of which meals is carried out to them by women appointed for that purpose, and who also carry water during the heat of the day to such as may require it to drink. If a heavy rain falls, they are ordered to their houses, and if they get wet, they receive, each who may choose to take it, a dram. Women who have families are allowed to remain in their houses till nine o'clock, in order to take care of their children, and cook their husbands' breakfasts, which they carry to the field warm, leaving their children under the care of an old woman, who receives a quantity of rice and abundance of milk to feed them with.

"She, the mother, is allowed to go home half an hour before noon, to stay half an hour later than the other negroes when they turn out in the afternoon, and again gets liberty to go home half an hour before sunset; she never works above six hours in the day, nor does any negro out of crop work above nine hours."

I remark here, in order to prevent all cavil and dispute, that what is meant by nine hours' labour each day, applies to the average time the slaves are actually at work, and does not include the time which is taken up in coming from and going to their work, which is more or less, according to the distance which the fields are from their homes; but which may average on estates thirty-five minutes more; while the nine hours also is applied to the average of the year, exclusive of the extra labour which is performed by the able-bodied slaves on some estates during crop, six hours more every third night. But this night labour is, I understand, generally abandoned, from the introduction of improved machinery.

Mr Stephen spins out eighty closely printed octavo pages with miserable quibbles, to which a few words are a sufficient reply, beginning (p. 109) his labour with a senseless and silly sneer, thus:—

"The courageous Mr Macquien assures us, in what he calls a plain and undeniable statement, that the days and nights in the West India islands are so nearly equal, that the difference is not worth taking into account, and may be reckoned at to the hour each—and from which, and other premises equally undeniable, he concludes, and expressly asserts, that no negro out of crop works above nine hours."

The slaves work from sunrise till sunset. Any nautical almanack will determine this time. In three parallels the length of the days stands thus:—

N. Lat.	Longest Day.		Shortest Day.
	Sun rises.	Sun sets.	Sun rises.	S
6° Demerara	5h. 50m.	6h. 10m.	6h. 5	5
12° Grenada	5 30	6 21	6 29	5
18° Jamaica	5 28	6 52	6 32	5

Garbling, dislocating, and suppressing documents and words in the manner mentioned, Mr Stephen makes up his work, extending his own labour without being able to extend the daily labours of the slave. What that is has been seen, and is well known. Compared with the labours performed in this country, how does it stand? Exclusive of the time taken up in going and in coming from his work, the day labourer in Britain works twelve hours each day, with only two hours out of the twelve for his meals. Agricultural servants and house servants work still longer hours each day, exclusive of the extra hours which the former labour in harvest, and on other emergencies. Individuals, and even children employed in cotton and other manufactories, including two hours set apart for meals, and exclusive of the time occupied in going to, and in coming from, their labour, work fourteen hours each day. Hand-loom weavers work sixteen and eighteen hours each day, and housekeepers of the middle classes frequently work twenty hours each day, and a portion of Sunday besides, without one day's relaxation throughout the year, unless their wages cease; and all this without a single whimper or whine ever being heard from any anti-colonial mouth about it.

"Judge not, lest ye be judged:"—"with the same measure which ye mete, it shall be meted unto you again," says the highest authority. Mr Stephen has subjected himself to be judged by this, when he comes before us, Preface, p. 15, in the following character, forcibly drawn by himself :—

"When I first knew the West Indies I was a very young man, and no less ignorant and regardless of Christianity, as of all at least that exclusively belongs to it, than young men in my own sphere of life then too generally were. I had early imbibed such theological opinions as are commonly called liberal, and though religion was not wholly left out of my scheme, either in theory or practice, it was a religion in which not only Christians of the lowest standard, but enlightened heathens, might have concurred," &c.

True Christianity, my Lord, is that system of theology—"which thinketh no evil"—which rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth." Mr Stephen, in all his colonial warfare, never rejoices but in iniquity, nor mourns but at the appearance of truth. Consequently, his boasted Christianity cannot be genuine Christianity.

This liberal Christian and half-enlightened heathen system of theology, Mr Stephen informs us, first induced him to turn his attention and his energies to the emancipation of the Colonial slaves. The world, it appears from history, has aforetime had in it individuals guided by similar "theological opinions" and objects. The Apostle Paul in the course of his ministry was much annoyed with men professing similar principles and opinions, and who, acting upon those principles and opinions, wished, by rash, precipitate, and unjust acts, to break asunder hastily, and by violence, the bonds of civil society then subsisting. In 1st Timothy, chap. vi. ver. 1-5, he has drawn their character in a very forcible manner, and which equally applies to all men in every age who follow their footsteps :

"Let as many servants [slaves] as are under the yoke count their own masters worthy of all honour, that the name of God and his doctrine be not blasphemed. And they that have believing masters let them not despise them, because they are brethren, but rather do them service, because they are faithful and beloved, partakers of the benefits. These things teach and exhort. If any man teach otherwise, and consent not to wholesome words, EVEN THE WORDS OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST, and to the doctrine which is according to godliness; he is proud, [Greek, a fool] knowing nothing, but doting [Greek, sick] about questions and strifes of words, whereof cometh envy, strife, railing, evil surmises, perverse disputings [Greek, gallings one of another] of men of corrupt minds, and destitute of the truth, supposing that gain is godliness: from such withdraw thyself."

Mr Stephen denies that, in his anti-colonial proceedings, he is actuated by religious enthusiasm; but if the following is not religious enthusiasm, and that of the most dangerous description, I confess myself ignorant of the terms. In pages 395-6-7 of his new work, Mr Stephen tells us, that the murder of Louis the XVI., the dethronement of Louis the XVIII. by Bonaparte, in 1815, the misfortunes of two Kings of Spain, and two of Portugal, and the Prince of Orange, and also the exile of Charles the X., were all produced because the nations which they ruled bought African slaves, and maintained colonial slavery! He further informs us, that this country, from the same cause, was unsuccessful in the war in which she was engaged, until she abolished the African slave trade in 1807; after which, "the favour of Divine Providence continued manifestly to be with us," causing Napoleon to go to Spain, Portugal, and Russia, when we were wonderfully rescued from dangers more alarming than the country had ever known, and by means not less extraordinary than unforeseen. Public credit, national prosperity, commerce, and manufactures, flourished and increased until within the last six years, when lo! because we have not emancipated the African slaves which we have in our colonies, "Divine vengeance" is "armed against us;" and we consequently have a "licentious, seditious press, poor-laws, taxes, debt, depressed land-owners, farmers, and agricultural peasants," and dissatisfied "starving labourers," and "the portentous movements on the continent," the forerunners of revolution and civil war!!

Mr Stephen forgets that colonial slavery existed during all those years in which, by the "interference of a righteous Providence," Europe saw Napoleon overthrown. Mr Stephen also forgets that all our glorious naval victories, which swept the navies of all our foes from the ocean, had been gained before this country abolished the slave-trade, and I leave him to reconcile the facts according to his doctrine; how comes it to pass, that while this country is suffering in the way he describes, because she maintains slavery in her colonies, the American President only, the other day is found ascribing thanks to the Most High, for the peace and prosperity which these States are enjoying, although, by their laws, they maintain personal slavery in them to a much greater extent than that which exists in the colonies belonging to Great Britain? According to Mr Stephen, if this country had not abolished the slave-trade in 1807, Bonaparte would not have invaded Portugal, Spain, Germany and Russia, nor France, and he have been humbled after such a prodigious expense of blood and treasure on the part of all concerned! Such doctrines, my Lord, are truly distressing, when we thus see the Creator of heaven and earth brought into action as the heated, prejudiced, and erring mind of a human individual thinks proper to point out and to determine; and Mr Stephen must consider the intellect of the people of this country very limited, or very disordered indeed, before he could call upon them to take such doctrines for their guide; and which, if put in practice, will most assuredly cover our empire with anarchy and destruction.

It is sickening to contemplate such proceedings and such principles, more especially on the part of one who, from the interest which he has gained by calumniating our colonies, has fastened himself, his family, and his relations, upon the richest quarter of the British Treasury; and having done so, proceeds with impunity to defame and to ruin those vast and valuable appendages of our empire, from which a large portion of the heavy taxes raised in this country is procured to fill that Treasury. Away with the stupidity of a nation and a Government which can suffer themselves to be rode rough-shod over by such mischievous fanatics!

The party to which I allude are in fact the rulers of our colonial empire. The heroes who bore our flag in triumph through blood and death at Trafalgar and at Waterloo, if appointed to command in our colonies, tremble before the cabal which assembles in Aldermanbury Street, and which has been allowed to beard our Government, to insult our Legislature, and to trample upon our laws, and to endanger the existence of our colonial empire.

It is a fact, notorious to the most attentive observer, that they seek to have every authority in the colonies the creature of their hands. Governors, judges, lawyers, protectors, customhouse-officers, &c., must either all be their slaves, or, if they presume to do their duty, and to tell the truth, submit to have themselves traduced, and rendered obnoxious in the eyes of their fellow-countrymen, by those periodical vehicles of falsehood which the faction I allude to patronise and control. All the disturbers of the public peace, incendiaries, ranting tyrants, and legal plunderers, which the colonies are compelled to see and to suffer—every discontented knave, clerical and lay, who has been driven in disgrace from colonial society, has only to throw himself into the arms of the party alluded to, and commence a system of calumny and falsehood against the colonies, when he is instantly taken by the hand and provided for, and set beyond the reach of the laws and the indignation of an insulted people.*

* The Anti-Colonists pitch upon as champions all weak heads and heavy purses, and flatter the one while they fleece the other, and especially they call to their aid all clergymen who like to hear themselves declaim everywhere rather than in their own pulpits,—young ones seeking churches and wives, and widowers seeking widows and penances,—all, in short, who have influence with the fair sex, and both these they dore with their publications till they render them incapable of discovering between truth and falsehood; and joining to these cunning Quakers, old sinners pretending repentance, and needy liberal lawyers, they form a noisy body which guides and misleads the public, or prosecutes individuals as may suit their purpose.

If it was worth while, many remarkable examples of this kind might be adduced. About the commencement of the anti-colonial crusade, an Episcopalian clergyman, who had been

Every thing is done to and for that party which they think their interest requires. They pitch upon the coast of Africa, as a gutter through which they may draw the wealth of the British Treasury into their purses, and it is accordingly fitted up for them. To secure, as they think, wealth from its shores, the African black, liberated in our other tropical possessions, is prohibited from being employed in the labours of agriculture. To secure this object, the labour of free men in the Mauritius has, as I shewed in my last letter, been annihilated; and to secure the same object, the labour of free agriculturists in Hindostan is secretly and insidiously discountenanced and opposed. In order to throw the tropical commerce of Great Britain into the coast of Africa, which they control and direct as they please, the industry of the West India colonies is everywhere crushed, and the population of them in many places is fixed by law to barren rocks, where even the wild goat can hardly find food sufficient to live. Their interest, their contemplated interest, hatched the oppressive and iniquitous law, which, in several colonies, plunges master and slave into equal want and misery, while they have dared and been suffered to tell some of your predecessors in office to their faces, that though they knew the law to be oppressive and unjust, and as much so to the slave as to the master, yet that it should be maintained as it is, in order to compel the ruined master to emancipate his slave on impoverished land, where they know well no labour could ever raise any thing to injure that forced labour, which they could readily obtain, and which competition done away with, they would just as readily seek on the coast of Africa. These are the real springs which direct the proceedings of our domineering anti-colonists, and which deceive, and are suffered to deceive, the population of this country.

The colonial regulations are, in fact, their regulations; and the colonial appointments too frequently their appointments; and when enquiry is sought into colonial matters, the government is obliged to consult them, and even to saddle every commission with individuals of their stamp, and of their choosing. Whenever the government proceeded to deliberate on colonial affairs, they were obliged, as the compulsory manumission laws shew, to inform that party of their proceedings, and it would appear, to follow their directions, otherwise the enacting of these laws in the teeth of the evidence brought forward upon the enquiry, remains inexplicable. To the disgrace of our country, the government have, in every colonial proceeding, been forced to truckle to that party, while a dozen of men, which the same number of old wo-obliged to leave St Kitt's on account of the detestation in which he was held for severity to his slaves, comes to England. He got acquainted with Mr Wilberforce, and by representing the cruel treatment of the slaves as most barbarous, he ingratiated himself with a party, got good favouring by their influence in the west of England, where he continued a bitter and cruel enemy to the policy of his death!

Amongst those who in Parliament and out of Parliament last year declaimed most loudly against the colonies, we find Edward PROTHMER, jun. in order to catch Bristolian radical votes. This gentleman's whole fortune is derived from the West Indies; and at the moment he was declaiming most loudly against West India slavery, the proceeds of the sale of estates and slaves were daily tumbling into his coffers, or into coffers from which he partakes, and which will be wholly his if he live!!

A similar instance of inconsistency and popular vanity lately occurred in this city. Dr WARDLAW, a clergyman of some celebrity in the Independent persuasion, has, during the last six years, applied himself to be made the slave of Quakers and other Anti-Colonists, and has on every occasion stood forward a most violent enemy to the colonies, denouncing all West India property as the "accursed thing," and "meat offered to idols." Dr Wardlaw, however, when he was about twenty-three years of age, and about the time he was licensed for the ministry, sold, along with other branches of his family, to a gentleman in the vicinity of Glasgow, his share of an estate and slaves in Jamaica, left by an uncle, and for which he received £1,2000 sterling, and stating, when the bargain was made, that it was a most advantageous one for all concerned! In this way the colonies are black-balled by men who have been enriched by them.

men, in any part of Great Britain, would not think it worth their while to drive out of their way, have been allowed to goad this country into madness and injustice, to make Liverpool shake, Canning quail, and the hero of Waterloo, as a matter of expediency, to leave the wrongs of our colonies unredressed, and unattended to.

By the resolutions of 1823, the House of Commons, driven by the party so often alluded to, levelled in the dust the barrier that guards private property, and adopted the hideous principle, that it might be invaded, and regulated whenever, and as the nation pleased, without the perils of the state calling for or requiring it. The orders in Council, consequent upon these, made bad worse, and the arbitrary act of this country commenced that interference which goes to take away, or to deteriorate private property, without compensation, as circumstances, prejudices, and sudden impulses, may lead the nation to demand. Disguise matters as we may, my Lord, this is the plain and constitutional English of this interference, of these resolutions, and of these orders.

The firmest stone of the British constitution was undermined and shaken in its place by these proceedings. Where, my Lord, I will ask, is the British Minister who would, upon resolutions of the House of Commons, venture to issue an order in council, to take away, or to pull down an old building, or any building, in any one of our cities, to drive a road, a canal, or a railway, as they might direct, through any private property, without compensation, and without the damages having been, under the judicial tribunals, and the laws of the country, previously fixed and paid? The property of the colonies is just as much the creature of the law, and as much under its safe-guard and protection, as any description of property in this country; and why then should the colonies be subjected to proceedings against, and an interference with, private property, to which no one in this country can be subjected?

The nation stood silent while the injustice proceeded. The declaimers had it all their own way. The colonies suffered—they remonstrated, they complained—but their remonstrances were treated with contempt, and their complaints proclaimed "contumacy." Your predecessor in office, Mr Canning, threatened their destruction by a wag of his hand, and by "Fiscal regulations." The weak heads in the British legislature applauded his unconstitutional and anti-British threats and bravadoes, and the anti-British threats and bravadoes of the anti-colonial fry which followed in his footsteps, while Europe saw, with astonishment, and a part of it with secret satisfaction, a large portion of the British empire subjected to measures enacted by authority as arbitrary as the decrees of the Czar of Russia, or the Sultan of Constantinople, and the consequences of which, they know, are certain to sap and destroy the resources and the naval preponderance of this country.

Legislation, my Lord, to be right and to do good, must be founded on truth, and truth can only be ascertained on important questions relating to countries at a distance, from practical information, and by sober and solemn enquiry. If this course be neglected, tremendous evils must ensue. Now, in all that concerns our Colonies, this country has, during the last fifteen years, legislated without previous enquiry, and the results hitherto have been irritation, error, and wrongs innumerable.

Within the metropolis of this country, we behold an irresponsible and unconstitutional society established, with branches extended into almost every town in the kingdom; and under the very eye of our government, and in the very teeth of our laws, we find this society advocating and calling for the invasion and destruction of private property, in vast appendages of our empire, as a measure of prudence, justice, and humanity, and which society and its branches exclude from their deliberations every individual who refuses to give his most unqualified assent to their hideous and destructive principles!

In consequence of the exertions of this society, this country believes, and is taught to believe, that the Slave Trade carried on by Europeans with the States of Africa, is the cause of African ignorance, debasement, and barbarity, instead of these being, as they really are, the cause of the African Slave Trade. Under the former belief, however, we legislate, and we accordingly waste our time, our exertions, and our money, and find that personal slavery in Africa, and the African Slave Trade, are increased, not lessened, by the means we have taken to extinguish it.*

This country purchased in Africa, from the established rulers thereof, and took a multitude of African savages to the Colonies, and there placed them as slaves to enlightened and civilized masters, who, under humane laws and regulated authority, teach them industry, moral habits, and civilization, and create wealth for the parent State. Great Britain disbelieves, and is taught to disbelieve, these facts. Under this belief, she is called upon to legislate; she does so, and the consequences are, that she commits injustice, and goes by arbitrary legislation to reproduce idleness and barbarism amongst a people comparatively industrious and civilized.

In proceeding despotically to abolish personal slavery, Great Britain acts under the belief that the slave population of her colonies are deteriorated and deteriorating, instead of these being, as they are, improved and improving; and she goes further wrong by legislating as if the population in these colonies, both free and bond, were of one colour, of the same ideas and habits, equal in numbers, and, in fact, as if there were no difference whatever amongst them on all these points.

Commencing with savages, nay, with the very refuse, the criminals of savage nations, as this country did when she collected the African slaves in her colonies, it is clear that ages of progressive improvement must precede the establishment, amongst such a race, of that rational freedom which is established in civilized states. If mankind proceed on other principles when legislating for such a race, they must, and they will, infallibly produce revolution and bloodshed, injustice and ruin.

Admitting that half the population of this country, men of the same colour, were slaves, I ask, could such a state of society be abrogated in a moment by act of Parliament, and the slave and the country benefited by the ruin and the beggary of the master, even admitting that no other political convulsion ensued, and also that the enfranchised people were willing to labour, or that the government were strong enough to compel them to do so? The answer which any thinking mind must give to the question, would be, certainly not!

How much more difficult and dangerous then, my Lord, must it be to abrogate, by act of Parliament, a similar state of society in the Tropical World, where the number of bond to free is as ten to one—where the colour of the skin and the smell of the one race separate the races by almost impassable barriers—where barbarous manners prevail amongst one class, and where, above all, from the ideas, the pursuits, the wants and the inclinations—from the influence of climate and habits amongst the most numerous class—these are disinclined to labour, and more especially disinclined to engage in every species of agricultural labour. These, my Lord, are formidable, and, I fear, insurmountable barriers; at least, they

* Take the following in proof of what I say of the Slave Trade
(Free Press and Advocate of the Colonies, January 27, 1831.)

We have received the following interesting letter of a very late date, from Sierra Leone. It is strange that this pestiferous colony is still retained —

“Sierra Leone, December 6, 1830.

“Great mortality has prevailed here lately. The slave trade has been carrying on in the heart of this Colony every day and every hour brings forward fresh facts in corroboration of Chief Justice JEFFERSON'S observations on this point. Last session, a man was sentenced to ten years' hard labour, for kidnapping four boys, and another to five years' for selling a little girl. There are at present TWENTY-THREE persons in jail for this offence, and two British Merchants are at large on their own recognisances, for aiding and abetting the slave trade, among the prisoners are some disciples of the Missionaries. The saints may raise a hue and cry at this statement, but facts are stubborn things. The Grand Jury, at the close of the last session, came into court, and the foreman handed the Chief Justice a written address, thanking the Governor and the Chief Justice for their unwearying efforts to promote the interests of the Colony, and for the zeal they manifested on every occasion, to suppress the slave trade.

must for a long time be so. Yet the people of this country disbelieve these facts, and, disbelieving them, they proceed to gain their object by a course which is most dangerously wrong.

This country has been deafened with asseverations about the success of voluntary African labour in raising tropical produce. There is not a syllable of truth in any one of the statements put forth. It is not found amongst the enfranchised people of colour in the United States of America, in Hayti, or in Sierra Leone; nor is there, I may say, beyond perhaps a single solitary instance, any such a thing known amongst the whole free coloured population, in the British and other European colonies. Moreover, my Lord, what has become of Mr Buxton's boasted Hindostan Free Labour Company,—capital five millions sterling? Where is it, or what has it accomplished?

When I say the labours of agriculture, I allude to those articles of Tropical produce which Europeans seek in exchange for their merchandise, and without the production of which no Tropical colony is of any value to any European nation. Every one knows, and no one denies, that negroes in general will labour to procure country provisions necessary to supply their few wants. They did so in Africa; they do so in the colonies; but without coercion, to a certain extent, they will do no more; and it is equally obvious and well known, that such productions are not, and never can be made, articles of barter or exchange in a trade with the nations of Europe.

Even if this nation were able and willing to give full compensation to the colonial proprietors, it would be a most dangerous and impolitic step to take, both as it regards herself and the slaves, to enfranchise them. It would be a fearful loss to this country by the total ruin of the colonies as productive agricultural settlements,—while the ruin of these settlements would inevitably tend to stimulate the production of tropical produce in the colonies of foreign and rival states; and thus in a double ratio, go to deteriorate the strength and resources of this country. To the slaves themselves the loss would be irreparable, and their return to idleness and anarchy the certain and inevitable result.

It belongs to the wisdom of the present day to propose to civilize and to instruct savages, and to teach them morality and religion by pampering and making them as idle as possible. It belongs to the philanthropy of the present hour to cry that no slave can commit a crime, and to weep at the report of the infliction of a few stripes upon him, when he deserves them; while their own countrymen receive ten times more for less offences; and while their own vagrant laws condemn to work-houses, tread-mills, stocks and jails, the idle and the dissolute among them; and it peculiarly belongs to the anti-colonial wisdom of this age to destroy £140,000,000 of property, in order to improve a people and to enrich a country; and to maintain that the half savages in the Torrid Zone, where the spontaneous productions of nature can supply their few wants, will readily perform voluntary labour, while they see, or they may see, under their own eyes, hundreds of thousands of men and women following their respective callings of swindlers, thieves, and prostitutes, merely because they abhor labour, and will not labour.

The anti-colonists, my Lord, may say and assert what they will, but civilisation never can advance in our colonies if the authority of the European master is withdrawn, and protection to his interest and his property is refused or neglected. If Africans are left to themselves, they can neither civilize themselves nor rule each other with safety. They are deficient in the knowledge or judgment necessary to do either. The greater the number of slaves that are enfranchised by arbitrary and compulsory laws, the more extensive will be the idleness, poverty, misery, and crime, which will be produced in the Colonies, unless something effectual is done, by the hand of power, to induce or to oblige these enfranchised blacks to engage in agricultural labour, by which labour only they can rear exchangeable produce fit for the European trade, in order to obtain the necessaries and the luxuries of life. Unless they do so, they must remain as they are—poor, idle, and ignorant—a nuisance to the community, or a burden upon it. The proprietors of estates and slaves are surely not to be compelled, or to be taxed, to support and instruct these people. Who, then, is to pay for it? for they neither will nor can do it themselves? It is here, it is amongst this class, my Lord, that the authority of the British Government ought to begin improvement by commanding industry. First induce this class to labour in agriculture for such wages as the proprietor can afford to give, and a nucleus of free labour is at once established; which, increasing in number and industry, would supply the place of the slaves gradually emancipated. Accomplish this, my Lord, and you will quickly find that, when the colonial proprietor can obtain a supply of labourers for such wages as he can afford to give, he is not more, nay less, attached to personal slavery than his ungrateful countrymen, who so cruelly vilify and defame him, and clamour so loudly against the system. Do this, my Lord; reform the laws and the courts of justice in the Colonies; make governors, judges, and crown lawyers independent and honest, and all men in these possessions, speak the truth of them; protect and encourage all those individuals who do so; free the march and administration of justice from ignorance, error, and the influence of local feuds and prejudices, and give to the British colonial agricultural proprietor protection and profit, and you will have little more to do in order to extinguish personal slavery in the Colonies; but, unless all these things are done, and wisely done, Great Britain can only extinguish personal slavery in her Colonies by the total ruin of every individual in them.

The improvement and civilisation of the slave must not only be retarded, but in fact be wholly prevented, by the degradation and ruin of the master. Yet it is in this way the anti-colonists seek to accomplish their object, and it is with regret and sorrow I state, that government appear to follow too closely in their footsteps. Hence, every thing that can really improve the slave, through the prosperity of the master, is wholly lost sight of, as unworthy of consideration. The judicial establishments in the colonies have got into the most dreadful disorder. Property, and the interests of the European creditor, are torn to pieces by legal chicanery and ignorance. The most flagrant violations of law and justice are rendered secure by the support which the violators can readily obtain from the powerful anti-colonial party in this country, by pretending affection for the slave, and by furnishing tales of fictitious woe, to assist anti-colonial misrepresentation. The master, calumniated and reviled beyond all precedent, the produce of his property rendered valueless, and that property itself threatened to be taken away by the anti-colonists, and shattered by the proceedings of their creatures, go to prevent improvement; and for the want of funds and means, not of inclination, every thing is left to languish in the colonies; while violent sectarians, and liberalised churchmen, contrary, I am certain, to the wishes and instructions of the societies in this country which employ them, proceed, under the patronage and support which they are sure to obtain from the reckless anti-colonists, to undermine the principles of the established church in matters of faith, and the authority of the masters in matters of power and policy, in order that the whole direction of the slave population may be thrown into their hands—thus sowing dissension, and engendering strife, amongst and between all classes of the population in the colonies.

These, and more and worse than these, my Lord, are evils notorious and undeniable, which are spread and daily spreading in the colonies, and which, it would appear, are rather encouraged than discountenanced by the government. How, or where, are the colonists to obtain the pecuniary means to forward the instruction of their slaves, while the produce of their lands does not nearly pay the expenses of raising it? And where are they to obtain credit to aid them, when they and the world are told, that their property is an illegal and an "accursed thing," and, as such, ought to be swept away? Moreover, while the master is anxious to extend to his bondmen the benefits of the faith in which he has been instructed, is it reasonable to require of the master, that he shall be compelled to permit his slave to be instructed in a different creed?

He merely pretends the Established Church to the unsteady conventicle.

To remedy the evils pointed out, and to fix the necessary remedies on a sure foundation, you must, my Lord, have, first, a strict and impartial enquiry, by honest and unprejudiced men, into the actual state of the society which exists in the colonies; and, secondly, that enquiry must be gone into, without the assistance or admission into it of men who proclaim the robbery of the colonies as a Christian duty; and also free from the chains, the terrors, and the persecutions, which the anti-colonists have been permitted to place upon, and to carry on against every honest man who dared to oppose their schemes, their objects, and their interests.

The laws for the government of the slaves in our colonies, even if they were emancipated, must, as emanating from this country, always be arbitrary and despotic; and while they are slaves, it is obvious they must also be governed by laws, different in power, though not in spirit, from the laws which are enacted to govern the free population of this country.

It is not, my Lord, slavery in the abstract that I defend; but it is the circumstances, the acts, and the deeds, which the anti-colonists assert occur, and are committed under the system, which I have disputed, denied, and refuted. The anti-colonists assert, that the West India colonists obtained their slaves contrary to the laws of the African states, and contrary to the laws of this country, and that personal slavery in any part of our empire was also contrary to the laws of Great Britain. They assert that personal slavery is contrary to the laws of God, and a crime in his sight. They state that the slaves in our colonies are not recognised as having any rights in the eye of any law. They assert, that they enjoy no protection, and are treated with systematic and unrelenting cruelty, ill fed, and overworked. They assert, that the slaves decrease in numbers from these causes, and they adduce particular instances of severity and cruelty as the general rule. They assert that the slaves in our colonies are deteriorated in habits, feelings, and industry, and that they are in. They colonies produced by their labour exportable produce, and they denied that there were any personal slaves in Hindostan, &c. &c.

From the laws of God, the laws of my country, the laws of the colonies; from authentic facts, proofs, and references, which cannot be gainsayed, I shewed that there was not a syllable of truth in any one of their statements; and for doing this I have been loaded with many insulting epithets by Mr Stephen and his associates. Let the public judge between us. Truth and honesty will prevail over falsehood, dishonesty, and hypocrisy; and neither misrepresentation, calumny, nor reproach, can turn me from my purpose, nor make me forsake the path which I have chosen, and which I know to be straight-forward, correct, and honest.

Turn to this important colonial question, my Lord, as a national question; take it up and regulate it, not according to the interests of individuals, or parties, but according to the principles of justice, and of the great interests of the nation. Unite the interests of our whole colonial possessions, east, west, north, and south, in one connecting chain, and bind the whole to the mother country by the indissoluble link of justice and protection. While you throw behind your back the interested clamours of East India partisans, and the childish and dangerous schemes of the anti-colonial enthusiasts, trample, at the same time, below your feet the mean and miserable intrigues for popularity, place, power, and individual gain, which too often appear amongst the West India interests in this country, and which lead them, in some instances, even to support the mad schemes of their enemies, and to surrender for political favour, and fancied advantages, the independence of colonial rights, and security of colonial property; and which political intrigues and party jealousies, have done them more injury than the efforts of all their open enemies. Tread all these, my Lord, below your feet, and then all our colonies will be united and protected, flourish and be happy, and with their prosperity the best interests of the mother country must also inevitably be increased and flourish. I am, &c.

JAMES MACQUEEN.

THE STATE OF IRELAND.

Our readers will remember, that in opposing what was called Catholic Emancipation, we took no narrow, or abstract grounds. Respecting highly many of its more distinguished opponents, we yet deeply regretted in private the line of argument they adopted, and we, in silence, avoided what we thought a capital error in them. In consequence, we rested not on the Coronation Oath, or the Protestantism of the Constitution, and we called for no perpetual exclusion; putting other things aside, we argued the matter on right and expediency, with reference to the actual condition of Ireland. We insisted that emancipation ought to be delayed until it could be granted with safety—that it ought to be preceded by the destruction of the despotism of the Catholic priests—the reconstruction of Irish society by means of the removal of surplus inhabitants—the introduction of poor-laws, &c.—the proper repair and purification of the Established Church—the production of due obedience to law—the formation of a balance of Protestants in the Catholic parts of the country—the restoration of its legitimate political influence to Protestant property, &c. &c. While we thus strenuously maintained that power ought not to be conceded until the essential qualifications and safeguards for preventing its abuse, should be created, we laboured to make the agitation of the question a means of spurring Protestant and Catholic, ruler and subject, into co-operation for civilizing, pacifying, and enriching Ireland. On the confessions of the demagogues, we predicted that the Duke of Wellington's "great measure" would only add to evil, and clear the field for the introduction of infinitely more dangerous questions.

Experiment has refuted us as little on this, as it has done on other matters; we stand not among those whom it has covered with contempt and infamy.

Our opponents, the Cabinet, Parliamentary, Review, and Newspaper, sages—the monopolists of knowledge—the great "Taught"—the only "liberal and enlightened"—the exclusive proprietors of talent, wisdom, and honesty, of course acted differently. They could not deign to see any thing, save abstract principle and generality; for people so perfect as themselves to look at vulgar fact and circumstance, men and things, at the actual condition of Ireland and the empire, was a matter not to be thought of. On their wild abstract generalities, they protested that unconditional emancipation would be an infallible nostrum for every Irish malady—would destroy the power of O'Connell and the demagogues—annihilate the political influence of the Catholic priests—extinguish the strife between Protestant and Catholic—convert the Catholic to Protestantism—replace tenant under the control of landlord—fill Ireland with British capital—reduce the army—create in two years a clear sinking fund of ten millions—bestow incalculable benefits on the Established Church—indissolubly unite Ireland with Britain—overwhelm Ireland with prosperity—and produce we know not how many other similar benefits. The Irish black and grey horses were to draw together at so furious a rate on the uphill road of wealth, as to completely distance the slow, heavy English ones. The English national team was to be put in no small danger of being run over by that of the sister island.

In what condition has experiment placed these sages? These self-same identical people are proclaiming that emancipation has created a new Catholic Question infinitely more mischievous and dangerous than the old one—has only emancipated the Catholics from the disabilities which restricted them from attempting to dismember the empire. According to their asseverations, the power of the demagogues and priests is even more irresistible than ever—in so far as Protestant and Catholic have been reconciled, they have been combined in guilt, convulsion, and rebellion—the religious labours of Protestantism are suspended, and it is put in peril of extermination—the influence of the landlord is farther destroyed—not only is British capital still excluded, but Irish is in course of banishment—the need for troops is greatly enlarged—the sinking-fund is likely to be replaced by a great deficiency of revenue—the existence of the Church is endangered—the separation of Ireland from Britain is made a matter of open attempt and probability—and the sufferings of the former are increased. The Irish blacks and greys still pull in opposite directions, or only draw together on the road of civil war and ruin.

In all this these sages really say—“People of England, we insulted, deceived, and betrayed you—the mighty change of law and institution which we forced on you by tyranny and fraud is operating in a ruinous manner—our liberal opinions are alike false and destructive—and we are the knaves, boobies, bigots and intolerants, we asserted our opponents to be. We are utterly unworthy of belief and trust.”

Thus Catholic Emancipation is confessed by those who advocated it to be a total failure—a failure as complete and destructive as Free Trade, and the other nostrums which have filled the empire with calumny and convulsion. Liberal opinions—modern Whiggism and Liberalism—have now been in essentials brought to the decisive test of experiment, and the result is, overwhelming refutation throughout. In all material points of creed and measure, the Greys, Broughams and Plunkets—the Goderichs, Grants, and Thompsons—the Edinburgh and Westminster Reviews—and the liberal newspapers, stand covered with such blasting demonstrations of false principle, incorrect view, and imbecile understanding, as never before fell on men and publications in any age or nation.

Why are they still followed? Because not only public spirit, but honourable party spirit is no more. From the sordid, blind, unprincipled, mountebankism which seems to have taken possession of Whig, Liberal, Old Tory, and Peelite alike, the object of creed and measure now is personal and factious profits. What matters it, if a change involve the empire in calamity and peril, this faction has gained, or that has preserved, power, one part of the community has beaten and ruined another—the Aristocracy has been smote, the Church has been mutilated, the Landed Interest has been plundered, therefore the change is a most proper and beneficial one, even if it have ensured public destruction. If these men and publications were known to be lunatic and treasonable in the last degree, they would be followed with the same servility, provided they should war against the laws and institutions of the realm, and assist one part of the population in robbing and starving the other.

The confession is, that Catholic Emancipation has not left things as it found them, but has made their state infinitely worse. The old Catholic Question, not only made the Irish Protestants determined adherents of the constitution, government, and England, but restricted the Catholics from revolutionary instruction and objects. Granting that it produced party strife and convulsion, these very evils formed a source of indelible loyalty amidst one part of the inhabitants, and a bulwark against disloyalty amidst the other; they disarmed the rebel, and compelled the traitor to wear the mask of fidelity, and caution his deluded followers against disaffection and treason. The party contention would not have been in any material degree injurious, had it not been for the Whig and Liberal Tory factions in England. When these profligate bodies were silent, and government did its duty, the party war caused by the Catholic Question in Ireland was not more violent and injurious than that between English Whigs and Tories. The Broughams and Plunketts were the leading agitators who enabled the O'Connells and Shiel to labour in security and with effect; it was solely owing to the criminality of men like these, and the criminality of Ministers, British and Irish, that the Catholic Question produced any evils worthy of notice. Taking into account what kind of subjects the Irish people always were, it has long been our deliberate opinion that this Question, on the fair balance between good and evil, yielded vast benefit to the empire. Present events amply prove that without it Ireland could only have been retained by the extreme of despotism; and they almost prove, that on several occasions during the war, the sword could scarcely have retained her.

So long as the Catholic Question remained, that for repealing the Union could not be agitated; it was confessed by the demagogues, and obvious to all men, save the cloud-gazers—the knowledge-manufacturers—that the one kept down the other, and that the choice lay between them. Of course the death of the Catholic Question has been the birth of the Repeal one. And what are the fruits of the exchange? For a religious question of individual privilege, we have got a political one of national dismemberment; for a question which caused Protestant to balance and govern Catholic, we have got one which combines them on the side of insubordination, or neutralizes the former; for a question, which, on the balance, was greatly in favour of Protestantism, we have got one which is as much in favour of Catholicism; for a question which suppressed seditious instruction, we have got one which teaches rebellion to the whole population; for a question of party, we have got one of revolution. The bridle which kept Ireland in subjection to law, the bond of feeling which united her to England, the checks and balances in which consisted the slender portion of Irish self-government and freedom, have vanished with the Catholic Question.

The demagogues, or, to speak more correctly, the traitors, intimate very intelligibly that the struggle for the Repeal is to be really for national separation—that the Irish Parliament is to be only the mask and stepping-stone for grasping Irish independence. They thus, in regard to both duration and consequences, provide as terrible a contest as could well be conceived for England and Ireland; and of course both have the deepest interest in examining well the grievances on which they found their treason. What are these Irish grievances? Penury and misery. To what are they owing? The misdeeds of England! respond the traitors—the Subletting Act, Jury Assessments, and similar things! reply the scribes of the Treasury;—but none will reveal the great causes. The burden is thus cast wholly on England; and she is to go on, as she has done, throwing away her wealth and strength merely to injure Ireland as much as herself.

The time has come when the truth, and the whole truth, must be spoken to the Irish people. For several years they have been treated like petted children; boasting of themselves as perfection, the boast has been fashionable in England; and all sides, Whig and Tory, Anti-Catholic, and the reverse, have joined in lauding them as the “faultless monsters” of the human race. Have they scrambled and blundered for the most precious of England’s possessions—it has been pronounced hugely praiseworthy; have they wallowed in the darkest crimes—it has been tortured into excessive merit; every thing amiss in their condition and conduct has been fathered on English guilt. Even at this moment we are oracularly cautioned against saying any thing which may offend them; they are like the French—they are deaf to English admonition—they are this—they are that; and the obstreperous babies are to hear nothing from this side the Channel, save bland panegyrics on their beauties and good behaviour. For their own sake, this must be endured no longer; they must be told strongly and unsparingly of their defects and infirmities, not to insult and upbraid, but to reform and instruct them.

What, then, are the great causes of Irish penury and misery? Without hesitation, we reply—The individual deficiencies and misconduct of the Irish people.

It is self-evident that the very best laws and institutions cannot preserve the individual from want and barbarism, who is improvident, incapable, vicious and turbulent—that he is the cause of his own sufferings: it is of necessity equally so, that the case is precisely the same with a nation. Before, therefore, Ireland can prove any thing against English rule, it is incumbent on her to prove that her inhabitants differ not in character from those nations which are rich and happy.

In the more shewy kinds of natural ability, the Irishman has no superior; in the more solid kinds, and the qualities of disposition essential for producing national prosperity, he stands the lowest of civilized men.

Irish improvidence and prodigality are matters of general notoriety; one of the Irish liberals—we think Mr Spring Rice—said in Parliament two or three years ago, it would be of small use sending British capital to Ireland, if it were not placed under British frugality and foresight: another Irishman, in writing of his countrymen, pleasantly remarks, that each ought to possess ten thousand a-year. Looking at this alone, it renders it impossible for the people of Ireland to be other than poor and miserable: it not only keeps the better classes in debt and poverty, but prohibits them from providing the lower ones with food and employment.

This inordinate capacity for enjoyment is combined with the utmost incapacity for creating the means of enjoyment. Pugnacious in the last degree, the Irishman's pugnacity is eternally levelled against the sources of property and subsistence: the people of Ireland are engaged in an incessant struggle to banish and repel from them every thing which can raise them above the condition of the destitute savage.

Were the old penal laws, which are so much railed against, wantonly imposed without provocation, on a peaceable, unoffending people: No, they were provoked by the worst misconduct; they were resorted to as the only means by which Irish turbulence and crime could be repressed. Indefensible as they were, they were not more so than the Irish guilt which gave birth to them; and England's great object in them was to strike the criminal leader for the good of the follower, and to extinguish that which was more destructive to Ireland, than to herself. We do not stoop to seek shelter for her under Irish Parliaments.

In the very long interval which has elapsed since they ceased to have material operation, why has not Ireland advanced in prosperity? The Catholic Question has stood in the way, reply her traitors, and the Treasury scribes. Did it cripple her agriculture, manufactures, or trade? It did not affect them. Did it prevent her from being properly represented in Parliament? In this matter, the Catholics had a greater extension of privilege than they have at present; they were allowed to choose their representatives, and although they were compelled to elect Protestants, the compulsion, so far as concerned the law, was little more than a nominal one, for it only prohibited them from electing men who in fact had no existence. They still are, from inability to find Catholics, bound in a great measure to Protestants as representatives; and they are worse represented than they were before the Question was carried. The Catholic disabilities did not press on the means of wealth and happiness; in essential matters they were only a name, and their removal has injured more than benefited the general interests of Ireland. But it is alleged, and allegation can invent nothing better, that they caused strife and convulsion. Was this the fault of England? Her wish was peace; in so far as she took a side, it was matter of compulsion; and when she was neutral, the Irish people tore each other to pieces. It is amply proved by the present conduct of the Catholics, that the nominal grievance formed by the disabilities was but a pretext, and that their own bad feelings were the real cause of the strife and convulsion.

Thus for a very long term of years before the Catholic Question was carried, Ireland, in so far as accountability rests on England, enjoyed the freedom, security of property, and general advantages, which were enjoyed by England and Scotland. She was in an incalculably better situation for the acquisition of wealth than any continental nation. If, previously to late years, she were treated as a colony, this had little practical effect on the side of injury, while it had much on that of benefit. During the war, she had the immense market of Britain and her colonies for her agricultural produce and linens; she obtained those prices for corn and cattle which filled the agriculture of England and Scotland with riches, and her general manufactures were protected. Since the war ceased, she has stood on an equality with England and Scotland; in regard of taxes, she has enjoyed a great advantage over them. (On the whole of the term she has had an excellent market for her agricultural productions. She has possessed a superiority in the linen manufacture—she has enjoyed comparative immunity from taxation. In the mighty natural advantages of soil and geographical situation, she has stood infinitely above Scotland, and on a level with England; the latter has not equalled her in natural fertility of soil, and has not been better situated in regard to the cotton trade. She has had an ample share of the Legislature; if she have pointed out any real evil, it has been promptly attended to. Various special commercial advantages have been granted her; in any collision of interest, England and Scotland have always given way to her, and England has long made it a principle to sacrifice herself in every respect to Ireland.

Why, in despite of all this, is Ireland in penury, want, and barbarism? Why, amidst this outcry for British capital, is there no Irish capital? How happens it that her agriculture is distressed, her manufactures are vanishing, and her population is suffering the extreme of wretchedness?

During the war, the Irish landowners and farmers—taking into account the advantages they possessed in cheapness of labour and fertility of soil—got about as good prices as the English and Scotch ones. The latter converted their profits into capital; the landowners built, enclosed, and drained—the farmers manured and carried the science of agriculture to perfection. In England and Scotland, the high prices made the soil fertile as a garden, and covered it with quick fences, substantial farm-steads, comfortable cottages, rich landowners, wealthy farmers, and happy husbandry labourers. The Irish landowners and farmers spent their profits in extravagance: speaking comparatively, they neither improved their land, nor gained agricultural knowledge. The naturally rich land of Ireland, saving in the North, is still a comparative wilderness, destitute of proper buildings, fences, and culture—the occupier is still without capital, implements, and skill—the blaze of agricultural improvement, which has shone so long in England and Scotland, has not been able to enter Ireland—the land of the latter is yet so cultivated as to make the smallest possible return, and it probably does not, according to quality, yield half the produce which is drawn from that of Britain.

Who is to blame here? Why did not the things fill Irish agriculture with capital, skill, and improvement, which filled English and Scotch agriculture with them? The traitors and gentlemen of the press vociferously respond—England!—All the blame belongs to English misgovernment! The fine and perfect people of Ireland are guiltless. The ludicrous falsehood is devoutly swallowed, and England cannot sufficiently wonder at her own enormities!

Ireland is an agricultural country, and here is demonstration that the sole reason why her agriculture has not been long about as full of capital as that of England and Scotland, is to be found in the misconduct of her landowners and farmers. As the cry is kept up for British capital, let us enquire how it is likely to fare, if it chance to get into the hands of Irish agriculture.

Do the Irish landowners crave it for the purpose of building, draining, enclosing, and improving? No; they wish to use it for the payment of debts, or as revenue. They expend little on, and to a great extent they never see, their estates. We will not repeat what we have so often said on the baleful system of Irish land-letting; but we will observe, that it incapacitates the cultivator from both accumulating and retaining capital. If he have a sufficiency when he takes his land, a rack-rent and an unbending landlord, soon get it from him. Thus the landowner, no matter how high his rents may be, expends them as income, and, in a great measure, out of Ireland; and the tenant, no matter how high corn and cattle may be, is prevented by exorbitant rent from making profit, and rising above penury.

Under such a system, it is absurd to call for British capital. Let England furnish millions of it annually, and what will follow? The money will only go into Ireland as capital, to come out of it immediately to be wasted as individual revenue: it will be monopolized by the extravagance of landowners, and the cupidity of middlemen. Granting that a portion of it could reach the occupiers, it would speedily be transferred, by exorbitant rents, to the income of those above them. If England should furnish millions of capital annually, it would be transmuted into private revenue by crossing the Channel, and Irish agriculture would remain as destitute of capital as ever.

Agriculture would be stripped of capital in England, Scotland, or any other country, by such a system. It can only possess it through its own profits. The landowner must spare from his rent what is required by the improvements it is his duty to make, and the tenant be allowed by rent to receive fair profits, or it must be a stranger to capital. We have always spoken strongly against Irish absenteeism; but in its direct effects, it is only one of the minor causes of Irish agricultural penury. In England, the landowners spend the main part of their revenues in London, and many prosperous districts have no resident landowners; five-sixths, and often nine-tenths of the villages are without the latter. But the English absentee builds, encloses, &c., and he lets his land at such rent as enables his tenants to thrive. In addition, he binds the latter to the best systems of cultivation, and he is always ready to assist in promoting measures of local benefit. If the Irish one would do the same, absenteeism would not prevent Irish agriculture from possessing a sufficiency of capital and prosperity.

Even when the Irish tenant is not disabled by excessive rent, he accumulates little. It is asserted that, notwithstanding what has been done in England and Scotland, turnips, artificial grasses, improved systems of cropping, and good breeds of live stock, are in comparison almost unknown in Ireland; this contains as strong a proof of his incapacity as could be given. The British farmer adopts every improvement, makes the most of his land, saves his profits, and thereby acquires capital for both himself and his needy neighbours; the Irish one uses not the means, and therefore gains not the fruits.

The Economists, standing on the baseless dogma, that the rate of wages must be governed by the amount of capital to be divided amongst labourers, put forth the absurd assertion that the penury of Irish husbandry labourers arises from the want of capital. In agriculture, wages are not paid with capital, but really with a part of the produce of the land. This produce may be said to be divided between the landlord, farmer, and labourer. In Ireland, the landlord and his cubs get each a lion's share, that there is scarcely any thing left for the farmer and labourer. Without adding a shilling to Irish capital, or altering the shares of the landowner and farmer, let the produce which is grasped by the middlemen be divided amongst the labourers, and it will probably double or treble the rate of wages. Add millions to each capital, and under the system of rack-rents, the additional produce will be seized by the various landlords, and the rate of wages will not be raised; labour will only reap this benefit, an additional quantity of employment will be for a short time created. With the present system of land-letting, it is impossible for British capital to raise the rate of wages, or provide permanent employment for the surplus population; nothing can do this, but the bestowing of a larger proportion of the produce on the labourers.

Is England to blame because her capital cannot benefit Irish agriculture? Does she make the Irish landowner extravagant, rapacious, and unfeeling, or restrict him from building, enclosing, and binding his tenants to good systems of husbandry? Does she create the middlemen and per centage agents—the cormorants which pick up from the occupiers and labourers what the landowners leave? Does she render the Irish farmer ignorant, unskilful, and improvident, or disable him for adopting improvements, making profit, and preserving capital? Is it through her that the labourer's food and raiment are filched from him by the landlords? No, in word, act, and example, she is guiltless; the blame rests wholly on the Irish people.

It is alleged that the Union causes the Irish landowners to be absentees. It has no more right to do this, than it has to make absentees of the English and Scotch ones. Why cannot the Irish, as well as the British landowner, visit his estate when the Session of Parliament closes? If he be an absentee, it forms no reason why he should drain from his estate, not only his fair rent, but also the profit, capital, and bread of his tenants and their labourers.

It is pleaded in defence of the landowners, that they cannot live on their estates from the turbulence of the people; and that much of the penury and misery of the latter is produced by their own misconduct. If they place so many landlords between themselves and the inhabitants of their estates, that these inhabitants are wholly above their control, the fault belongs not to England. What prevents her from forming an efficient magistracy? Their absenteeism. What prohibits her from creating a substantial yeomanry and duly restricted peasantry? Their mismanagement. Why cannot she enforce the laws? Because they deprive her of means, and make the population lawless.

If the Irish farmers and husbandry labourers war at elections against their landlords, and thereby bring on themselves ruin and starvation, England is not the cause. What prevents her from putting down the demagogue and Papist priest—from terminating the despotism and crimes of the leader, and the fanaticism, slavery, and stupidity of the follower? Solely the Irish people.

Let us now enquire how far the decline of Irish manufactures has been produced by English misgovernment.

Ireland, a few years ago, had a manufacture, the linen one, in which she stood far above England and Scotland; has she lost her superiority in it through exclusive advantages granted to British consumers and manufacturers? No. When the wretched free-trade system was introduced, this manufacture was specially exempted from its operation; while the English silk and other trades were to be plunged into ruin, the Irish linen trade, on the avowal of Lord Goderich and Mr Huskisson, was to be protected by prohibitory duties. It is solely for the benefit of this trade, that the duties on foreign linens are at this moment almost double those on foreign silks; it forms the only interest of any consequence which really enjoys a legal prohibition against the foreigner. Here, according to the doctrines of the Irish traitors, the British consumers of linens have been sacrificed to the Irish producers. Farther, the Scotch kelp manufacturers have been sacrificed to the Irish bleachers. If the bounties have been withdrawn, be it remembered, that this was applauded by the Irish Liberals, who asserted they only benefited the British manufacturers, to the prejudice of the Irish ones. As far as possible, exclusive advantages have been given to the Irish linen trade, at the cost of England and Scotland.

Have British manufacturers enjoyed natural advantages over Irish ones? The contrary has been the case. The Irish manufacturers have had advantages in respect of flax, bleaching, cheap labour, and exemption from taxes, which have much outweighed their disadvantages in regard to fuel, &c.; they have had the same means as their rivals for procuring machinery.

The Irish linen trade cannot have declined from the want of capital, because it long flourished, and it then ought to have not only filled itself with capital, but supplied much to other trades. An extensive manufacture can never fall from the want of capital; because, so long as it can be carried on by means of the latter, it will produce as much as it can employ. The trade cannot have declined from incapacity in the workmen; for Irish workmen to a large extent fabricate the successful British linens.

England is not the cause, if Irish linen manufacturers be improvident, extravagant, or incapable as men of business. It is demonstrable that she has done every thing in her power to support the Irish linen trade; and that the reason why it is distressed, and has not been made an abundant source of capital and subsistence, is to be found amidst the Irish people.

Turning to other manufactures, it is asserted that they have been ruined by those of Britain through the abolition of the Irish protecting duties. Let it be remembered, that this abolition was part of that change which exalted Ireland from a colony into an integral part of the United Kingdom. Not only the Irish traitors, but also the manufacturers, have been zealous champions of free trade with foreign nations; therefore on their doctrines the abolition must have been highly beneficial, by enabling Ireland to buy cheap, instead of producing dear, manufactures.

If the change injured the manufactures of Ireland, it benefited in a far greater degree her agriculture; it gave her, as it was intended to do, infinitely more than it took from her.

Why cannot Irish manufactures compete with British ones in cottons, woollens, &c.? They can have the same machinery and skill; they have advantages in cheapness of labour, &c., sufficient to outweigh disadvantages in other things; they are excellently situated in regard both to raw produce and foreign markets. It cannot be from the want of capital, because Ireland had different manufactures fully established, and yet they could not sustain the competition; of course, if she cannot compete with British manufacturers, British capital can only be sent her to be lost. The cause evidently is, not English misgovernment, but Irish misconduct.

If English and Scotch manufacturers establish themselves and their capital in Ireland, they are perhaps ruined by the ferocious combinations of their workmen, or the turbulent proceedings of the people. Their brethren remain at home, because they see there is no regular security of person and property in Ireland. Here, also, the Irish people are the sole parents of their own injury.

Butter and hams may be called manufactured articles, and they are important ones to Ireland. Irish butter ranks much below, not only English, but Dutch, and this must arise solely from mismanagement in the making of it. Irish hams are retailed for a third less than Yorkshire ones; and this must flow from similar mismanagement. There is neither art nor mystery in the excellence of Yorkshire hams. The things requisite for producing them are swine of good breed, fattening with barley-meal, or pease,—and by curing with the best fine salt, and salt-petre, without the villainous use, so dear to Cockneys, of smoke. The inferiority of Irish hams seems to proceed, in a large degree, from bad, probably potatoe, feeding. Ireland, with abundance of cheap milk and corn, might have bacon fully equal to that of Yorkshire. In the price of these two articles, she loses a very large sum annually, solely from ignorance and negligence.

The want of a home market operates powerfully against Irish manufactures: it flows from the indigence of the population, which evidently is produced by rack-rents in agriculture, the languishing condition of manufactures, incapacity and misconduct in the farmers and manufacturers, bad wages, and the absence of employment. If the manufacturers could only compete with British ones, it would have great effect in making the people consumers. England here is guiltless.

We need say but little of the Irish merchants. England makes no distinction between them and her own; she opens to them her vast home, colonial, and foreign markets, she grants them every possible privilege, and the fault is not hers if they do not flourish as much as English ones. They, at any rate, cannot suffer from the want of her capital, because, from their connexion with British merchants, it must always spontaneously flow to them as rapidly as they can find proper employment for it.

Nothing is of more transcendent worth to public wealth and industry, than banks. They are the offspring of private individuals,—and if Ireland have not possessed them like England and Scotland, the fault rests with her own inhabitants. While England, in the insanity which has afflicted her for several years, has been labouring to destroy her own banks, she has given exclusive privileges to those of Ireland, as well as Scotland.

It is from all this demonstrable, that England has not produced the penury and misery of Ireland, that her capital could not remove them, and that their causes are to be found amidst the Irish people. Having traced these causes to the body, let us extend the enquiry to individual character and conduct.

The Irishman is not a man of business—he is a vehement party man, and he sacrifices the interests of his country to those of his party or himself. If the English landowners of a parish or district, see that it will benefit them to enclose, drain, &c., they without any parade procure an Act of Parliament, and expend the requisite capital. Thus, numberless private bills continually pass the Legislature, for improving and enriching English districts at the cost of private individuals. The Irish landowners can regard nothing so minute as local advantage, or so vulgar as practical objects; they must have some magnificent, impracticable generality—some society for improving, or bill for draining, all Ireland at once on theory, which will require nothing from them beyond florid speeches and petty subscriptions. Those of a parish or district may squabble, touching the boundaries of worthless land, but as to their combining to make an outlay, in order to render such land productive, it is out of the question. Thus, in those things which are of the first importance towards improving and enriching their country, they will do nothing.

While the leading men of Ireland will neither contrive nor expend for her as private individuals, they act in a similar manner as public men. The Irish members of both Houses have always been the most imbecile, unpatriotic men in Parliament. On looking at their past history, we find that they were constantly mutes, or party gladiators—that they never proposed any measure for the benefit of Ireland, which was not, in principle and object, one of factional politics. If they gave a heart-rending description of Irish wretchedness, what was their remedy? Catholic Emancipation, or some similar poisonous nostrum! Farther, they furiously opposed all English Legislators and Ministers, who recommended efficient means of relief. Introduce poor laws? No, it touched the pockets of the sham patriots; this solitary Catholic sanctioned it, therefore true Orangemen could not be other than its enemies; anti-Catholics proposed it, and, of course, Catholics could not do less than regard it with detestation. Remove the surplus population?—Monstrous idea! it could not be done without weakening the Catholics, and diminishing the want, so essential for feeding Catholic frenzy and turbulence. Abolish the forty shilling freeholds?—It could not be thought of, because it would affect the party strength of Protestant and Catholic. Promote the spread of Protestantism?—The enormity called forth general execration, because it was calculated to injure the factious weapons of the Catholics. These leading Irishmen, in reality, cried, "Nothing will yield any benefit, save Catholic Emancipation—it is the only panacea for rack-rents, bad wages, excess of population, starvation, barbarism, and fanaticism: if you will not grant it, we are determined you shall do nothing for Ireland."

While these men thus fiercely opposed all effectual measures for benefiting their country, they servilely supported all which were calculated to injure her. The commercial changes which expelled her linens and provisions from some of the colonies, and exposed her provisions to competition with those of foreign countries in the home market, did her grievous injury; but they were below the notice of Irish Members of Parliament. She had a deeper interest in the old Corn Laws than even England, but her patriots in the Legislature could make no effort to preserve them. Her Parnells now seek to deprive her of the only markets she possesses for agricultural productions. Honourable exceptions there were, but they were few and powerless. The followers naturally imitated the heads. The manufacturers lauded the principles and policy which they declare have ruined their trade. The farmers could look at nothing so free from faction and beneficial to themselves as the Corn Laws. Tenants disdained the selfishness of avoiding ruin by voting for landlords. The press would not condescend to notice Irish benefit, when it could not serve, or stood in the way of, Irish parties and factions. There was a Catholic Question, and all Irishmen, high and low, were resolved to make it, as far as possible, the means of ruining themselves and their country.

The same conduct is still pursued. The mass of the landowners will not yet supply Government with the means of forming an efficient magistracy; or assist in restraining and reforming their misguided countrymen.

The landlord yet gives up his tenants to the demagogues and priests. The Catholic leaders and priests have got up another question of fury, disorganization, convulsion, and ruin. Tenant is provoking the vengeance of landlord; tradesman is destroying trade, credit, and money; labourer is annihilating employment and wages; and the people are extinguishing, with all their might, agriculture, manufactures, and commerce. The men who stand aloof from faction, and really labour to benefit their country, are despised; and those only are worshipped as patriots who seek to bring on her every conceivable calamity.

The war which the people of Ireland eternally wage against themselves and their country has never any valid remote object; it is one for the sake of war. In that against the Catholic disabilities, they sacrificed themselves to empty names; and, at present, they are doing it to something worse. If the Repeal Question could be carried, what would follow? The absentees would be called home. This is not very probable, when many of them live in foreign countries, or are disabled in various ways from living in Ireland: it would yield small benefit to manufactures if the latter could not compete with British ones. But an Irish Parliament would give manufactures protecting duties. They would fall on those of Britain, and the latter of course would retaliate. Irish linens would be excluded from the markets of Britain and her colonies; Irish corn, cattle, butter, and provisions, would have duties placed on them, which would cause a loss in their price and production, exceeding in amount the rents of the absentees;

and Irish labourers would be compelled to remain at home.* If Ireland should become independent, she would be placed on the footing of a foreign nation; and, as she cannot compete with this country and others, she would lose nearly all her export trade: in importing, she would be compelled to buy chiefly of this country, either openly or through smuggling.

Thus, the people of Ireland are inflicting on themselves every possible injury, merely to compass that which is an impossibility, and which, if compassed, would operate in the most fatal manner against their agriculture, manufactures, and commerce—against the property of the capitalists, and the food of the labourer.

But they cry, England must do something for them. What can she do? The Subletting Act is complained of. Well, it was passed with the general concurrence of Irishmen as an essential remedial measure. We always strongly called for it; but we called at the same time for some accompanying one to give employment or the means of emigration to the discharged peasantry. At the worst, it only produces temporary evil in creating permanent good, and the landowners may easily divest its operation of harshness. In proportion as it may be weakened in effect, the penury and wretchedness it was intended to remove must be restored and perpetuated.*

Passing over minor matters, what, we repeat, can England do? The people of Ireland have opposed emigration—they have opposed the introduction of poor-laws—they prohibit the entrance of British capital—and not even the traitors can

* That which is called "The Cottage System," produced, under ample trial, such want and misery in Ireland, ~~that it~~ was unanimously passed for the purpose of putting an end to it; yet people are advocating its establishment in England as a remedy for want and misery. That subdivision of land, which was found to be so ruinous to the labouring classes in Ireland, is called for as the means of giving abundance to these classes in England. Common reason might convince any person that if a labourer have a sufficiency of employment, he has no time to cultivate land of his own; and, if he have not, the profits of an acre of land cannot yield much protection against want. Give to each labourer his acre or two, and it may yield a little present relief; but in a few years it will give to every parish twice as many labourers as it can employ, and then the Cottage System will be found more destructive to labourers than the pauper one. The things wanted, are a reduction in the supply of labour with reference to the demand, plenty of employment, and good wages; the things for making them permanently unattainable, are the Cottage System, and subdivision of land.

point out any material thing which England has the power to do for them. She will not hesitate at sacrifice; she will grant every possible boon; but, nevertheless, she cannot remove their penury and misery: this is only practicable to themselves.

The landowners must spend part of the year on their estates, and thus provide the means of forming an efficient magistracy; they must remove middlemen, and bring their tenants under their own direction and control; they must accept no man as a tenant who is the tool of the demagogues and priests; they must let their land to industrious frugal farmers alone, and bind them to British improvements and systems of management; and they must be content with moderate rents. They must build, enclose, drain, make canals, &c. The farmers must go hand in hand with their landlords; they must be peaceable, frugal, and saving, and adopt all the best systems of husbandry.

This alone can give capital and prosperity to Irish agriculture.

The manufacturers must be frugal, provident, cautious, and skilful; they must obtain British machinery, improvements, and directing workmen; and they must discountenance political faction and agitation.

Without this, Irish manufactures can never have capital and prosperity.

The merchants and tradesmen must also gain frugality, foresight, and proper habits of business; and array themselves against faction and convulsion.

Irish commerce and trade must, without this, be strangers to capital and prosperity.

The labouring classes must be peaceable, obedient to law, thrifty, skilful in their callings, sober, industrious, and duly under the influence of their superiors.

Without this, the Irish labouring classes must remain in want and wretchedness.

The people of Ireland may assure themselves, that nothing but these matters can make them prosperous and happy—that, without them, all England can do will be of no avail. Let them calmly survey their present conduct. The absentee landlord deprives Government of the means of creating a magistracy; places the inhabitants of his estate beyond his control; drains from them their capital and food; and then points to their penury and turbulence, and exclaims, "Oh! this English misgovernment! What will England do for Ireland?" The farmer manages his land in the worst fashion, covenants to pay more rent than he can afford, joins faction, provokes his ruin by voting against his landlord; and then he ascribes his sufferings to English misgovernment. The manufacturer makes no effort to manage his business in a proper manner; lauds the laws which destroy it; wastes his property by extravagance; and then he rails against English misgovernment. The priests, demagogues, and labouring classes, trample on the laws, compel landlords to ruin tenants, exclude all proper men from parliamentary seats, banish capital, overthrow banks, blast credit, suppress markets, annihilate employment, fill their country with convulsion, beggary, starvation, and crime; and then they cry, "See the fruits of English misgovernment! What will England do for Ireland?" These scandalous proceedings have nothing to excuse them; in intellect the Irishman equals the inhabitant of any country; and his defects flow from his bad passions and misconduct. Let the people of Ireland look at those of Scotland. The Scotch are as fine a people as any under the sun, although evidence utterly destroys the claim to superiority set up by their ridiculous egotism. And how have they gained their wealth and prosperity? Not by acting like the Irish. The Irish must imitate them, or remain what they are.

England, however, must do the little she is capable of doing for the benefit of Ireland; and she must do much for her own salvation. That would be a wise law which should prohibit the existence of middlemen and percentage agents, not in Ireland only, but also in Britain; and thereby make the occupier the dependent of the landowner. Percentage agents, who are really as mischievous as any middlemen whatever, are multiplying in England, and producing great evil. Measures ought to be taken for compelling Irish landowners to live as much on their estates as British ones do. It is unpardonable that they enjoy an exclusive exemption from serving their country as magistrates, &c., when such baleful injury flows from it. On the utility of establishing poor-laws, facilitating the draining of bogs, and assisting emigration, we need not enlarge.

The cry of open treason and rebellion is at last heard, and a systematic, unrelenting struggle for producing civil war and dismemberment, is at last seen in the heart of the United Kingdom. This is the case, when England has made it almost a part of the law of nations, that whenever any portion of an empire rebels against its government, foreign powers have a right to interfere and make it independent. That England, which assisted to dismember the Spanish empire, the Turkish empire, and the kingdom of the Netherlands, which is even now calling for the separation of Poland from Russia, and which has been so long teaching revolution to continental nations, has now a vast integral part of her dominions labouring to divide itself from her and gain independence. If war break out in Ireland, what will be done by other countries? Will America send no arms and money? Will France send no troops, and abstain from interference? Will the free Belgians afford no succour? Let England be assured, her example will be imitated, and the first blow of the Irish rebel will be powerfully supported by a host of foreign negotiators and enemies. Never did she act with such incredible imbecility as she has just done touching the Belgians; the latter had no better pretext for demanding independence than the Irish have; and in their case she has established a precedent which will justify foreign nations in dismembering her on the first appearance of Irish or colonial rebellion.

Of course, it is of vital consequence to remove every thing calculated to lead to insurrection and rebellion in Ireland. It is very evident that, if the Repeal Question be tolerated, it will be constantly used to fill the people with hatred of Britain, and incite them to struggle for independence—to keep them in readiness to become rebels at the first favourable moment. The Catholic Question—oh, fatal blindness to remove it!—made the Protestants the firm friends of peace and England; but it is the nature of the new one to do the contrary. The war is no longer one between Catholic and Protestant—it attacks, not Orangemen, but England. Instead of seeking to benefit Catholic at the cost of Protestant, it pretends to seek the benefit of both. The Orangemen have neither stimulants, nor ground to stand on; they cannot enter the field as active opponents of the Catholics. It is asserted they are still faithful, and we trust they will remain so; but their regular fidelity cannot be calculated on, because the things for preserving it are destroyed, and replaced with opposite ones. The Catholics have now the field to themselves; those who differ from, cannot act with effect against, them.

Let it not be imagined that this Repeal Question will gain no advocates in the better classes. A considerable part of the press, even in Britain, will soon support it. The leading men of Ireland, as the history of the Catholic Question proves, are remarkably for any thing rather than consistency; and those who have seats in the House of Commons to dispose of will soon make converts amidst them. The next election will send into the House a strong body of Irish repealers, and it may be safely assumed that they will be supported by the Humes and Hunts—the low British party. After this election, the House of Commons will constantly contain a large party favourable to the Repeal, and its effects on the press and the community at large may be easily divined.

It is clear to all that the Repeal is not advocated from upright and patriotic motives—that the traitors, both lay and priestly, are actuated by the very worst feelings of malice, revenge, cupidity, and tyranny; and seek to sacrifice Ireland, as well as Britain, to these feelings. It is equally clear to all, that the agitation of the Question must constantly have the most baleful effects on all the best interests of Ireland as well as England, and that its success would have the same.

The traitors demonstrate that their real object is Irish independence; the Question is therefore manifestly highly seditious and treasonable.

It irresistibly follows that the advocacy of the Repeal should in all forms be rigidly prohibited by law, and that Government should at once bring forward the law, and especially before the dissolution of the existing Parliament. This would be far more efficacious than the power at present exercised by Government of suppressing public meetings; it would reach the press and public speeches, no matter how delivered.

Government ought to possess the power we have named for at least a certain number of years longer.

Effective measures ought to be resorted to for keeping the control of elections from the demagogues and priests. This is not more necessary in other respects than it is to prevent Irish members from being the bane of their country. The law for prohibiting the Repeal from being discussed and advocated would be here highly serviceable. Laws of limited duration for disabling itinerant candidates—restricting the demagogues from taking part in any election save that of the place or county in which they regularly dwell,—and prohibiting the priests from interfering with and appearing at elections, are called for. All factious clubs and associations for influencing elections should be suppressed; so long as the demagogues and priests retain their election power, Ireland will be disaffected, convulsed, and in danger of rebellion.

The Repeal treason is a Catholic matter, got up for the exclusive benefit of Catholicism. This religion is now taking a character which ought to array every government against it. It was the great cause of the French and Belgic revolutions, and it is strenuously labouring to dismember the British empire. It is furnishing ample demonstration, that the destruction of its overpowering ascendancy is essential for giving the empire peace and security. On the score of self-preservation, the duty rests on Government, of exerting itself to create what we have repeatedly advocated—a balance of Protestants in the Catholic parts of Ireland. This would not only neutralise the power, but soften the bigotry, and other bad feelings, of the Catholics. The Protestant Colonization Society, judging from what we read in the public prints, seems admirably calculated for promoting it; therefore we strongly recommend it to the support of every friend of Ireland and the empire. If the labours of this society be successful—and we are sure they will if properly conducted—its example ought to be in a certain degree followed by Government. It would be politic and unexceptionable for the latter to establish in the Catholic parts, on the unproductive land, colonies composed of equal numbers of Protestants and Catholics, and bound, in regard to both religions, to proper conduct. Amidst other things, this might be made a valuable means of diffusing agricultural knowledge. The bodies of Protestants thus formed could be easily enlarged by the landowners and clergy. And once more we say, the Church ought to be put into the most efficient state possible.

We now ask, who does the Church plant on her land? She has the means of placing in every parish a clergyman and a few Protestant laymen. If a new distribution of her property be on the eve of being made, we trust that, in Ireland, the most important point will be attended to, of making it a means for creating a Protestant flock, however small, in every parish. Every landowner, in a comparatively short space of time, could have on his estate a due proportion of Protestants; he could give to himself tenants on whose votes he could depend, to the Church a flock, to the crown loyal subjects, and to the empire security against treason and dismemberment. The conduct of the landowners is unparadonable.

We devoutly wish, that both ruler and subject would lay aside their theories and prejudices, and examine this matter with the attention it deserves. If it must be so, let the past history of Catholicism be wholly forgotten, and its conduct of the present times be alone regarded. It has just attempted to destroy the free institutions of France, and the government has been compelled to cast it off in order to preserve them. It has just been a leading agent in revolutionizing and dividing the Kingdom of the Netherlands. We need not point to its acts in Spain and Portugal. At this hour, it is, without being able to plead a single grievance, labouring to involve Ireland in rebellion, for the purpose of tearing the empire to pieces. Conciliation has been tried, and found ruinous. This religion is at this moment proving, as strongly as it ever did prove, that it will not blend with others, or be other than the inveterate enemy of a Protestant government. It is as essential for the British Government, as for the French one, to use every means for reducing its power. The means which France has not, Britain possesses in abundance. The latter, through the clergy, church-lands, and landowners, could soon bring this power within due bounds, by establishing a balance of Protestants every where, without encroaching on the just rights of the Catholics. It must be done; all other means have been found fruitless: and the choice before Government is—the comparatively trifling difficulties it would produce, or continued convulsion, and Irish rebellion, and the loss of Ireland.

It is especially incumbent on the clergy to reflect deeply on this, because, from the feelings which prevail touching Church property, it is easy to see that they must either attach flocks to their property, or lose it: it seems scarcely possible for them to preserve it in any other manner. Ministers might at least use influence and remonstrance with the landowners.

The Treasury papers are urging that the Papist priests ought to be taken into the pay of the State; and we fear they are doing it at the bidding of their masters. What benefit could be drawn from such a measure? Their past declarations abundantly prove that the priests would not in return suffer the Government to interfere with their appointment and conduct; the measure has always been hateful to the mass of the disaffected laymen. Did State-payment in France and Belgium, Spain and Portugal, place the Catholic priesthood under the control of the civil ruler, and reconcile it with Protestantism and free institutions?—~~With~~ such payment the Irish priest would be as independent of the State, as hostile to the Church, and as anxious to retain his despotism as he now is. It would not improve in the least his spirit and objects; on the contrary, by making his flock jealous of him, it would incite him to still worse conduct. It would add to the disaffection and turbulence of the laymen, for the only part of them not hostile to it is now loyal and tranquil. If, therefore, Ministers propose the measure, we hope it will be firmly resisted. Let it not be forgotten that the priests are now in many places kept under a certain degree of restraint by their dependence on wealthy Protestants; and that the partial loss of their flocks in person or favour would, to a considerable extent, annihilate them, and place them under Protestant influence. A State provision would destroy this restraint, and keep them in being and independence under any loss of followers short of the whole.

It is essential for her own benefit that England should prevent the influx of Irish labourers, by providing employment for them at home, and enabling them to emigrate to the colonies. They pour into her on one side, and from this alone her own are compelled to pour out of her on another. It is a general and true remark amidst English labourers, that they are driven out of their own country by Irish ones. The latter do not come to spend their days in her, but they remain for a time, and then return, or are sent home with their feelings embittered against her; this operates greatly to feed the disaffection of the mass of the Irish people. They not only in their own persons cause an enormous portion of the lower orders in England to be disaffected; but by their coming to her, and the feelings they create, they form a prolific source of disaffection to the native English labourers. It is essential for English and Irish union and loyalty, that the labourers of the two countries should no longer be kept in continual conflict for subsistence.

A great means here would be the establishment of poor-laws in Ireland. In our judgment, it would yield the latter incalculable benefit. It could scarcely fail of raising wages, the standard of living and consumption; and in proportion as it should do this, it would increase employment, trade, and manufactures. Property would reap more benefit from it on the one hand, than injury on the other. Ireland must remain comparatively destitute of domestic trade until her working classes are made consumers.

Indigence and misery must be removed, or disloyalty and turbulence cannot. Not only are the people kept constantly in the former, but they are almost annually visited by famine. At this moment, it is said their supply of food will fail long before harvest. Without reference to any thing save peace and good feelings, it is a matter of State necessity that the law should furnish the labourer with subsistence in his hour of destitution. Both to govern and enrich Ireland, it is of the first consequence to raise the standard of living amidst her poorer inhabitants.

We must bestow unqualified praise on the vigorous conduct of Government in preventing agitation. We trust it will be firmly adhered to. If wider powers be necessary, let them be without delay asked for and granted, especially such as may be requisite for reaching the leading traitors, lay and clerical. On the possession and vigilant exercise of the most ample powers by Government, depends, not only the integrity of the empire, but every thing dear to Ireland. Lawlessness and agitation must be sternly kept down, or Irish penury and wretchedness must continue and increase. Let every friend of Ireland bear in mind, that she can only gain capital, manufactures, subsistence, security of property, prosperity, and freedom itself, through the possession of almost boundless authority by Government. This extraordinary authority must, however, be of limited duration, and it must be distinctly understood that it exists to create the elements of freedom and peace; the exercise of it must be combined with incessant efforts to give society the form, feelings, and circumstances for rendering it unnecessary.

Passing from subjects to rulers, they also must be restricted; an authority, jealous, severe, and sleepless, must be exercised over them, or Ireland must be lost, and England must be plunged into ruin and tyranny by revolution. Not the Irish demagogues and priests—not the English radicals and revolutionists, but the Ministers and Legislators of the empire have been the great cause of placing Ireland and England in their present condition: they have created the means for enabling the demagogues and priests, radicals and revolutionists, to labour with effect.

For the last fifteen years the Whigs and their publications have been regularly preaching up general revolution. Nations were to overthrow their governments, empires were to be dismembered, and colonies were to gain independence. If rebellion shewed itself in any quarter, it was lauded and encouraged in the most outrageous manner; it was vehemently called for where there was tranquillity. At home the choice was declared to be, compliance with Whig demands, or revolt and revolution; you must concede this and that to your colonies, or they will throw off your yoke—you must remove Catholic disabilities, or have an Irish rebellion—you must change laws and institutions, or have revolution! The same conduct is still exhibited. The Belgic and Polish revolutions, as well as the totally different one of France, are furiously applauded—revolution is loudly called for in Germany, Spain, and Italy—and Ministers are labouring to produce it in Portugal. At this moment the Treasury papers are declaring that there must be reform in England, or revolution.

The people of both Ireland and Britain have thus been familiarized with the idea of rebellion and revolution; they have been taught to love them as things of the first purity and worth in all cases, and to regard them as means to be resorted to for enforcing compliance with any claims they may think good to make. Those of Ireland especially have been led to deem their independence a sacred right, as well as the grand essential for bettering their condition.

All this has produced the practical change in the law of nations, to which we have already referred. Under the grand principle of "non-intervention," Ministers intervene to give independence to the Belgians and Poles, and to stir up rebellion in Portugal; the principle, as it is practised, really means that the great powers shall form a kind of Holy Alliance, for intervening to make rebellion successful in every quarter.

There must be a radical change here, or it will be idle to think of governing and retaining Ireland, or preventing revolution in England. If the continent is to be kept in convulsion, rebellion, and change of rulers, fomented and eulogised by the Cabinet, Legislature, and Press, think not that the United Kingdom will escape. If France is to be exalted into a general "Liberator"—a tyrant to stalk through the world for the purpose of establishing universal liberty, flatter not yourselves that she will overlook Ireland. Theoretic definitions, touching right and claim to revolution and independence, will be of no avail; the plea of tyranny urged by the Irish traitors will be held as good as that of the Belgians or Poles; the old French and Spanish Liberals proclaimed the English government to be a tyranny, and no small number of the inhabitants of England have long proclaimed the same.

Whigs and Tories, Ministers and Legislators, must combine to teach the principles of peace, order, and obedience; they must convince the inhabitants of the United Kingdom, that changes are only to be sought by constitutional means, and for constitutional objects. The law of non-interference between ruler and subject, must be restored and firmly maintained; and instead of joining in a mad crusade to envelope the Continent in revolution and anarchy, every effort must be used to keep it in tranquillity and order. Let it never be forgotten, that England has as much cause to tremble at revolution as Austria, or any other power.

In combination with this general revolutionary instruction, the people of Ireland have been regularly taught to ascribe every thing wrong in their condition to English tyranny and misgovernment. The old penal laws have been declaimed against, as matters wholly unprovoked. The Catholic disabilities, which in their origin had no reference to Ireland, and which were contended for by the English people from motives purely defensive, have been railed against as things of persecution and oppression to Ireland. The Whigs—the Broughams and Plunketts—have constantly charged Irish suffering on the disabilities, and imputed the worst motives to those who defended them. Whig and Tory, Minister and Legislator, have incited the Irish people to regard England as a despotic oppressor, themselves as the most perfect of human beings, and their penury and misery as matters created solely by English rulers.

Radical change must be made here. The Cabinet and Legislature must speak truth plainly, severely, and unreservedly to the people of Ireland: they must assure them, that if they proceed in destroying themselves, under the hope of having impossibilities performed for them by England, their hope will not be realized—that they are the parents of their own sufferings—that they will have nothing beyond impartiality granted them—and that they must exert themselves, as the people of England and Scotland are compelled to do, or remain as they are.

Who created the Catholic Association? In reality, the Whigs and Liberals. The atrocities of this body were connived at by the Irish Government, and defended by the Whig Opposition; Peers and Legislators made themselves its members, patrons, and protectors. The present English Lord Chancellor, and keeper of the King's conscience, placed it above the constitution and laws, and was its furious champion; the present Irish Chancellor lavished unmeasured panegyric on the Papist priests in the midst of their labours to produce crime, disaffection, and convulsion. Every thing was done by these men and their condutors calculated to make the Irish Catholics hate England and the Protestants, trample on the laws, and regard guilt, insubordination, and treason, as praiseworthy matters.

Because Lords Brougham and Plunkett were supporters of the Catholic Question, they decided it ought to be advocated by crime and lawlessness; because they are hostile to the Repeal one, they decide it shall be put down by unsparring despotism. But their will is not law, and their opinion is not an infallible dogma of the Catholic church; therefore the Catholics naturally conceive that the same things are innocent and meritorious in the one question, which these lawyers pronounced to be so in the other. If "agitation" be a proper means for obtaining one thing, it unquestionably is for obtaining another.

The Catholics never durst act as they are now acting, they never durst name the objects they are now pursuing, until they received the sanction of the Whigs and Liberal Tories. To the latter, both their ungovernable conduct and treasonable intentions are clearly owing.

The Catholic Association was avowedly the parent of the English ones which are spreading in every direction, for the attainment of destructive innovation and change, by licentiousness and turbulence.

Here radical change must also be adopted. In the first place, leading questions which produce bad feelings, ought to be set at rest. That of Reform is on the point of being disposed of, and every thing is in favour of an immediate settlement of the Tithe one. In the second place, no new questions of a similar kind ought to be raised. And in the third place, all such associations, Irish and British, should be put under legal prohibition. If leading public men inflame the passions of the people against national institutions, place the subject above the ruler, and shield with the authority of both Parliament and the Cabinet, guilt, contempt of law, defiance of constituted authorities, and ungovernable clubs, vain will be the attempt to save Ireland and the empire.

It has long been the fashion for both the Ministry and the Legislature to discountenance and insult the loyal part of the Irish people. The atrocious abuse, which, from the different sides of Parliament, was perpetually cast on the Orangemen, and all who were sufficiently well affected to oppose Catholic criminality, cannot have been forgotten. Irish attachment to the constitution, and fidelity to England, were denounced and treated as crimes; while Ministers and Members of Parliament pretended to call for religious peace and union, they held up the anti-Catholics to Catholic hatred and vengeance as monsters of iniquity; the latter were not only thus defamed, but excluded from public trusts and emoluments. The marvel is, that the Orangemen were not made, to a man, the enemies of England by the treatment they met with. They have now glorious revenge. The very public men and newspaper scribes, who covered them with scurrility, almost supplicate them to resume their former conduct. Lord Plunkett courts them; and even Lord Brougham's newspapers exult over the information, that the Orangemen will again take the field against the Catholics.

If Ireland is to be retained, attachment to England must no more be subjected to ban and punishment; it must be created and nurtured by the usual means of favour and reward. It is clearly one of the highest duties of Government to keep up and strengthen in every way the English party. We say not, that Protestants only ought to be favoured; let all well-disposed Catholics be favoured equally; but confine the favour, and dispense it bountifully, to good feelings and conduct.

It is asserted, that the Marquis of Anglesey is yet anxious to extinguish religious distinctions and strife between Protestant and Catholic, by making the former the friend of the latter. He cannot, we think, be guilty of the egregious folly. Let the Orangemen and lower orders of Protestants be reconciled with the Catholics, and what will follow? They will be made Catholics and Repealers. The religious strife is the great bond of religious and civil fidelity. Is it this strife on the part of the Protestants which prompts the present conduct of the Catholics? Are the traitors moved by animosity, provoked by Orangemen, to call for the Repeal? O'Connell is covering even the Orangemen with his blandishments; while he is labouring to make the Protestants his brethren and followers, the Lord Lieutenant, as it is said, is playing into his hands, by attempting to remove the principal thing which prevents them from becoming so. At the very best, the extinction of Protestant party feeling would free the Catholics from opponents, and strip the Government of moral support: that it would not in the least amend the spirit and conduct of the former, is manifest to all men. At present, the Protestants are united on the right side of things; but let Government again raise the absurd cry of Peace and Union, and they will once more be arrayed against each other in favour of Catholic treason.

Who must place these restrictions on public men, in office and out of it? The reflecting and patriotic part of the community, if it desire to escape irretrievable ruin. Let all men who love their country—all who value their own interests, put far from them party and personal feelings; and examine dispassionately the fruits of the liberal system of Government, and the situation in which they are placed.

The liberal doctrines were not only to give abundance to the labouring classes, but to fill these and other classes with knowledge and the best feelings. These classes have been sunk into unexampled penury, and filled with the most erroneous and dangerous opinions. The same opinions have been very largely adopted by the middle classes. The wholesome party-war between Whig and Tory, has been changed into a revolutionary one between the democracy and aristocracy. The Whigs no more lead the bulk of the community than the Tories. Earl Grey and Lord Brougham may protest against the ballot and radical reform, or defend the aristocracy; but they are scorned by their liberal pupils. While the control of both parties of public men is wholly cast off in favour of revolutionary objects, the country is covered with lawless combinations, and clubs for the attainment of these objects. The Whigs and Liberals are themselves proclaiming that the empire is in great danger from the bad feelings of the English population.

Catholic emancipation has produced a very violent, however necessary, abridgement of privilege and liberty to the Catholics themselves: it has greatly injured their condition. Ireland could have been governed with much less despotic means before it was granted, than she can now. To the danger of revolution in England, it has been added that of Irish rebellion for the sake of independence.

Demonstration flashes from every side, that a few steps farther will be the loss of every thing—will be the certain downfall of the empire; yet the parents of the tremendous peril insist on proceeding: the same principles are to be acted on, the same instruction is to be disseminated, and the same men are still to dictate and govern.

Let those who have a stake in the public weal, look at these matters and do their duty: let them especially consider how the English clubs—clamour against Church property—projected change of the corn law—and war against the aristocracy—are calculated to operate on the feelings and interests of Ireland.

The intelligent part of the Irish Protestants must be well aware, that their religious existence is now struck at—that the independence of their country would be the extermination of its Protestantism; and this will keep them on the right side, if they be not disarmed by folly in the government. How long the humbler part of them can be depended on, is a question which cannot be looked at without apprehension: it is manifest to all, that every effort should be made to attach them to proper feelings.

The Catholics may assure themselves, that there is no Englishman who desires to profit at their cost, or who is not willing to make a sacrifice for their legitimate benefit. For many years the people of England have been as anxious as any Irishman to remove, regardless of their own loss, the penury and misery of Ireland. And they may assure themselves farther, that England, however divided and misled she may be in other respects, sees and feels as she ought on the Repeal; that she regards it as a matter of vitality—a blow at, not a limb, but the heart, and will never consent to it, so long as she has blood to shed and a weapon to contend with.

PASSAGES FROM THE DIARY OF A LATE PHYSICIAN.

CHAP. VIII.

The Martyr-Philosopher.

It has been my lot to witness many dreadful death-beds. I am not overstating the truth, when I assert that nearly eight out of every ten that have come under my personal observation—of course excluding children—have more or less partaken of this character. I know only one way of accounting for it, and some may accuse me of cant for adverting to it,—men will not live as if they were to die. They are content to let that event come upon them “like a thief in the night.”* They grapple with their final foe, not merely unprepared, but absolutely incapacitated for the struggle, and then wonder and wail at their being overcome and “trodden under foot.” I have, in some of the foregoing chapters, attempted to sketch three or four dreary scenes of this description, my pencil trembling in my hand the while; and could I but command colours dark enough, it is yet in my power to pourtray others far more appalling than any that have gone before—cases of those who have left life “clad in horror’s hideous robe”—whose sun has gone down in darkness—if I may be pardoned for quoting the fearful language of a very unfashionable book!

Now, however, for a while at least, let the storm pass away; the accumulated clouds of guilt, despair, madness, disperse; and the lightning of the fiercer passions cease to shed its disastrous glare over our minds. Let us rejoice beneath the serened heavens; let us seek sunnier spots—by turning to the more peaceful pages of humanity. Let me attempt to lay before the reader a short account of one whose exit was eminently calm, tranquil, and dignified; who did not skulk into his grave with shame and fear, but laid down life with honour: leaving behind him the influence of his greatness and goodness, like the evening sun—who smiles sadly on the sweet scenes he is quitting, and a holy lustre glows long on the features of nature—

“Quiet as a nun
“Breathless with adoration.”†

Even were I disposed, I could not gratify the reader with any thing like a fair sketch of the early days of Mr E—. I have often lamented, that, knowing as I did the simplicity and frankness of his disposition, I did not once avail myself of several opportunities which fell in my way of becoming acquainted with the leading particulars of his life. Now, however, as is generally the case, I can but deplore my negligence, when remedying it is impossible. All that I have it now in my power to record, is some particulars of his latter days. Interesting I know they will be considered: may they prove instructive. I hope the few records I have here preserved, will shew how a mind long disciplined by philosophy, and strengthened by religious principle, may triumph over the assault of evils and misfortunes combined against its expiring energies. It is fitting, I say, the world should hear how nobly E— surmounted such a sudden influx of disasters as have seldom before burst overwhelmingly upon a death-bed.

And should this chapter of my diary chance to be seen by any of his relatives and early friends, I hope the reception it shall meet with from the public may stimulate them to give the world some fuller particulars of Mr E—’s valuable, if not very varied, life. More than seven years have elapsed since his death; and, as yet, the only intimation the public has had of the event, has been in the dreary corner of the public

* One of my patients, whom a long course of profligacy had brought to a painful and premature death-bed, once quoted this striking and scriptural expression when within less than an hour of his end, and with a thrill of horror.

† Wordsworth, I believe.

prints allotted to "Deaths,"—and a brief enumeration in one of the quarterly journals of some of his leading contributions to science. The world at large, however, scarce know that he ever lived—or, at least, how he lived or died;—but how often is such the fate of modest merit!

My first acquaintance with Mr E.— commenced accidentally, not long before his death, at one of the evening meetings of a learned society of which we were both members. The first glimpse I caught of him interested me much, and inspired me with a kind of reverence for him. He came into the room within a few minutes of the chair's being taken, and walked quietly and slowly, with a kind of stooping gait, to one of the benches near the fire-place, where he sat down, without taking off his great-coat, and crossing his gloved hands on the knob of a high walking-stick, he rested his chin on them, and in that attitude continued throughout the evening. He removed his hat when the chairman made his appearance; and I never saw a finer head in my life. The crown was quite bald, but the base was fringed round as it were, with a little soft, glossy, silver-hued hair, which, in the distance, looked like a faint halo. His forehead was of noble proportions; and, in short, there was an expression of serene intelligence in his features, blended with meekness and dignity, which quite enchanted me.

"Pray, who is that gentleman?" I enquired of my friend Mr D.—, who was sitting beside me. "Do you mean that elderly thin man sitting near the fire-place, with a great-coat on?"—"The same."—"Oh, it is Mr E.—, one of the very ablest men in the room, though he talks the least," whispered my friend; "and a man who comes the nearest to my beau idéal of a philosopher, of any man I ever knew or heard of in the present day!"

"Why, he does not seem very well known here," said I, observing that he neither spoke to, nor was spoken to by any of the members present. "Ah, poor Mr E.— is breaking up, I'm afraid, and that very fast," replied my friend, with a sigh. "He comes but seldom to our evening meetings, and is not ambitious of making many acquaintances." I intimated an eager desire to be introduced to him. "Oh, nothing easier," replied my friend, "for I know him more familiarly than any one present, and he is, besides, simple as a child in his manners, even to eccentricity, and the most amiable man in the world. I'll introduce you when the meeting's over." While we were thus whispering together, the subject of our conversation suddenly rose from his seat, and with some trepidation of manner, addressed a few words to the chair, in correction of some assertions which he interrupted a member in advancing. It was something, if I recollect right, about the atomic theory, and was received with marked deference by the president, and general "Hear! hears!" from the members. He then resumed his seat, in which he was presently followed by the speaker whom he had evidently discomfited; his eyes glistened, and his cheeks were flushed with the effort he had made, and he did not rise again till the conclusion of the sitting. We then made our way to him, and my friend introduced me. He received me politely and frankly. He complained, in a weak voice, that the walk thither had quite exhausted him—that his health was failing him, &c.

"Why, Mr E.—, you look very well," said my friend.

"Ay, perhaps I do, but you know how little faith is to be put in the hale looks of an old and weak man. Age generally puts a good face on bad matters, even to the last," he added, with a smile and a shake of the head.

"A sad night!" he exclaimed, on hearing the wind howling drearily without, for we were standing by a window at the north-east corner of the large building; and a March wind swept cruelly by, telling bitter things to the old and feeble who had to face it. "Allow me to recommend that you wrap up your neck and breast well," said I.

"I intend it, indeed," he replied, as he was folding up a large silk handkerchief. "One must guard one's candle with one's hand, or Death will blow it out in a moment. That's the sort of treatment we old people get from him; no ceremony—he waits for one at a bleak corner, and puffs out one's expiring light with a breath, and then hastens on to the more vigorous torch of youth."

"Have you a coach?" enquired Dr D—. "A coach! I shall walk it in less than twenty minutes," said Mr E—, buttoning his coat up to the chin.

"Allow me to offer you both a seat in mine," said I; "it is at the door, and I am driving towards your neighbourhood." He and Dr D— accepted the offer, and in a few minutes time we entered, and drove off. We soon set down the latter, who lived close by; and then my new philosophical friend and I were left together. Our conversation turned, for a while, on the evening's discussion at the society; and, in a very few words, remarkably well chosen, he pointed out what he considered to have been errors committed by Sir — and Dr —, the principal speakers. I was not more charmed by the lucidness of his views, than by the unaffected diffidence with which they were expressed.

"Well," said he, after a little pause in our conversation, "your carriage motion is mighty pleasant, it reduces one into a feeling of indolence! These delicious soft-yielding cushioned backs and seats, they would make a man loath to use his legs again! Yet I never kept a carriage in my life, though I have often wanted one, and could easily have afforded it once." I asked him why? He replied, "It was not because he feared childish accusations of ostentation, nor yet in order to save money, but because he thought it becoming to a rational being to be content with the natural means God has given him, both as to matter of necessity and pleasure. It was an insult," he said, "to nature, while she was in full vigour, and had exhibited little or no deficiency in her functions—to hurry to art. For my own part," said he, "I have always found a quiet but exquisite satisfaction, in continuing independent of her assistance, though at the cost of some occasional inconvenience: it gives you a consciousness of relying incessantly on Him who made you, and sustains you in being. Do you recollect the solemn saying of Johnson to Garrick, on seeing the immense levies the latter had made on the resources of ostentatious, ornamental art? 'Davie, Davie, these are the things that make a death-bed terrible!'" I said something about Diogenes. "Ah," he replied quickly, "the other extreme! He accused nature of superfluity, redundancy. A proper subordination of externals to her use, is part of her province; else why is she placed among so many materials, and with such facilities of using them? My principle, if such it may be called, is, that art may minister to nature, but not pamper and surfeit her with superfluities.

"You would laugh, perhaps, to come to my house, and see the extent to which I have carried my principles into practice. I, yes, I, whose life has been devoted, among other things, to the discovery of mechanical contrivances! You, accustomed, perhaps, to the elegant redundancies of these times, may consider my house and furniture absurdly plain and naked—a tree stripped of its leaves when the birds are left to lodge on the bare branches! But I want little, and do not 'want that little long.' But stop, here is my house! Come—a laugh, you know, is good before bed—will you have it now? Come, see a curiosity—a Diogenes, but no Cynic!" Had the reader seen the modesty, the cheerfulness, the calmness of manner with which Mr E—, from time to time, joined in the conversation, of which the above is the substance, and been aware of the weight due to his sentiments, or those of one who had actually LIVED UP to them all his life, and earned a very high character in the philosophical world—if he be aware how often old age and pedantry, grounded on a small reputation, are blended in repulsive union, he might not consider the trouble I have taken thrown away in recording this my first conversation with Mr E—. He was, indeed, an instance of "philosophy teaching by example;" a sort of character to be sought out for in life, as one at whose feet we may safely sit down and learn. I could not accept of Mr E—'s invitation that evening, as I had a patient to see a little farther on; but I promised him an early call. All my way home my mind was filled with the image of E—, and partook of the tranquillity and pensiveness of its guest.

I scarce know how it was, but with all my admiration of Mr E—, I suffered the month of May to approach its close before I again encountered him. It was partly owing to a sudden increase of business, created by a raging scarlet fever—and partly occasioned by illness in my own family. I often thought and talked, however, of the philosopher, for that was the name he went by with Dr D— and myself. Mr E— had invited us both to take "an old-fashioned friendly cup of tea" with him; and accordingly, about six o'clock, we found ourselves driving down to his house. On our way, Dr D— told me that our friend had been a widower nearly five years; and that the loss, somewhat sudden, of his amiable and accomplished wife, had worked a great change in him, by divesting him of nearly all interest in life or its concerns. He pursued even his philosophical occupations with languor, more from a kind of habit than inclination. Still he retained the same evenness and cheerfulness which had distinguished him through life. But the blow had been struck which severed him from the world's joys and engagements. He might be compared to a great tree torn up by the root, and laid prostrate by a storm, yet which dies not all at once. The sap is not instantaneously dried up; but for weeks, or even months, you may see the smaller branches still shooting unconsciously into short-lived existence, all fresh and tender from the womb of their dead mother; and a rich green mantle of leaves long concealing from view the poor fallen trunk beneath. Such was the pensive turn my thoughts had taken by the time we had reached Mr E—'s door. It was a fine summer evening—the hour of calm excitement. The old-fashioned window panes of the house we had stopped at, shone like small specks of fire, in the steady slanting rays of the retiring sun. It was the first house of a very respectable antique-looking row, in the suburbs of London, which had been built in the days of Henry the Eighth.

Three stately poplars stood sentries before the gateway.

"Well, here we are at last, at Plato's Porch, as I've christened it," said Dr D—, knocking at the door. On entering the parlour, a large old-fashioned room, furnished with the utmost simplicity, consistent with comfort, we found Mr E— sitting near the window, reading. He was in a brown dressing-gown, and study cap. He rose and welcomed us cheerfully. "I have been looking into La Place," said he, in the first pause which ensued, "and a little before your arrival, had flattered myself that I had detected some erroneous calculations; and only look at the quantity of evidence that was necessary to convince that I was a simpleton by the side of La Place!" pointing to two or three sheets of paper crammed with small algebraical characters in pencil—a fearful array of symbols— $\sqrt{\frac{2}{3}} = 3 a^2, \frac{2}{3} + 9 - n = 9; n \times \log.$ and sines, co-sines, series, &c. &c. without end. I had the curiosity to take up the volume in question, while he was speaking to Dr D—, and noticed on the fly leaf the autograph of the Marquis La Place, who had sent his work to Mr E—. Tea was presently brought in; and as soon as the plain old-fashioned china, &c. &c., had been laid on the table by the man-servant, himself a knowing old fellow as I ever saw in my life, Miss E—, the philosopher's niece, made her appearance, an elegant unaffected girl, with the same style of features as her uncle.

"I can give a shrewd guess at your thoughts, Dr —," said Mr E—, smiling, as he caught my eye following the movements of the man-servant till he left the room.—"You fancy my keeping a man-servant to wait at table does not tally very well with what I said the last time I had the pleasure of seeing you."

"Oh dear, I'm sure you're mistaken, Mr E—! I was struck with the singularity of his countenance and manners—those of a staunch old family servant."

"Ah, Joseph is a vast favourite with my uncle," said Miss E—, "I can assure you, and fancies him—" self nearly as great a man as his master."—"Why, as far as the pratique of the laboratory is concerned, I doubt if his superior is to be found in London. He knows it, and all my ways, as well as he knows the palm of his own hand! He has the neatest way in the world of making hydrogen gas, and, what is more, found it out himself," said Mr E——, explaining the process; "and then he is a miracle of cleanliness and care! He has not cost me ten shillings in breakage since I knew him. He moves among my brittle wares, like a cat on a glass wall."

"And then he writes and reads for my uncle—does all the minor work of the laboratory—goes on errands—waits at table—in short, he's quite invaluable," said Miss E——.

"Quite a factotum, I protest," exclaimed Dr D——.

"You'd lose your better half then, if he were to die, I suppose?" said I quickly.

"No! that can happen but once," replied Mr E—— with a sigh, alluding to the death of his wife. Conversation flagged for a moment. "You've forgotten," at length said E——, breaking the melancholy pause, "the very chiefest of poor Joseph's accomplishments—what an admirable, unwearied nurse he is to me." At that moment Joseph entered the room, with a note in his hand, which he gave to Mr E——. I guessed where it came from—for happening a few moments before to cast my eye to the window, I saw a footman walking up to the door; and there was no mistaking the gorgeous scarlet liveries of the Duke of ——. E——, after glancing over the letter, begged us to excuse him for a minute or two, as the man was waiting for an answer.

"You, of course, knew what my uncle alluded to," said Miss E——, addressing Dr D—— in a low tone, as soon as E—— had closed the door after him, "when he spoke of Joseph's being a nurse—don't you?" Dr D—— nodded. "My poor uncle," she continued, addressing me, "has been for nearly twenty-five years afflicted with a dreadful disease in the spine; and during all that time has suffered a perfect martyrdom from it. He could not stand straight up, if it were to save his life; and he is obliged to sleep in a bed of a very curious description—the joint contrivance of himself and Joseph. He takes half an ounce of laudanum every night, at bed time, without which, the pains, which are always most excruciating at night time, would not suffer him to get a moment's sleep!—Oh, how often have I seen him rolling about on this carpet and hearth-rug—yes, even in the presence of visitors—in a perfect ecstasy of agony, and uttering the most heartbreaking groans."

"And I can add," said Dr D——, "that he is the most perfect Job—the most angelic sufferer, I ever saw!"

"Indeed, indeed, he is," rejoined Miss E——, with emotion. "I can say, with perfect truth, that I never once heard him murmur or complain at his hard fate. When I have been expressing my sympathies, during the extremity of his anguish, he has gasped, 'Well, well, it might have been worse!'"—Miss E——, suddenly raised her handkerchief to her eyes, for they were overflowing.

"Do you see that beautiful little picture hanging over the mantel-piece?" she enquired, after a pause, which neither Dr D—— nor I seemed inclined to interrupt—pointing to an exquisite oil painting of the crucifixion. "I have seen my poor uncle lying down on the floor, while in the most violent paroxysms of pain, and with his eyes fixed intensely on that picture, exclaim, 'Thine were greater—thine were greater!'" And then he has presently clasped his hands upwards; a smile has beamed upon his pallid quivering features, and he has told me the pain was abated."

"I once was present during one of these painfully interesting scenes," said Dr D——, "and have seen such a heavenly radiance on his countenance, as could not have been occasioned by the mere sudden cessation of the anguish he had been suffering."

"Does not this strange disorder abate with his increasing years?" I enquired.

"Alas, no!" replied Miss E——, "but is, if possible, more frequent and severe in its seizures. Indeed, we all think it is wearing him out fast. But for the unwearied services of that faithful creature, Joseph, who sleeps in the same room with him, my uncle must have died long ago!"

"How did this terrible disorder attack Mr E——, and when?" I enquired. I was informed that he himself originated the complaint with an injury he sustained when a very young man: he was riding, one day, on horseback, and his horse suddenly reared backward, and Mr E——'s back came in violent contact with a plank, projecting from behind a cart loaded with timber. He was, besides, however, subject to a constitutional feebleness in the spine, derived from his father and grandfather. He had consulted almost every surgeon of eminence in England, and a few on the Continent; and spent a little fortune among them—but all had been in vain!

"Really, you will be quite surprised, Doctor ——," said Miss E——, "to know, that though such a martyr to pain, and now in his 64th year, my uncle is more active in his habits, and regular in his hours, than I ever knew any one. He rises almost invariably at four o'clock in summer, and at six in winter;—and this, though so helpless, that without Joseph's assistance, he could not dress himself——."—"Ah, by the way"

—interrupted Dr D——, "that is another peculiarity in Mr E——'s case; he is subject to a sort of nightly paralysis of the upper extremities, from which he does not completely recover, till he has been up for some two or three hours." How little had I thought of the under-current of agony, flowing incessantly beneath the calm surface of his cheerful and dignified demeanour! Oh, philosophy—Oh, Christian philosophy!—I had failed to detect any marks of suffering in his features, though I had now had two interviews with him—so completely, even hitherto, had "his unconquerable mind conquered the clay"—as one of our old writers expresses it. If I had admired and respected him heretofore, on the ground of Dr D——'s opinion—how did I now feel disposed to adore him! I looked on him as an instance of long-tryed heroism and fortitude, almost unparalleled in the history of man. Such thoughts were passing through my mind, when Mr E—— re-entered the room. I had heard, during his absence, made me now look on him with tenfold interest. I wondered that I had overlooked his stoop—and the permanent print of pain on his pallid cheek. I gazed at him, in short, with feelings of sympathy and reverence, akin to those called forth by a picture of one of the ancient martyrs.

"I'm sorry to have been deprived of your company so long," said he; "but I have had to answer an invitation, and several questions besides, from—I daresay you know whom?" addressing Dr D——.

"I can guess, on the principle ex ungue—the gaudy livery 'vaunts of royalty'—eh? Is it——?"

"Yes. He has invited me to dine with Lord ——, Sir ——, and several other members of the —— Society, at ——, this day week, but I have declined. At my time of life I can't stand late hours and excitement. Besides, one must learn betimes to wean from the world, or be suddenly snatched from it, screaming like a child," said Mr E——, with an impressive air.

"I believe you are particularly intimate with ——; at least I have heard so—Are you?" enquired Dr D——.

"No. I might possibly have been so, for —— has shewn great consideration towards me; but I can assure you, I am the sought, rather than the seeker, and have been all my life."

"It is often fatal to philosophical independence to approach too frequently, and too nearly, the magic circle of the court," said I.

"True. Science is, and should be, aspiring. So is the eagle; but the royal bird never approaches so near the sun, as to be drowned in its blaze. —— has been nothing since he became a courtier." * * *

"What do you think of ——'s pretensions to science, generally, and his motives for seeking so anxiously the intimacy of the learned?" enquired Dr D——.

"Why, ——" replied E——, with some hesitation; "tis a wonderful thing for him to know even a fiftieth part of what he does. He is popularly acquainted with the outlines of most of the leading sciences. He went through a regular course of readings with my friend ——; but he has not the time necessary to ensure a successful prosecution of science. It is, however, infinitely advantageous to science and literature, to have the willing and active patronage of royalty. I never knew him exhibit one trait of overbearing dogmatism; and that is saying much for one whom all flatter always. It has struck me, however, that he has rather too anxious an eye towards securing the character and applause of a MÆCENAS."

"Pray, Mr E——, do you recollect mentioning to me an incident which occurred at a large dinner party given by ——, when you were present, when Dr —— made use of these words to ——: 'Does not your —— think it possible for a man to pelt another with potatoes, to provoke him to fling peaches in return, for want of other missiles?'—and the furious answer was ——."

"We will drop that subject, if you please," said E—— coldly, at the same time colouring, and giving my friend a peculiar monitory look.

"I know well, personally, that —— has done very many noble things in his day—most of them, comparatively, in secret; and one munificent action he has performed lately towards a man of scientific eminence, who has been as unfortunate as he is deserving, which will probably never come to the public ear, unless —— and —— die suddenly," said Mr E——. He had scarcely uttered these words, when he turned suddenly pale, laid down his tea-cup, with a quivering hand, and slipped slowly from his chair to the floor, where he lay at his full length, rolling to and fro, with his hands pressed upon the lower part of his spine—and all the while uttering deep sighs and groans. The big drops of perspiration, rolling from his forehead down his cheeks, evidenced the dreadful agony he was enduring. Dr D—— and I both knelt down on one knee by his side, proffering our assistance—but he entreated us to leave him to himself for a few moments, and he should soon be better.

"Emma!" he gasped, calling his niece—who, sobbing bitterly, was at his side in a moment—"kiss me—that's a dear girl!—and go up to bed—but, on your way, send Joseph here directly." She retired, and in a few moments Joseph entered hastily, with a broad leathern band, which he drew round his master's waist and buckled tightly. He then pressed with both his hands for some time upon the immediate seat of the pain. Our situation was both embarrassing and distressing—both of us medical men, and yet compelled to stand by mere passive spectators of agonies we could neither alleviate nor remove.

"Do you absolutely despair of discovering what the precise nature of this complaint is?" I enquired in an under tone.

"Yes—in common with every one else that has tried to discover it, but in vain. That it is an affection of the spinal chord, is clear; but what is the immediate exciting cause of these tremendous paroxysms I cannot conjecture," replied Dr D——.

"What have been the principal remedies resorted to?"

"Oh, every thing—almost every thing that the wit of man could devise—local and general bleedings to a dreadful extent; irritations and counter-irritations without end; electricity—galvanism—all the resources of medicine and surgery have been ransacked to no purpose.—Look at him!" whispered Dr D——, "look—look;—do you see how his whole body is drawn together in a heap, while his limbs are quivering as though they would fall from him?—See—see—how they are now struck out, and plunging about, his hands clutching convulsively at the carpet—scarce a trace of humanity in his distorted features—as if this great and good man were the sport of a demon!"

"Oh! gracious God! Can we do nothing to help him?" I enquired, suddenly approaching him, almost stifled with my emotions. Mr E—— did not seem conscious of our approach; but lay rather quieter, groaning—"Oh—oh—oh—that it would please God to dismiss me from my sufferings!"

"My dear, dear Mr E——," exclaimed Dr D——, excessively agitated, "can we do nothing for you? Can't we be of any service to you?"

"Oh, none—none—none!" he groaned, in tones expressive of utter hopelessness. For more than a quarter of an hour did this victim of disease continue writhing on the floor, and we standing by, "physicians of no value!" The violence of the paroxysm abated at length, and again we stooped, for the purpose of raising him and carrying him to the sofa—but he motioned us off, exclaiming so faintly as to be almost inaudible—"No—no, thank you—I must not be moved for this hour—and when I am, it must be to bed."—"Then we will bid you good evening, and pray to God you may be better in the morning."—"Yes—yes.—Better—better; good—good by," he muttered indistinctly.

"Master's falling asleep, gentlemen, as he always does after these fits," said Joseph, who had his arm round his suffering master's neck. We, of course, left immediately, and met Miss E—— in the passage, muffled in her shawl, and sobbing as if she would break her heart.

Dr D—— told me, as we were walking home, that, about two years' ago, E—— made a week's stay with him; and that, on one occasion, he endured agonies of such horrible intensity, as nothing could abate, or in any measure alleviate, but two doses of laudanum, of nearly six drachms each, within half an hour of each other; and that even then he did not sleep for more than two hours. "When he awoke," continued my friend, "he was lying on the sofa in a state of dreadful exhaustion, the perspiration running from him like water. I asked him if he did not sometimes yield to such thoughts as were suggested to Job by his impetuous friends—to 'curse God and die,'—to repine at the long and lingering tortures he had endured nearly all his life, for no apparent crime of his own?"

"No, no," he replied calmly; "I've suffered too long an apprenticeship to pain for that! I own I was at first a little disobedient—a little restive—but now I am learning resignation! Would not useless fretting serve to enhance—to aggravate my pains?"

"Well!" I exclaimed, "it puzzles my theology—if any thing could make me sceptical."—E—— saw the train of my thoughts, and interrupted me, laying his white wasted hand on mine—"I always strive to bear in mind that I am in the hands of a God as good as great, and that I am not to doubt his goodness, because I cannot exactly see how he brings it about. Doubtless there are reasons for my suffering what I do, which, though at present incomprehensible to me, would appear abundantly satisfactory could I be made acquainted with them. Oh, Dr D——, what would become of me," said E——, solemnly, "were I, instead of the rich consolations of religion, to have nothing to rely on but the disheartening speculations of infidelity!—If in this world only I have hope," he continued, looking steadfastly upwards, "I am, of all men, most miserable!"—Is not it dangerous to know such a man, lest one should feel inclined to fall down and worship him?" enquired my friend. Indeed I thought so. Surely E—— was a miracle of patience and fortitude! and how he had contrived to make his splendid advancements in science, while subject to such almost unheard-of tortures, both as to duration and intensity—had devoted himself so successfully to the prosecution of studies requiring habits of long, patient, profound abstraction—was to me inconceivable.

How few of us are aware of what is suffered by those with whom we are most intimate! How few know the heavy counter-balanings of popularity and eminence; the exquisite agonies, whether physical or intellectual, inflicted by one irremovable "thorn in the flesh!" Oh! the miseries of that eminence whose chief prerogative too often is—

"Above the vulgar herd to rot in state!"

How little had I thought, while gazing, at the —— rooms, on this admirable man, first fascinated with the placidity of his noble features, that I looked at one who had equal claims to the character of a MARTYR and a philosopher! How my own petty grievances dwindled away in comparison of those endured by E——! How contemptible the pusillanimity I had often exhibited!

And do you, reader, who, if a man, are, perhaps, in the habit of cursing and blaspheming while smarting under the toothach, or any of those minor "ills that flesh is heir to," think, at such times, of poor, meek, suffering E——, and be silent!

I could not dismiss from my mind the painful image of E—— writhing on the floor, as I have above described, but lay the greater part of the night, reflecting on the probable nature of his unusual disorder. Was it any thing of a spasmodic nature? Would not such attacks have worn him out long ago? Was it one of the remoter effects of partial paralysis? Was it a preternatural pressure on the spinal chord, occasioned by fracture of one of the vertebrae, or enlargement of the intervertebral ligaments?—Or was it owing to a thickening of the medulla-spinalis itself?

Fifty similar conjectures passed through my mind, excited, as well by the singularity of the disease, as by sympathy for the sufferer. Before I fell asleep, I resolved to call on him during the next day, and enquire carefully into the nature of his symptoms—in the forlorn hope of hitting on some means of mitigating his sufferings.

By twelve o'clock at noon I was set down again at his door. A maid-servant answered my summons, and told me that Mr E—— and Joseph were busily engaged in the "Laboratory." She took in my card to him, and returned with her master's compliments, and he would thank me to step in. I followed the girl to the laboratory. On opening the door, I saw E—— and his trusty work-fellow, Joseph, busily engaged fusing some species of metal. The former was dressed as on the preceding evening, with the addition of a long black apron,—looked heated and flushed with exercise; and, with his stooping gait, was holding some small implement over the furnace, while Joseph, on his knees, was puffing away at the fire with a small pair of bellows.—To anticipate for a moment. How little did E—— or I imagine, that this was very nearly the last time of his ever again entering the scene of his long and useful scientific labours!

I was utterly astonished to see one whose sufferings over night had been so dreadful, quietly pursuing his avocations in the morning, as though nothing had happened to him!

"Excuse my shaking hands with you for the present, Doctor," said E——, looking at me through a huge pair of tortoise-shell spectacles, "for both hands are engaged, you see. My friend Dr—— has just sent me a piece of platinum, and you see I'm already playing pranks with it! Really, I'm as eager to spoil a plaything to see what my rattle's made of, as any philosophical child in the kingdom! Here I am analyzing—dissolving—transmuting—and so on:—But I've really an important end in view here, trying a new combination of metal, and Dr—— is anxious to know if the result of my process corresponds with his—now, now, Joseph," said E——, breaking off suddenly, "it is ready; bring the——" At this critical instant, by some unlucky accident, poor Joseph suddenly overthrew the whole apparatus—and the compounds, ashes, fragments, &c. were spilled on the floor! Really, I quite lost my own temper with thinking of the vexatious disappointment it would be to E——. Not so, however, with him.

"Oh, dear—dear, dear me! Well, here's an end of our day's work before we thought for it! How did you do it, Joseph, eh?" said E—— with an air of chagrin, but with perfect mildness of tone. What a ludicrous contrast between the philosopher and his assistant! The latter, an obese little fellow, with a droll cast of one eye—was quite red in the face, and wringing his hands, exclaimed—"Oh Lord—oh Lord—oh Lord! what could I have been doing, master?"—"Why, that's surely your concern more than mine," replied E——, smiling at me. "Come, come, it can't be helped—you've done yourself more harm than me—by giving Dr—— such a specimen of your awkwardness as I have not seen for many a month. See and set things to rights as soon as possible," said E——, calmly, and putting away his spectacles.

"Well, Dr——, what do you think of my little workshop?" he continued, addressing me, who still stood with my hat and gloves on—surprised and delighted to see that his temper had stood this trial, and that such a provoking contre-temps had really not at all ruffled him. From the position in which he stood, the light fell strongly on his face, and I saw his features more distinctly than heretofore. I noticed that sure index of a thinking countenance—three strong perpendicular marks or folds between the eyebrows, at right-angles with the deep wrinkles that furrowed his forehead, and then the “untroubled lustre” of his cold, clear, full, blue eyes, rich and serene as that —“through whose clear medium the great sun Loveth to shoot his beams, all bright’ning, all Turning to gold.”

Reader, when you see a face of this stamp, so marked, and with such eyes and forehead, rest assured you are looking at a gifted, if not an extraordinary man. The lower features were somewhat shrunk and sallow—as well they might, if only from a thousand hours of agony, setting aside the constant wearing of his “ever-waking mind;” yet a smile of cheerfulness—call it rather resignation—irradiated his pale countenance, like twilight on a sepulchre. He shewed me round his laboratory, which was kept in most exemplary cleanliness and order; and then, opening a door, we entered the “sanctum sanctorum”—his study. It had not more, I should think, than five or six hundred books; but all of them—in plain substantial bindings—had manifestly seen good service. Immediately beneath the window stood several portions of a splendid astronomical apparatus—a very large telescope, in exquisite order—a recently invented instrument for calculating the parallaxes of the fixed stars—a chronometer of his own construction, &c. “Do you see this piece of furniture?” he enquired, directing my attention to a sort of sideless sofa, or broad inclined plane, stuffed, the extremity turned up, to rest the feet against—and being at an angle of about forty-five degrees with the floor. “Ah! could that thing speak, it might tell a tale of my tortures, such as no living being may! For, when I feel my daily paroxysms coming on me, if I am anywhere near my study, I lay my wearied limbs here, and continue till I find relief!” This put conversation into the very train I wished. I begged him to favour me with a description of his disease; and he sat down and ~~related~~ related. I recollect him comparing the pain to that which might follow the incessant stinging of a wasp at the spinal marrow—sudden, lacerating, accompanied by quivering sensations throughout the whole nervous system—followed by a strange sense of numbness. He said that at other times it was as though some one was in the act of drilling a hole through his backbone, and piercing the marrow! Sometimes, during the moments of his most ecstatic agonies, he felt as though his backbone was rent asunder all the way up. The pain was on the whole local—confined to the first of the lumbar vertebrae; but occasionally fluctuating between them and the dorsal. When he had finished the dreary details of his disease, I was obliged to acknowledge, with a sigh, that nothing suggested itself to me as a remedy, but what I understood from Dr D—, had been tried over and over, and over again.—“You are right,” he replied, sorrowfully, “Dreadful as are my sufferings, the bare thought of undergoing more medical or surgical treatment, makes me shudder. My back is already frightfully disfigured with the scarrings of caustic, seaton-marks, cupping, and blistering;—and I hope God will give me patience to wait till their perpetual knockings, as it were, shall have at length battered down this frail structure.”

“Mr E—, you rival some of the old martyrs!” said I, as we rose to leave the study.

“In point of bodily suffering, I may; but their holiness! those who are put into the keenest parts—the very heart of the ‘fiery furnace’—will come out most refined at last!”

“Well, you may be earning a glorious reward hereafter, for your constancy—”

“Or I may be merely smarting for the sins of my forefathers!” exclaimed E— mournfully.

Monday, July 18—. Having been called to a patient in the neighbourhood of E—, I took that opportunity of calling upon him on my return. It was about nine o’clock in the evening; and I found the philosopher sitting pensively in the parlour alone; for his niece, I learned, had retired early, owing to indisposition. A peculiar semi-circular lamp, of his own contrivance, stood on the table, which was strewn with books, pamphlets, and papers. He received me with his usual gentle affability.

"I don't know how it is, but I feel in a singular mood of mind to-night," said he; "I ought to say rather many moods: sometimes so suddenly and strongly excited, as to lose the control over my emotions—at others, sinking into the depths of despondency. I've been trying for these two hours to glance over this new view of the Neptunian theory," pointing to an open book on the table, "which — has sent me, to review for him in the —; but 'tis useless; I cannot command my thoughts." I felt his pulse: it was one of the most irregular I had ever known. "I know what you suspect," said he, observing my eyes fixed with a puzzled air on my watch, and my finger at his wrist, for several minutes; "some organic mischief at the heart. Several of your fraternity have latterly comforted me with assurances to that effect." I assured him I did not apprehend any thing of the kind, but merely that his circulation was a little disturbed by recent excitement.

"True—true," he replied, "I am a little flustered, as the phrase is—"

"Oh—here's the secret, I suppose:" said I, reaching to a periodical publication of the month, lying on the table, and in which I had a few days ago read a somewhat virulent attack on him. "You're very rudely handled here, I think?" said I.

"What, do you think that has discomposed me?" he enquired with a smile. "No, no—I'm past feeling these things long ago! Abuse—mere personality—now excites in me no emotion of any kind!"

"Why, Mr E—, surely you are not indifferent to the opinion of the public, which may be misled by such things as these, if suffered to go unanswered?"

"I am not afraid of that. If I've done any thing good in my time, as I have honestly tried to do, sensible people won't believe me an impostor, at any man's bidding. Those who would be so influenced, are hardly worth undeceiving."*

 "There's a good deal of acuteness in the paper, and in one particular, the reviewer has fairly caught me tripping. He may laugh at me as much as he pleases; but why go about to put himself in a passion? The subject did not require it. But if he is in a passion, should I not be foolish to be in one too?—Passion serves only to put out truth; and no one would indulge it that had truth only in view. * * The real occasion of my nervousness," he continued, "is far different from what you have supposed—a little incident which occurred only this evening and I will tell it you.

"My niece, feeling poorly with a cold, retired to bed as soon as she had done tea; and after sitting here about a quarter of an hour, I took one of the candles, and walked to the laboratory, to see whether all was right—as is my custom every evening. On opening the door, to my very great amazement, I saw a stranger in it, a gentleman in dark-coloured clothes, holding a dim taper in one hand, and engaged in going round the room, apparently putting all my instruments in order. I stood at the door almost petrified, watching his movements, without thinking of interrupting them, for a sudden feeling of something like awe crept over me. He made no noise whatever, and did not seem aware that any one was looking at him—or if he was, he did not seem disposed to notice the interruption. I saw him as clearly, and what he was doing, as I now see you playing with your gloves! He was engaged leisurely putting away all my loose implements,—shutting boxes, cases, and cupboards, with the accuracy of one who was perfectly well acquainted with his work. Having thus disposed of all the instruments and apparatus which had been used to-day—and we have had very many more than usual out—he opened the inner-door leading to the study, and entered—I following in mute astonishment. He went to work the same way in the study; shutting up several volumes that lay open on the table, and carefully replacing them in their proper places on the shelves.

“Having cleared away these, he approached the astronomical apparatus near the window, put the cap on the object-end of the telescope, pushed in the joints, all noiselessly, closed up in its case my new chronometer, and then returned to the table where my desk lay, took up the ink-stand, poured out the ink into the fire-place, flung all the pens under the grate, and then shut the desk, locked it, and laid the key on the top of it. When he had done all this, he walked towards the wall, and turned slowly towards me, looked me full in the face, and shook his head mournfully. The taper he held in his hand slowly expired—and the spectre, if such it were, disappeared. The strangest part of the story is yet to follow. The pale, fixed features seemed perfectly familiar to me—they were those which I had often gazed at, in a portrait of Mr Boyle, prefixed to my quarto copy of his ‘Treatise of Atmospheric Air.’ As soon as I had a little recovered my self-possession, I took down the work in question, and examined the portrait. I was right! I cannot account for my not having spoken to the figure, or gone close up to it. I think I could have done either, as far as courage went. My prevailing idea was, that a single word would have dissolved the charm, and my curiosity prompted me to see it out. I returned to the parlour and rung the bell for Joseph.

“‘Joseph,’ said I, ‘have you set things to rights in the laboratory and study to-night?’—‘Yes, master,’ he replied, with surprise in his manner; ‘I finished it before tea-time, and set things in particular good order—I gave both the rooms a right good cleaning out—I’m sure there’s not even a pin in its wrong place.’

“‘What made you fling the pens and ink in the fire-place and under the grate?’

“‘Because I thought they were of no use—the pens worn to stumps, and the ink thick and clotted—too much gum in it.’ He was evidently astonished at being asked such questions—and was going to explain further, when I said simply, ‘that will do,’ and he retired. Now, what am I to think of all this? If it were a mere ocular spectrum, clothed with its functions from my own excited fancy, there was yet a unity of purpose in its doings that is extraordinary! Something very much like ‘shutting up the shop’—eh?” enquired E—, with a melancholy smile.

“‘Tis touching—very! I never heard a more singular incident,” I replied abstractedly, without removing my eyes from the fire; for my reading of the occurrence was a sudden and strong conviction, that, ghost or no ghost, E— had toiled his last in the behalf of science—that he would never again have occasion to use his philosophical machinery! This melancholy presentiment invested E—, and all he said or did, with tenfold interest in my eyes. “Don’t suppose, doctor, that I am weak enough to be seriously disturbed by the occurrence I have just been mentioning. Whether or not it really portends my approaching death, I know not. Though I am not presumptuous enough to suppose myself so important as to warrant any special interference of Providence on my behalf—yet I cannot help thinking I am to look on this as a warning—a solemn premonition—that I may ‘set my house in order, and die.’” Our conversation, during the remainder of our interview, turned on the topic suggested by the affecting incident just related. I listened to all he uttered, as to the words of a doomed—a dying man! All E— advanced on this difficult and interesting subject, was marked not less by sound philosophy, than unfeigned piety. He ended with avowing his belief, that the Omnipotent Being who formed both the body and the soul, and willed them to exist unitedly, could surely, nevertheless, if he saw good, cause the one to exist separately from the other; either by endowing it with new properties for that special purpose, or by enabling it to exercise, in its disembodied state, those powers which continued latent in it during its connexious with the body. Did it follow—he asked—that neither body nor soul possessed any other qualities than those which were necessary to enable them to exist together? Why should the soul be incapable of a substantially distinct personal existence? Where the impossibility of its being made visible to organs of sense? Has the Almighty no means of bringing this to pass? Are there no latent properties in the organs of vision—no subtle sympathies with immaterial substances—which are yet undiscovered—and even undiscoverable? Surely this may be the case—though how, it would be impossible to conjecture. He saw no bad philosophy, he said, in this; and he who decided the question in the negative, before he had brought forward some evidence of its moral or physical impossibility, was guilty of most presumptuous dogmatism.

This is the substance of his opinions; but, alas! I lack the taste, nervous, philosophical eloquence in which they were clothed. A distinguished living character said of E—, that he was the most fascinating talker on abstruse subjects he ever heard. I could have staid all night listening to him. In fact, I fear I did trespass on his politeness even to inconvenience. I staid and partook of his supper—simple, frugal fare—consisting of roast-potatoes, and two tumblers of new milk. I left about eleven: my mind occupied but with one wish, all the way home,—that I had known E— intimately for as many years as hours!

Two days afterwards, the following hurried note was put into my hands, from my friend Dr D—: "My dear —, I am sure you will be as much affected as I was, at hearing that our inestimable friend, Mr E—, had a sudden stroke of the palsy this afternoon, about two o'clock, from which I very much fear he may never recover; for this, added to his advanced age, and the dreadful chronic complaint under which he labours, is surely sufficient to shatter the small remains of his strength. I need hardly say, that all is in confusion at —. I am going down there to-night, and shall be happy to drive you down also, if you will be at my house by seven. Yours," &c. &c. I was grieved and agitated, but in nowise surprised at this intelligence. What passed the last time I saw him prepared me for something of this kind!

On arriving in the evening we were shewn into the parlour, where sat Miss E—, in a paroxysm of hysterical weeping, which had forced her a few moments before to leave her uncle's sick-room. It was some time before we could calm her agitated spirits, or get her to give us any thing like a connected account of her uncle's sudden illness. "Oh, these will tell you all!" said she, sobbing, and taking two letters from her bosom, one of which bore a black seal; "It is these cruel letters that have broken his heart! Both came by the same post this morning!" She withdrew, promising to send for us when all was ready, and we hastily opened the two letters she had left. What will the reader suppose were the two heavy strokes dealt at once upon the head of Mr E— by an inscrutable Providence? The letter I opened, conveyed the intelligence of the sudden death, in childhood, of Mrs —, his only daughter, to whom he had been most passionately attached. The letter Dr D— held in his hand, disclosed an instance of almost unparalleled perfidy and ingratitude. I shall here state what I learnt afterwards—that many years ago, Mr E— had taken a poor lad from one of the parish schools, pleased with his quickness and obedience, and had apprenticed him to a respectable tradesman. He served his articles honourably, and Mr E— nobly advanced him funds to establish himself in business. He prospered beyond every one's expectations: and the good, generous, confiding E—, was so delighted with his conduct, and persuaded of his principles, that he gradually advanced him large sums of money to increase an extensive connexion; and, at last, invested his all, amounting to little short of £15,000, in this man's concern, for which he received 5 per cent. Sudden success, however, turned this young man's head; and Mr E— had long been uneasy at hearing current rumours about his protégé's unsteadiness and extravagance. He had several times spoken to him about them; but was easily persuaded that the reports in question were as groundless as malicious.

And as the last half-year's interest was paid punctually, accompanied with a hint, that if doubts were entertained of his probity, the man was ready to refund a great part of the principal, Mr E——'s confidence revived. Now, the letter in question was from this person; and stated, that, though "circumstances" had compelled him to withdraw from his creditors for the present, in other words—to abscond, he had no doubt that if Mr E—— would wait a little, he should in time be able to pay him a "fair dividend!"—"Good God! why, E—— is ruined!" exclaimed Dr D——, turning pale, and dropping the letter, after having read it to me.

"Yes, ruined!—all the hard savings of many years labour and economy, gone at a stroke!"

"Why, was all his small fortune embarked in this man's concern?"

"All, except a few hundreds lying loose at his banker's!—What is to become of poor Miss E——?"

"Cannot this infamous scoundrel be brought to justice?" I enquired.

"If he were, he may prove, perhaps, not worth powder and shot, the viper!"

Similar emotions kept us both silent for several moments.

"This will put his philosophy to a dreadful trial," said I. "How do you think he will bear it, should he recover from the present seizure so far as to be made sensible of the extent of his misfortunes?"

"Oh, nobly, nobly! I'll pledge my existence to it! He'll bear it like a Christian, as well as a philosopher! I've seen him in trouble before this."

"Is Miss E—— entirely dependent on her uncle; and has he made no provision for her?"

"Alas! he had appropriated to her £5000 of the £15,000 in this man's hands, as a marriage portion—I know it, for I am one of his executors. The circumstance of leaving her thus destitute, will, I know, prey cruelly on his mind." Shortly afterwards, we were summoned into the chamber of the venerable sufferer. His niece sat at the bedside, near his head, holding one of his cold motionless hands in hers. Mr E——'s face, deadly pale, and damp with perspiration, had suffered a shocking distortion of the features:—the left eye and the mouth being drawn downwards to the left side. He gazed at us vacantly, evidently without recognising us, as we took our stations, one at the foot, the other at the side of the bed. What a melancholy contrast between the present expression of his eyes, and that of acuteness and brilliance which eminently characterised them in health! They reminded me of Milton's sun, looking "through the horizontal misty air, Shorn of its beams."

The distorted lips were moving about incessantly, as though with abortive efforts to speak, though he could utter nothing but an inarticulate murmuring sound, which he had continued almost from the moment of his being struck. Was it not a piteous—a heart-rending spectacle? Was this the philosopher?—After making due enquiries, and ascertaining the extent of the injury to his nervous system, we withdrew to consult on the treatment to be adopted. In accounting for the seizure, I considered that the uncommon quantities of laudanum he had so long been in the habit of receiving into his system, alone sufficiently accounted for his present seizure. Then, again, the disease in his spine—the consequent exhaustion of his energies—the sedentary, thoughtful life he led—all these were at least pre-disposing causes. The sudden shock he had received in the morning merely accelerated what had long been advancing on him. We both anticipated a speedily fatal issue, and resolved to take the earliest opportunity of acquainting him with his approaching end.

He lies in nearly the same state during Thursday and Friday.

Saturday.—We are both astonished and delighted to find that E——'s daily paroxysms have deserted him, at least he has exhibited no symptoms of their appearance up to this day. On entering the room, we found, to our inexpressible satisfaction, that his disorder had taken a very unusual and happy course—having been worked out of the system by fever. This, as my medical readers will be aware, is a very rare occurrence.—[Three or four pages of the Diary are occupied with technical details, of no interest whatever to the general reader.]—His features were soon restored to their natural position; and, in short, every appearance of palsy left him.

Sunday evening.—Mr E—— going on well, and his mental energies and speech perfectly restored. I called on him alone. Almost his first words to me were—"Well, Doctor, good Mr Boyle was right, you see!" I replied, that it yet remained to be proved.

"God sent me a noble messenger to summon me hence, did he not? One whose character has always been my model, as far as I could imitate his great and good qualities."

"You attach too much weight, Mr E——, to that creature of imagination"——

"What! do you really doubt that I am on my death-bed? I assuredly shall not recover. The pains in my back have left me, that my end may be easy. Aye, aye, the 'silver cord is loosed.'" I enquired about the sudden cessation of his chronic complaint. He said, it had totally disappeared; leaving behind it only a sensation of numbness. "In this instance of His mercy towards an unworthy worm of the earth, I devoutly thank my Father—my God!" he exclaimed, looking reverentially upward—"Oh, how could I in patience have possessed my soul, if to the pains of dying had been super-added those which have embittered life!—My constant prayer to God has been, that, if it be His will, my life may run out clear to the last drop; and though the stream has been a little troubled," alluding to the intelligence which had occasioned his illness, "I may yet have my prayer answered—Oh, sweet darling Anne! why should I grieve for you? Where I am going, I humbly believe you are! Root and branch—both gathered home!" He shed tears abundantly, but spoke of the dreadful bereavement in terms of perfect resignation. * * * "You are no doubt acquainted," he continued, "with the other afflicting news, which, I own, has cut me to the quick! My confidence has been betrayed,—my sweet niece's prospects utterly blighted,—and I made a beggar of in my old age. This ungrateful man has squandered away infamously the careful savings of more than thirty years—every penny of which has been earned with the sweat of my brow. I do not so much care for it myself, as I have still enough left to preserve me from want during the few remaining days I have left me; but my poor dear Emma! My heart aches to think of it!"

"I hope you may yet recover some portion of your property, Mr E——; the man speaks in his letter of paying you a fair dividend."

"No, no—when once a man has deliberately acted in such an unprincipled manner as he has, it is foolish to expect restitution. Loss of character, and the confidence of his benefactor, makes him desperate. I find, that, should I linger on earth longer than a few weeks, I cannot now afford to pay the rent of this house—I must remove from it—I cannot die in the house in which my poor wife breathed her last—this very room!" His tears burst forth again, and mine started to my eyes. "A friend is now looking out lodgings for me in the neighbourhood—to which I shall remove the instant my health will permit. It goes to my heart, to think of the bustling auctioneer disposing of all my apparatus,"—tears again gushed from his eyes—"the companions of many years!"

"Dear, dear sir!—Your friends will ransack heaven and earth before your fears shall be verified," said I, with emotion.

"They—you—are very good—but you would be unsuccessful!—You must think me very weak to let these things overcome me in this way—one can't help feeling them!—A man may writhe under the amputating knife, and yet acknowledge the necessity of its use! My spirit wants disciplining."

"Allow me to say, Mr E——, that I think you bear your misfortunes with admirable fortitude—true philosophy!"

"Oh Doctor! Doctor!" he exclaimed, interrupting me, with solemn emphasis—"Believe a dying man, to whom all this world's fancied realities have sunk into shadows—nothing can make a death-bed easy, but RELIGION—a humble, hearty faith in Him, whose Son redeemed mankind! Philosophy—science—is a nothing—a mockery—a delusion—if it be only of this world!—I believe from the bottom of my heart, and have long done so, that the essence—the very crown and glory of true philosophy, is to surrender up the soul entirely to God's teaching, and practically receive and appreciate the consolations of the gospel of Jesus Christ!" Oh, the fervency with which he expressed himself—his shrunk clasped hands pointed upwards, and his features beaming with devotion! I told him it did my heart good to hear such opinions avowed by a man of his distinguished attainments.

"Don't—don't—don't talk in that strain, Doctor!" said he, turning to me with a reproving air. "Could a living man but know how compliments fall upon a dying man's ear!" "I am going shortly into the presence of Him who is Wisdom itself; and shall I go pluming myself on my infinitely less than glow-worm glimmer, into the presence of that pure effulgence? Doctor, I've felt, latterly, that I would give worlds to forget the pitiful acquirements which I have purchased by a life's labour, if my soul might meet a smile of approbation when it first flits into the presence of its Maker—its Judge!" Strange language! thought I, for the scientific E—, confessedly a master-mind among men! Would that the school of sciolists, now babbling abroad their infidel crudities, could have had one moment's interview with this dying philosopher! Pert fools, who are hardly released from their leading-strings—the very go-cart, as it were, of elemental science—before they strut about and forthwith proceed to pluck their Maker by the beard—and this, as an evidence of their "independence," and being released from the "trammels of superstition!"

Oh, Lord and Maker of the universe!—that thou shouldst be so "long-suffering" towards these insolent insects of an hour!

To return. I left E— in a glowing mood of mind, disposed to envy him his death-bed, even with all the ills which attended it! Before leaving the house, I stepped into the parlour to speak a few words to Miss E—. The sudden illness of her uncle had found its way into the papers; and I was delighted to find it had brought a profusion of cards. The morning, many of them bearing the most distinguished names in rank and science. It shewed that E—'s worth was properly appreciated. I counted the cards of five noblemen, and very many members of the Royal, and other learned Societies.

Wednesday, 15th August.—Well, poor E— was yesterday removed from his house in — Row, where he had resided upwards of twenty-five years—which he had fitted up, working often with his own hands, at much trouble and expense—having built the laboratory-room since he had the house—he was removed, I say, from his house, to lodgings in the neighbourhood. He has three rooms on the first floor, small indeed, and in humble style—but perfectly clean, neat, and comfortable. Was not this itself sufficient to have broken many a haughty spirit? His extensive philosophical apparatus, furniture, &c. &c., had all been sold, at less than a twentieth part of the sum they had originally cost him! No tidings as yet have been received of the villain who has ruined his generous patron! E— has ceased, however, to talk of it; but I see that Miss E— feels it acutely. Poor girl, woe she may! Her uncle was carried in a sedan to his new residence, and fainted on the way, but has continued in tolerable spirits since his arrival. His conduct is the admiration of all that see or hear of him! The first words he uttered as he was sitting before the fire in an easy chair, after recovering a little from the exhaustion occasioned by his being carried up stairs, were to Dr D—, who had accompanied him. "Well!"—he whispered faintly, with his eyes shut—"What a gradation!—Reached the half-way-house between — Row and the 'house appointed for all living!'"

"You have much to bear, sir!" said Dr D—. "And more to be thankful for!" replied E—. "If there were such a thing as a Protestant Calendar," said Dr D— to me, enthusiastically, while recounting what is told above, "and I could canonize, E— should stand first on the list, and be my patron saint!" When I saw E—, he was lying in bed, in a very low and weak state, evidently declining rapidly. Still he looked as placid as his fallen features would let him.

"Doctor," said he, soon after I had sat down, "how very good it is of you to come so far out of your regular route to see me!"

"Don't name it," said I, "proud and happy!"

"But, excuse me, I wish to tell you that, when I am gone, you will find I knew how to be grateful, as far as my means would warrant."

"Mr E——! my dear sir!" said I, as firmly as my emotions could let me, "if you don't promise, this day, to erase every mention of my name or services from your will, I leave you, and solemnly declare I will never intrude upon you again! Mr E——, you distress me—you do, beyond measure!"

"Well—well—well—I'll obey you—but may God bless you! God bless you!" he replied, turning his head away, while the tears trickled down. Indeed! as if a thousand guineas could have purchased the emotions with which I felt his poor damp fingers feebly compressing my hand!

"Doctor!" he exclaimed, after I had been sitting with him some time, conversing on various subjects connected with his illness and worldly circumstances—"Don't you think God can speak to the soul as well in a night as a day-dream? Shall I presume to say he has done so in my case?" I asked him what he was alluding to.

"Don't you recollect my telling you of an optical, or spectral illusion, which occurred to me at — Row? A man shutting up the shop—you know?" I told him I did.

"Well—last night I dreamed—I am satisfied it was a dream—that I saw Mr Boyle again, but how different! Instead of gloomy clothing, his appearance was wondrously radiant—and his features were not, as before, solemn, sad, and fixed, but wore an air of joy and exultation; and instead of a miserable expiring taper, he held aloft a light like the kindling lustre of a star! What think you of that, Doctor? Surely, if both these are the delusions of a morbid fancy, if they are, what a light they fling over the 'dark valley' I am entering!"

I hinted my dissent from the sceptical sneers of the day, which would resolve all that was uttered on death-beds, into delirious rant—confused, disordered faculties—superstition.

"I think you are right," said he.

"Who knows what new light may stream upon the soul, as the wall between time and eternity is breaking down? Who has come back from the grave to tell us that the soul's energies decay with the body, or that the body's decay destroys or interrupts the exercise of the soul's powers, and that all a dying man utters is mere gibberish? The Christian philosopher would be loth to do so, when he recollects that God chose the hour of death to reveal futurity to the patriarchs, and others, of old! Do you think a superintending Providence would allow the most solemn and instructive period of our life, the close—scenes where men's hearts and eyes are open, if ever, to receive admonition and encouragement—to be mere exhibitions of absurdity and weakness? Is that the way God treats his servants?"

Friday afternoon.—In a more melancholy mood than usual, on account of the evident distress of his niece about her altered prospects. He told me, however, that he felt the confidence of his soul in nowise shaken. "I am," said he, "like one lying far on the shores of Eternity, thrown there by the waters of the world, and whom a high and strong wave reaches once more and overflows. One may be pardoned a sudden chilliness and heart-fluttering.—After all," he continued, "only consider what an easy end mine is, comparatively with that of many others! How very—very thankful should I be for such an easy exit as mine seems likely to be! God be thanked that I have to endure no such agonies of horror and remorse as —!" alluding to Mr —, whom I was then attending, and whose case I had mentioned on a former occasion to Mr E——, the one described in a former part of this Diary, under the title,—"A Man about Town"—"that I am writhing under no accident—that I have not to struggle with utter destitution!—Why am I not left to perish in a prison? To suffer on a scaffold? To be plucked suddenly into the presence of my Maker in battle,* 'with all my sins upon my head?' Suppose I were grovelling in the hopeless darkness of scepticism or infidelity? Suppose I were still to endure the agonies arising from disease in my spine?—Oh God!" exclaimed Mr E——, "give me a more humble and grateful heart!"

Monday, 19th September.—Mr E—— is still alive, to the equal astonishment of Dr D—— and myself. The secret must lie, I think, in his tranquil frame of mind. He is as happy as the day is long! Oh, that my latter days may be like his! I was listening with feelings of delight unutterable to E——'s description of the state of his mind—the perfect peace he felt towards all mankind, and his humble and strong hopes of happiness hereafter—when the landlady of the house knocked at the door, and on entering, told Mr E—— that a person was down stairs very anxious to see him.—"Who is it?" enquired E——. She did not know. "Has he ever been here before?"—"No; but she thought she had several times seen him about the neighbourhood."—"What sort of a person is he?" enquired E——, with a surprised air.—"Oh, he is a tall pale man, in a brown great-coat." E—— requested her to go down and ask his name. She returned and said, "Mr H——, sir." E—— on hearing her utter the word, suddenly raised himself in bed; the little colour he had fled from his cheeks: he lifted up his hands and exclaimed—"What can the unhappy man want with me?" He paused thoughtfully for a few moments. "You're of course aware who this is?" he enquired of me in a whisper. I nodded. "Shew him up stairs," said he, and the woman withdrew. "For your own sake, I beg you to be calm; don't allow your feelings"—I was interrupted by the door opening, and just such a person as Mrs —— had described entered, with a slow hesitating step into the room. He held his hat squeezed in both his hands, and he stood for a few moments motionless, just within the door, with his eyes fixed on the floor. In that posture he continued till Mrs —— had retired, shutting the door after her, when he turned suddenly towards the easy-chair by the fire, in which Mr E—— was sitting, much agitated—approached, and falling down on his knees, he covered his eyes with his hands, through which the tears presently fell like rain; and after many choking sobs and sighs, faltered, "Oh, Mr E——!"

"What do you want with me, Mr H——?" enquired Mr E——, in a low tone, but very calmly.

"Oh, kind, good, abused sir! I have behaved like a villain to you!"

"Mr H——, I beg you will not distress me; consider I am in a very poor and weak state."

"Don't, for God's sake, speak so coldly, sir! I am heartbroken to think how shamefully I have used you!"

"Well, then, strive to amend!"

"Oh, dear, good Mr E——! can you forgive me?" Mr E—— did not answer. I saw he could not. The tears were nearly overflowing. The man seized his hand, and pressed it to his lips with fervency.

"Rise, Mr H——, rise! I do forgive you, and I hope that God will! Seek His forgiveness, which will avail you more than mine."

"Oh, sir!" exclaimed the man again, covering his eyes with his hands,— "How very—very ill you look—how pale and thin. It's I that have done it all—I, the d——dest!"

"Hush, hush, sir!" exclaimed Mr E——, with more sternness than I had ever seen him exhibit, "do not curse in a dying man's room."

"Dying—dying—dying, sir?" exclaimed the man, hoarsely, staring horror-struck at Mr E——, and retreating a step from him.

"Yes, James," replied E——, mildly, calling him for the first time by his Christian name, "I am assuredly dying—but not through you, or any thing you have done. Come, come, don't distress yourself unnecessarily," he continued in the kindest tones; for he saw the man con-

* This was at the time of the Peninsular campaign.

tinued deadly pale, speechless, and clasping his hands convulsively over his breast—"Consider, James, my daughter, Mrs —."

"Oh, no, no, sir—no! It's I that have done it all; my ingratitude has broken your heart—I know it has!—What will become of me?"—the man resumed, still staring vacantly at Mr E—.

"James, I must not be agitated in this way—it agitates me—you must leave the room unless you can become calm. What is done is done; and if you really repent of it!"—

"Oh, I do, sir; and could almost weep tears of blood for it! But indeed, sir, it has been as much my misfortune as my fault."

"Was it your misfortune or your fault that you kept that infamous woman on whom you have squandered so much of your property—of mine rather?" enquired Mr E—, with a mild expostulating air. The man suddenly blushed scarlet, and continued silent.

"It is right I should tell you that it is your misconduct which has turned me out, in my old age, from the house which has sheltered me all my life, and driven me to die in this poor place! You have beggared my niece, and robbed me of all the hard earnings of my life—wrong from the sweat of my brow, as you well know, James. James, how could your heart let you do all this?" The man made him no answer. "I am not wrong with you—that is past—but I am grieved—disappointed—shocked to find my confidence in you has been so much abused."

"Oh, sir, I don't know what it was that infatuated me; but—never trust a living man again, sir—never," replied the man vehemently.

"It is not likely I shall, James—I shall not have the opportunity," said Mr E—, calmly. The man's eye continued fixed on Mr E—, his lip quivered, in spite of his violent compression, and the fluctuating colour in his cheeks shewed the agitation he was suffering.

"Do you forgive me, sir, for what I have done?" he asked almost inaudibly.

"Yes—if you promise to amend—yes! Here is my hand—I do forgive you, as I hope for my own forgiveness hereafter!" said Mr E—, reaching out his hand. And if your repentance is sincere, should it ever be in your power, remember whom you have most heavily wronged, not me, but—but—Miss E—, my poor niece. If you should ever be able to make her any reparation—"the tears stood in Mr E—'s eyes, and his emotions prevented his completing the sentence. "Really you must leave me, James—you must—I am too weak to bear this scene any longer," said E—, faintly, looking deadly pale.

"You had better withdraw, sir, and call some other time," said L. He rose, looking almost bewildered; thrust his hand into his breast-pocket, and taking out a small packet, laid it hurriedly on Mr E—'s lap—snatched his hand to his lips, and murmuring, "Farewell, farewell, best of men!"—withdrew. I watched him through the window; and saw that as soon as he had left the house, he set off, running almost at the top of his speed. When I returned to look at Mr E—, he had fainted. He had opened the packet, and a letter lay open in his lap, with a great many bank-notes. The letter ran as follows: "Injured and revered sir—When you read this epistle, the miserable writer will have fled from his country, and be on his way to America. He has abused the confidence of one of the greatest and best of men, but hopes the enclosed sum will shew he repented what he had done! If it is ever in his power he will do more. J— H—." The packet contained bank-notes to the amount of L.3000. When E— had recovered from his swoon, I had him conveyed to bed, where he lay in a state of great exhaustion. He scarce spoke a syllable during the time I continued with him.

Tuesday.—Mr E— still suffers from the effects of yesterday's excitement. It has, I am confident, hurried him far on his journey to the grave. He told me he had been turning over the affair in his mind, and considered that it would be wrong in him to retain the L.3000, as it would be illegal, and a fraud on H—'s other creditors; and this upright man had actually sent in the morning for the solicitor to the bankrupt's assignees, and put the whole into his hands.

telling him of the circumstances under which he had received it, and asking him whether he should not be wrong in keeping it. The lawyer told him that he might perhaps be legally, but not morally wrong—as the law certainly forbade such payments, and yet he was, by very far, the largest creditor. "Let me act right, then, in the sight of God and man! Take the money, and let me come in with the rest of the creditors."—Mr —— withdrew. He must have seen but seldom such an instance of noble conscientiousness! I remonstrated with Mr E——. "No, no, Doctor," he replied, "I have endeavoured strictly to do my duty during life—I will not begin roguery on my death-bed!"—"Possibly you may not receive a penny in the pound, Mr E——," said I.

"But I shall have the comfort of quitting life with a clear conscience!"

Monday.—[A week afterwards.]—The “weary wheel” of life will soon “stand still!” All is calm and serene with E—— as a summer evening’s sunset! He is at peace with all the world, and with his God. It is like entering the porch of heaven and li—— el,—— d converse with E——. This morning he received the reward of his noble conduct in the matter of H——’s bankruptcy. The assignees have wound up the affairs, and found them not near so desperate as had been apprehended. The business was still to be carried on in H——’s name; and the solicitor, who had been sent for by E—— to receive the £1,000 in behalf of the assignees, called this morning with a cheque for £1,000, and a highly complimentary letter from the assignees. They informed him that there was every prospect of the concern’s yet discharging the heavy amount of his claim, and that they would see to its being paid to whomsoever he might appoint.— H—— had set sail for America, the very day he had called on E——, and had left word that he should never return. E—— altered his will this evening, in the presence of myself and Dr D——. He left about £10,000 to his niece, “and whatever sums might be from time to time paid in from H——’s business,” five guineas for a yearly prize to the writer of the best summary of the progress of philosophy every year, in one of the Scotch colleges; and ten pounds to be delivered every Christmas to ten poor men, as long as they lived, and who had already received the gratuity for several years; "and to J—— H——, the full and hearty forgiveness, and prayers to God that he may return to a course of virtue and true piety, before it is too late." * * * "How is it," said he, addressing Dr D—— and me, "that you have neither of you said any thing to me about examining my body after my decease?" Dr D—— replied, that he had often thought of asking his permission, but had kept delaying from day to day. "Why?" enquired E——, with a smile of surprise, "do you fancy I have any silly foms or prejudices on the subject? That I am anxious about the shell when the kernel is gone? I can assure you that it would rather give me pleasure than otherwise, to think that by an examination of my body, the cause of medical science might be advanced, and so mine a little to my species. I must however, say you nay; for I promised my poor wife that I would forbid it. She had prejudiced me." I here turned to the Wednesday.—He looked much reduced this evening. I had hurried to his lodgings, to communicate what I considered would be the gratifying intelligence, that the highest prize of a foreign learned society had just been awarded him, for his work on ———, together with a fellowship. My heated and hurried manner somewhat discomposed him; and before I had communicated my news, he asked, with some agitation, "What!—Some new misfortune?"—"When I had told him my errand,—"Oh, bubble! bubble! bubble!" he exclaimed, shaking his head with a melancholy smile, "would I not give 10,000 of these for a poor man's blessing? Are these, these, the trifles men toil through a life for?—Oh, if it had pleased God to give me a single glimpse of what I now see, thirty years ago, how true an estimate I should have formed of the littleness—the vanity of human applause! How much happier would my end have been! How much nearer should I have come to the character of a true philosopher—an impartial, independent, sincere teacher of the truth, for its own sake!"—"But honours of this kind are of admirable service to science, Mr E.—," said I, "as supplying strong incentives and stimulants to a pursuit of philosophy."

"Yes—but does it not argue a defect in the constitution of men's minds to require them? What is the use of stimulants in medicine, Doctor?—Don't they presuppose a morbid sluggishness in the parts they are applied to? Do you ever stimulate a healthy organ?—So is it with the little honours and distinctions we are speaking of. Directly a man becomes anxious about obtaining them, his mind has lost its healthy tone—its sympathies with truth—with real philosophy."

"Would you, then, discourage striving for them? Would you banish honours and prizes from the scientific world?"

"Assuredly—altogether—did we but exist in a better state of society than we do.* * What is the proper spirit in which, as matters at present stand, a philosopher should accept of honours?—Merely as evidences, testimonials, to the multitude of those who are otherwise incapable of appreciating his merits, and would set him down as a dreamer—a visionary—but that they saw the estimation in which he was held by those who are likely to canvass his claims strictly. They compel the deference, if not respect, of the la tie. A philosopher ought to receive them, therefore, as it were, in self-defence—a shut-mouth to babbling envious gainsayers. Were all the world philosophers, in the true sense of the word, not merely would honours be unnecessary, but an insult—a reproach. Directly, a philosopher is conscious that the love of fame—the ambition to secure such distinctions, is gradually insinuating—interweaving itself with the very texture of his mind; that considerations of that kind are becoming necessary in any degree to prompt him to undertake or prosecute scientific pursuits, he may write Ichabon on the door of his soul's temple—for the glory is departed. His motives are spurious; his fires false! To the exact extent of the necessity for such motives is, as it were, the pure ore of his soul adulterated. Minerva's jealous eyes can detect the slightest vacillation or inconsistency in her votaries, and discover her rival even before the votary himself is sensible of her existence; and withdraws from her faithless admirer, in cold disdain, perhaps never to return. Do you think that Archimedes, Plato, or Sir Isaac Newton, would have cared a straw for even royal honours? The true test, believe me—the almost infallible criterion of a man's having attained to true greatness of mind—to the true philosophic temper, is, his utter indifference to all sorts of honours and distinctions. Why?—What seeks he—or proposes to seek—but Truth? Is he to stop in the race, to look after Atalanta's apples? He should outdo honours, not go out of his way to seek them. If one apple latches in his vest, he may carry it with him, not stop to dislodge it. Scientific distinctions are absolutely necessary in the present state of society, because it is defective. A mere ambitious struggle for college honours, through rivalry, has induced many a man to enter so far upon philosophical studies, as that their charms, unfolding in proportion to his progress, have been, of themselves, at last sufficient to prevail upon him to go onwards—to love science for herself alone. Honours make a man open his eyes, who would else have gone to his grave with them shut: and when once he has seen the divinity of truth, he laughs at obstacles, and follows it, through evil and good report—if his soul be properly constituted—if it have in it any of the nobler sympathies of our nature.—That is my homily on honours," said he, with a smile. "I have not wilfully preached and practised different things, I assure you," he continued, with a modest air, "but through life have striven to act upon these principles. Still, I never saw so clearly as at this moment how small my success has been—to what an extent I have been influenced by incorrect motives—as far as an over-valuing of the world's honours may be so considered. Now I see through no such magnifying medium; the mists and vapours are dispersing: and I begin to see that these objects are in themselves little, even to nothingness.—The general retrospect of my life is far from satisfactory," continued E—— with a sigh—"and fills me with real sorrow!"—"Why?"—I enquired with surprise. "Why, for this one reason—because I have in a measure sacrificed my religion to philosophy! Oh—will my Maker thus be put off with the mere lees—the refuse—of my time and energies? For one hour in the day, that I have devoted to him, have I not given twelve or fourteen to my own pursuits? What shall I say of this shortly—in a few hours—perhaps moments—when I stand suddenly in the presence of God—when I see Him face to face?—Oh, Doctor!—my heart sinks and sickens at the thought!—shall I not be speechless as one of old?"

I told him I thought he was unnecessarily severe with himself—that he "wrote bitter things against himself."

"I thought so once, nay, all my life, myself—Doctor!"—said he, solemnly—"but, mark my words as a dying man—you will think as I do now when you come to be in my circumstances!"

The above, feebly conveyed perhaps to the reader, may be considered THE LAST WORDS OF A PHILOSOPHER. They made an impression on my mind which has never been effaced; and I trust never will. The reader need not suspect him of "prosing." The above were uttered with no pompous, swelling, pedantic swagger of manner, but with the simplest, most modest air, and in the most silvery tones of voice I ever listened to. He often paused, from faintness; and at the conclusion, his voice grew almost inaudible, and he wiped the thick-standing dew from his forehead. He begged me, in a low whisper, to kneel down, and read him one of the church prayers—the one appointed for those in prospect of death: I took down the prayer-book, and complied, though my emotions would not suffer me to speak in more than an often-interrupted whisper. He lay perfectly silent throughout, with his clasped hands pointing upwards; and when I had concluded, he responded feebly, but fervently, "Amen—Amen!"—and the tears gushed down his cheeks. My heart was melted within me. The silk cap had slipped from his head, and his long loose silvery hair streamed over his bed-dress: his appearance was that of a dying prophet of old! But I find I am going on at too great length for the reader's patience, and must pause. For my own part I could linger over the remembrances of these solemn scenes for ever; but I shall hasten on to the "last scene of all." It did not take place till near a fortnight after the interview above narrated. His manner during that time evinced no tumultuous ecstasies of soul; none of the boisterous extravagance of enthusiasm. His departure was like that of the sun, sinking gradually and finally, lower—lower—lower—no sudden up-flashings—no quivering—no flickering unsteadiness about his fading rays!

Tuesday, 13th October.—Miss E—— sent word that her uncle appeared dying, and had expressed a wish to see both Dr D—— and me. I therefore dispatched a note to Dr D——, requesting him to meet me at a certain place, and then hurried through my list of calls, so as to have finished by three o'clock. By four we were both in the room of the dying philosopher. Miss E—— sat by his bedside, her eyes swollen with weeping, and was in the act of kissing her uncle's cheek when we entered. Mr E——, an exemplary clergyman, who had been one of E——'s earliest and dearest friends, sat at the foot of the bed, with a copy of Jeremy Taylor's "Holy Living and Dying," from which he was reading in a low tone, at the request of E——. The appearance of the latter was very interesting. At his own instance, he had not long before been shaved, washed, and had a change of linen; and the bed was also but recently made, and was not at all tumbled or disordered. The mournful tolling of the church-bell for a funeral was also heard at intervals, and added to the solemnity of the scene. I have seldom felt in such a state of excitement as I was on first entering the room. He shook hands with each of us, or rather we shook his hands, for he could hardly lift them from the bed. "Well—thank you for coming to bid me farewell!"

said he, with a smile; adding presently, "Will you allow Mr F—— to proceed with what he is reading?" Of course we nodded, and sat in silence, listening. I watched E——'s features; they were much wasted—but exhibited no traces of pain. His eye, though rather sunk in the socket, was full of the calmness and confidence of unwavering hope, and often directed upwards with a devout expression. A most heavenly serenity was diffused over his countenance. His lips occasionally moved, as if in the utterance of prayer. When Mr F—— had closed the book, the first words uttered by E—— were, "Oh! the infinite goodness of God!"

"Do you feel that your 'anchor' is within the veil?" enquired F——.

"Oh!—yes—yes!—My vessel is steadily moored—the tide of life goes fast away—I am forgetting that I ever sailed on its sea!" replied E——, closing his eyes.

"The star of faith shines clearest in the night of expiring nature!" exclaimed F——.

"The Sun—the Sun of faith, say rather," replied E——, in a tone of fervent exultation; "it turns my night into day—it warms my soul—it rekindles my energies!—Sun—sun of righteousness!"—he exclaimed, faintly. Miss E—— kissed him repeatedly with deep emotion. "Emma, my love!" he whispered, "hope thou in God! See how he will support thee in death!"—She burst into tears—"Will you promise me, love, to read the little Bible I gave you when I am gone—especially the New Testament?"—Do—do, love."

"I will—I——," replied Miss E——, almost choked with her emotions. She could say no more.

"Dr ——," he addressed me, "I feel more towards you than I can express; your services—services——" he grew very pale and faint. I rose and poured out a glass of wine, and put it to his lips. He drank a few tea-spoonfuls, and it revived him.

"Well!" he exclaimed, in a stronger voice than I had before heard him speak. "I thank God I leave in perfect peace with all mankind! There is but one thing that grieves me—the general neglect of religion among men of science." Dr D—— said it must afford him great consolation to reflect on the steadfast re-
